Mr. R. Ellis said, a solemn compact had been entered into between the mother country and her colonies—the former having stipulated to grant every protection to the latter; and that compact ought never to be lost sight of. On that ground he objected to the course proposed by the hon. member with whom the debate had originated, and, generally to the arguments of those who advocated the introduction of East India sugar, and who would force West India sugar out of the market. Every species of British manufacture was protected against competition. So was the linen of Ireland, and the salt fish of North America; and why should not the same protection be afforded to our colonial produce? The advocates for East India sugar argued that it ought to be imported, because it was produced by free labour: but gentlemen would recollect, that the greater part of the cotton which was manufactured in this country was brought in its raw state from the southern provinces of America and Brazil. Did they not know that a great portion of those who cultivated cotton in Georgia were slaves, and that all the cultivators of cotton in Brazil were slaves? Now, he would ask, did not those persons who purchased cotton thus raised, encourage, may aggravate slavery? Why, if they held slavery in such abhorrence, should they encourage it, by using the slave labour of another country? Yet, if they did not, they would be obliged to break up their intercourse with a great part of America and with Brazil—a sacrifice which neither the President of the Board of Trade nor the manufacturers of this country, would be very ready to make. The hon. gent. then contended, that the bounty on the exportation of the refined sugar of the West Indies was perfectly just; for on the faith of that arrangement the growers had been induced from time to time to embark their property in the trade. He wished that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could bring forward some equitable arrangement by which the interests of the two parties connected with this question would be preserved, while each of them received a certain benefit. As to the proposition of that rt. hon. gent. with reference to rum and brown sugar, he feared, if it were not considerably modified, that it would prove an injury, instead of a benefit, to the colonies.

Mr. F. Buxton said, that no desire existed on the part of himself or his friends to oppress the West India interest: but they were anxious that justice should be done to the black population of the colonies. It was asserted that a rise in the price of sugar was good for the slave, and that a depreciation of price was prejudicial to him. Now he denied this. A reduction in the price must produce one of two effects—either the proprietor would cultivate less land, or if he did not continue to cultivate it, he would substitute some other article of growth. In either case, this must be beneficial to the negro. If the proprietor ceased cultivating his estate, the negro would be exempted from labour; if, on the other hand, he continued to cultivate, the negro must be employed in raising provisions. He was sure, that the custom of not growing provisions was one of the greatest evils in the colonial system; and he believed that many persons thought the growth of provisions in the colonies should be attended to almost exclusively. The custom of keeping up high prices by giving artificial bounties, caused the neglect of this branch of cultivation; and the removal of a system which had such injurious effects would be extremely beneficial. Take it either way, it must do good: if the cultivator ceased to employ the negroes, there would be a diminution of labour; but if he still chose to employ them, there would be an increase of provisions. It was quite clear, that when the least quantity of sugar was grown, the slave was better off than where the cultivation of sugar was carried to a great extent.

Mr. Trant deprecated these incidental discussions of the colonial questions. He should, therefore, abstain from expressing his opinions till the matter came substantively before the house.

Mr. Bright expressed his hope that those who professed themselves the friends of free trade would take care that the West India interests were not the only exception to the general application of the principles. Those interests had already suffered materially from the effects of an opposite system. The exports from the West Indies to North America had been reduced to almost nothing.—To proceed to another topic: it had been said that the mortality among the slaves was proportioned to the great or small production of sugar in the various places where it was cultivated. In support of this assertion, a comparison was drawn between the slaves in Demerara and Jamaica and those of the Bahama Islands. Nothing could be less satisfactory than such a comparison, because the occupation and the habits of the slaves in those places were wholly distinct, and the fertility of the soil was not less different. It would be as just to compare the slaves of Jamaica with those who were employed to work the Mexican mines. The assertion that the slaves were worse off in proportion to the quantity of sugar raised, was opposed to the testimony of every man who had written upon, or who knew any thing of the subject. It was the interest of the planter to take care that his slaves were well fed and clothed, and it was obvious that he was better able to provide for them when a large supply and better prices were the consequence of their labours; and this was accordingly the actual result. On the contrary, the effect of low prices was sometimes to force cultivation. He called upon hon. gentlemen to take such measures with respect to the West India interests as were consistent with the principles of free trade—to do justice to those interests, and not to leave them in the lurch while they professed to extend the benefit of such principles universally.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he wished to explain why he had refrained from taking any part in the present discussion. The bill (the Annual Duties bill) had passed through all its stages to the third reading without any objection, or the show of any opposition, having been offered on the subject of the duties. He had, indeed, been given to understand by the member for Weymouth (Mr. Buxton), that it was his intention, and that of his friends, to avail themselves of the opportunity which the third reading would give them, of expressing their opinion on a part of the question. He had suggested to the hon. gent. that such a course would be inconvenient, but still it was preferred, and had been followed. No opposition had, however, been offered, nor had any alteration been suggested, with respect to the duties. He thought, therefore, that he was fully justified in remaining silent. What his opinion was, the bill he had brought in sufficiently explained. The duties for the year to come would be the same as they had been for the year past. Whether future circumstances would occasion a change in the measure he had submitted or not, was what he would not now speculate upon: but he should have thought it unreasonable if he had proposed any different scale of duties.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Slave Acts Consolidation.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—Mr. W. Horton rose to ask for leave to bring in a bill to consolidate the Slave-Trade Abolition Act. He understood that a learned gent. intended to oppose the introduction of the bill, unless certain clauses were inserted in it to prevent the return of foreign refugee slaves who had found their way into our colonies.

Dr. Lushington said, that he could by no means consent to give up refugee slaves, who had once established themselves in any of our

West India colonies. Such a power could not be justified either by any law of nations or of man. If the bill created such a power, he could make no concession upon it.

Mr. W. Horton said, that if such were the hon. member's resolution, he must postpone his motion to a future day, in consequence of the absence of his rt. hon. friend, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

Free and Slave Labour.

FRIDAY, MARCH 21.—Mr. Hume (in the committee of supply) objected to a sum, which had, notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of the Lords of the Treasury, for four years past, amounted to from 1,600*l.* to 2,000*l.* The money was advanced for the maintenance of from 300 to 400 negroes, artisans, and mechanics, who were retained by the Government at Berbice. It had been said that free labour was cheaper than slave labour; and, in order to make an adequate experiment, these 300 or 400 negroes had been held in the pay of Government, under commissioners appointed to manage them, in consequence of a request from the hon. member for Bramber, and others of the Emancipation party. It turned out, however, that this labour could only be made to answer the expenses of supporting it by grants from Government, which the Lords of the Treasury had objected to, but yet persisted in paying. The colonial department ought not to have suffered this experiment to be carried on at the expense of the British public. Surely, when they called upon gentlemen who were interested in the protection of West India property to relinquish some part of the claim they made on their slaves, they ought first to set the example, and prove the superior power of free labour by manumitting these 300 or 400 slaves.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that, on the cession of Berbice to the British crown, the Government had taken possession of those 300 or 400 negro artisans held by the previous Government, and that at the suggestion of a very considerable and humane party in that house they had undertaken to have them held by commissioners of their own paying, in order to make trial of the effects of free labour in their maintenance. Those persons, like many others who employed agents abroad, were betrayed and brought into dangerous expenses, and finding it impossible to fulfil their trust, returned it back to the Government, to manage it by its own commissioners. He had nothing to say for the project in either case. But there were the slaves, and Government knew not what to do with them. Undoubtedly, if the charge could be got rid of without the danger of exposing the poor creatures to absolute distress and misery, it would be due to the interests of the British public to adopt the mode of abandoning it suggested.

Administration of Justice in Jamaica.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22.—Sir R. Wilson rose to put a question to the Colonial Sec. relative to a subject which was of serious importance to the proper administration of the law in Jamaica. It had been stated in a pamphlet written by Mr. Mickle, a clergyman of the Church of England, "that in one of the recent trials (of certain slaves) the jury was dismissed, because the judges thought the offence so trivial that a very lenient sentence would be sufficient for it; and yet, on the next day, the same jury was re-assembled, when a very severe sentence was passed on the offenders." Now, he wished to know whether these facts were properly stated, or not?

Mr. W. Horton said, that a report of the trials to which the gallant officer alluded had been laid on the table of the house some months ago, containing full information on the point about which he appeared so solicitous. The analogy which Mr. Mickle had supposed to exist between an English jury and the jury impanelled for these trials had no existence, except in his imagination. The court which took cognizance of such offences as had been committed, was a court formed under the bill for the consolidation of the acts to regulate the slave-trade, and was imperfect unless a jury were present. The jury were, therefore, re-assembled to enable the judge to pass sentence; and in passing that sentence the judge was bound to adhere to the letter of the law. As the parties had been found guilty of a crime which was punishable by transportation, the judge was bound to pass sentence of transportation upon them. The power of mitigating that sentence rested with the governor, and the governor alone. The pamphlet of Mr. Mickle was drawn up throughout in a very flippant style, and showed gross ignorance of the subject on which it was written.

West India Company Bill.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29.—Mr. Manning moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. F. Buxton said, he should give it all the opposition in his power. He looked upon this as a company dealing not merely in sugar, and other West India produce, but opening a disgusting traffic in our fellow-creatures. He, therefore, would move as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Robertson expressed his surprise, that the hon. member, who was the champion of all sorts of joint-stock companies in that house—some of them calculated to bring ruin on the parties concerned—should oppose this bill, which really tended to benefit his fellow-creatures.—The amendment was negatived without a division.

MONDAY, MAY 16.—Mr. Manning moved the third reading of the West India Company bill.

Mr. Evans opposed it, on the same ground as Mr. Buxton; and concluded by repeating the amendment, that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

Mr. T. Wilson said, that the employment of capital in the proposed company, by relieving the distresses which were felt by the planters in the West Indies, would ameliorate the situation of the slaves.

Dr. Lushington opposed the bill. The operations of the company must necessarily be conducted by agents, and the consequence would be, that the slaves would endure worse treatment than if their immediate masters were on the spot. The difficulties in the way of manumission would also be increased. Manumission was frequently conferred by masters on their slaves, by their wills, as a recompense for long services or other such causes. This intellimate connexion could not subsist between a numerous company and the slaves employed by them; and the slaves would become, as it were, vested in mortmain in this company. This measure would have the effect of perpetuating a system, of which the house had already expressed its reprobation.

Mr. Hume said, the objection of his learned friend, relative to the slaves being under the direction of agents, existed at present, and must always continue to do so. The distress in the West Indies fell equally on slave and master, and this bill would tend to relieve both.

Sir J. Coffin: "I am satisfied that this is a good bill, and I hope it will pass" (hear, hear).

Mr. Gordon said, the object of the bill was only to enable West India proprietors to borrow money from a company instead of from individuals. He contended that the condition of the slaves would be ameliorated by the passing of the bill.

Mr. F. Burton admitted that there was a reduction of the value of slave property, and that the bill would discourage the investment of capital in slaves. He thought, however, that the slaves were human beings, and, on every principle of Christianity, should not be made matters of sale. The bill would give greater power to the West India interest, which already possessed too much. Mr. Fox, many years ago, said, that there was no body in the state so well represented in this house as the West India interest. He had seen a paragraph in a Jamaica paper, in which it was stated that the West India trade could put forth a phalanx of 800 members in the House of Commons (a laugh).

Mr. Brougham had a decided objection to the bill, not on account of a wish to prevent the incorporation of joint-stock companies, though he admitted that in general such companies were most mischievous when not laid under very tight restrictions, and watched narrowly in their proceedings; but his objection to the bill rested on grounds of greater importance. He entreated the house not to be led away with the vain imagination that they were legislating upon a private act of parliament. The bill was a measure which affected property all over the West Indies; it affected the comfort of the negro slave, man, woman, and child, in the whole West India colonies. If he understood the measure aright, it was one for exasperating one of the mischiefs, already sufficiently great, attending upon negro slavery. If he could not demonstrate this to the satisfaction of every member in the house, he would be content to withdraw his opposition to the bill (some interruption). If the house felt any difficulty in attending to the subject at that moment, he would move an adjournment of the question to a time when they felt themselves more fit to legislate upon the limbs, liberty, and lives of 800,000 human beings. What was at present the only security which slaves had for any thing like mild or just treatment? It was, that it was the interest of the master to treat them kindly. But if he lived away from them, if 3,000 miles of sea were interjected between him and the slaves, every man living must admit that the latter would have but little chance of mild and just treatment. It was already admitted that incalculable evils resulted from the non-residence of the planters. That non-residence was always the excuse made for those evils. "My lord such a one," it was said, or "Mr. such another," would treat his slaves well if he lived on his estate; but he lives in London or Liverpool, and is obliged to trust the management of his estates to an overseer. Now what did the bill propose to do? To form a company of 40,000 persons necessarily absent from the West Indies. It might be said that one person would hold a great many shares; but the number of the shareholders made little difference. Be they few or many, the comforts of the slaves would depend upon those who were thousands of miles from the spot. The bill would add to the evil of non-residence a more probable cause of ill-treatment of the slaves; they would have no direct owner at all. This was carrying on joint-stock companies with a vengeance. He had no objection to joint-stock companies for establishing banks, or making canals or rail-ways, but he would never consent to put the happiness of 800,000 negroes at the mercy of one of them. Suppose the negroes on an estate should be maltreated, where was the remedy to be found? In the board of directors of the company! He might hope for the good treatment of slaves in the character of particular planters; but it would be in vain to seek for it amongst a board of directors—the deputies of shareholders, who had no more than an ideal property in the negroes. What was bad before the bill, would now be made ten thousand fold worse, and by passing it, the house would sacrifice the little chance which existed of correcting West India abuses, for the love of establishing joint stock companies, and encouraging a traffic in their shares.

Mr. Baring said, the object of the bill was not as the learned member seemed to think, to enable a company to buy up West India property, but only to enable them to become mortgagees of that property. If the measure could have any reference to the question of the slave trade at all, it would, he believed, have a tendency to prevent that traffic. He had no apprehension that any acts of oppression would be permitted under a company which was compelled to publish an account of its proceedings once a year. Having alluded to the subject of the slave trade, he could not avoid expressing his indignation at the fact, that that trade was at present carried on with the most unblushing effrontery by the great continental powers. In France, not the slightest attempt was made to disguise the fact. By other countries which attempted to disguise it, the traffic was attended with greater cruelty. More misery was, he believed, now connected with the slave-trade than at any period since it had attracted the attention of the British Parliament (hear, hear).

Mr. W. Smith said, that the hon. member who spoke last, had said, that an annual account of the company's proceedings was to be made public; but a clause to that effect had only been introduced at a late stage of the bill; originally it was not intended that the bill should contain any such clause. The scheme in question would be a losing one to those who engaged in it. It was an attempt to prop a sinking interest; but he did not believe it would be a successful one.

Mr. R. Ellis insisted that the negroes would be benefited by it. The object of the company was to lend money, and by no means to become proprietors of estates. As the trade of the West India merchant was better far than that of the planter, they would always be in-desired to avoid foreclosure upon mortgages, where it was possible.

The house then divided. For the bill, 103—Against it, 25—Majority, 78.—After which the bill was read a third time and passed.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 1.—Earl Bathurst moved the third reading of the West India Company bill.

Earl Grosvenor regarded this measure as one of considerable importance. He was afraid that the passing of this bill would make the condition of the slaves worse than it now was. However, as on the other hand there were many good reasons to be urged in favour of the bill, he should not oppose it. He hoped that the subject of free labour would be taken into consideration by parliament at an early period of the next session.

Earl Bathurst would not agree to give the bill his support if he supposed that it would create any obstacle to the improvement of the situation of the slaves; but, on the contrary, he conceived it would be highly useful to them. While the West India planters were in distress, their slaves must be in distress also; and as this bill would alleviate the distress of the planters, it was to be presumed that it would also ameliorate the condition of the slaves.

The Marquis of Landown and Lord Colthorpe said a few words in favour of the bill, which was read a third time and passed.

Deportation of Two Persons of Colour from Jamaica.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.—Dr. Lushington rose to present a petition from two persons of the names of Escoffery and Lecesne, complaining of having been, without any just cause, sent out of the Island of Jamaica, in 1823, by the Duke of Manchester. In his view of the question, it was of very considerable importance to the safety and prosperity of the colonies in general, and to the colony of Jamaica in particular, that this case should be investigated; for it certainly disclosed one of the greatest outrages that ever was committed on British subjects. It might be proper to state, that the population of Jamaica consisted of 360,000 blacks, 86,000 free men of colour, and 25,000 whites. These 36,000 men of colour had long been under the most heinous disabilities. No farther back than 1815, there existed a law, by which free men of colour were prevented from bequeathing more than 2000*l.* to a person of colour, even though he should be a son or a brother. They were prohibited from giving evidence against the whites, and from serving on juries. They were permitted, however, to pay taxes, they subscribed to funds for the furtherance of education, and for the support of religious institutions, and yet they were not allowed to exercise the elective franchise. A white alien could not be convicted on the evidence of a slave; but a coloured free native might. An attempt was made, in 1822, to get rid of those disabilities, which led to considerable discussion. That effort, however, had failed. Now he thought that any man who considered for a single moment how exceedingly important it was, not only to the interests of justice, but to the safety and preservation of this colony, to consult the good wishes of this large class of the population, who at that moment enjoyed their freedom, who were possessed of property, and who were daily increasing, not in the ordinary course of population, by the addition made amongst themselves, but also by the increasing offspring from whites and blacks, must see the necessity of treating them with kindness and consideration. Those persons were allowed to serve in the militia, and to hold the rank of sergeant. They were trained up in, and they understood the art of war; and on their fidelity and allegiance he might justly say that the safety of Jamaica depended. Up to the present moment, there had not been imputed to this class the slightest disposition to commit any offence against the government, or the slightest wish to promote insubordination. All the writers on the subject of Jamaica concurred in stating that their loyalty to the government was unimpeached. Mr. Bryan Edwards, the historian of the West Indies, spoke in the highest terms of those people. A secret committee appointed by the House of Assembly in Jamaica, to inquire into the cause of certain disturbances which had prevailed there some time back, reported, in strong terms, that the coloured inhabitants deserved well of the community for their irreproachable conduct. Such was their language in the month of November last, yet it was on two persons of this class, so highly praised and esteemed, that acts of great injustice had been practised. There were, in the population of Jamaica, four intermediate classes, between absolute darkness and whiteness. It seemed that freedom in that island depended entirely on the relative fairness of the skin. But though colour produced disabilities in Jamaica, it did not produce any in England. One individual of colour held a post in His Majesty's government; and another had arrived at high rank in the army, and had formed a connexion with a branch of the other house (hear, hear). The learned gent. proceeded to state, that the petitioners were, in the month of October, 1823, put under arrest; but, on the business being heard before the proper law authorities, they were set at liberty as free-born subjects. They were, however, again arrested on the 29th of November, and banished as aliens. Now, it was admitted on all sides, that they had, from their infancy, resided on the island; and the point agitated against them was, that they had not been domiciled there till they were two years old. He, however, did not care whether the period was three or four years; for it was notorious, that when they were school-boys they were domiciled in Jamaica. They had, in 1815, taken up their freedom, and they had served as sergeants in the militia. In short, they had resided on the island for 25 or 26 years; and he must say, that the course pursued towards them was an exercise of the power of the alien act, under the government of the Duke of Manchester, which astonished him. The charge against these persons was contained in a letter written by one of the government collectors, and dated the 30th of September, 1823, in which an accusation was made against them for raising money, ostensibly for a religious society, but in reality to procure arms. Now there was not a single word to prove one tittle of this assertion. He had himself seen all the papers of this religious society, which fully accounted for the money they had received and expended. It was complained that this society placed too much confidence in those persons,

But who were those in whom the confidence was reposed? Why, the very people of colour whom the Assembly of Jamaica described as most zealously attached to the peace and happiness of the colony. It was also said that those parties kept up a correspondence with certain French whites, which was injurious to the government. But of this no proof had been adduced. And yet, without any evidence of these facts, the Duke of Manchester allowed himself to sign an order for taking up these individuals, and deporting them to St. Domingo (hear, hear). It was impossible in all these returns—the papers which he now held in his hands—to find a single atom of testimony that bore against them. If there were any such evidence in existence, or any fact that could be produced, it ought to have been, undoubtedly, included in these returns, because the whole evidence had been moved for, and the whole ought, in justice to the Duke of Manchester, to have been supplied. Now who were they whom his Grace so ordered to be deported? Two men resident in Kingston; one of them possessed of 14 slaves, the other of 5; both well-known and respected, and carrying on a large wholesale business as distillers; both married, with families of four children each—yet, thus circumstanced, without giving them time to settle their affairs, or to take leave of their families and friends, they were hurried away by virtue of this extraordinary order, and forcibly transferred from their houses. Scarcely, however, had a principal performer in this business, Mr. Barnes, the Mayor of Kingston, found what was likely to take place, than he began to feel alarmed, and he went so far as to say, that notwithstanding he had the orders, he had not yet taken up the parties; that he should be disposed to adopt any legal measures to prevent their going away out of the island; and that being married men, they would be sure to have many friends in the country. Why, most likely they would; and it was most improbable, on a similar account, that they would submit very quietly to an unwarrantable order of deportation. Notwithstanding this, the business was proceeded in, though all was silence and secrecy as to the true motives which had excited these proceedings. The warrant having been issued against them, however, it would seem that the Duke of Manchester considered himself bound to carry it into execution; and that he thought, seeing that he had ordered them to be carried out of the country, that no considerations of private interest should be allowed to interfere with their sentence. They caused a petition to be prepared on their behalf, representing to the Duke that they had privileged papers. Now the house ought to be informed of the meaning of this description. Every person of colour, claiming to be free, before he could give evidence was obliged to go before the court, and there prove that he was a British subject, and entitled to his privilege. Now these two individuals, Escoffery and Lecesne, went before the court in 1814, nine years prior to these transactions, and obtained their privilege; upon the affidavit of the father of one of them and on other evidence. Now, to free men of colour this privilege, by the law of Jamaica, could not be granted unless the court before whom the application was heard were unanimous in granting it. Strange to say, Mr. Barnes himself was one of the magistrates who granted, on this very occasion, his privileged papers to Lecesne, which were afterwards impeached in his presence (hear, hear). But what was done by the Duke of Manchester in reference to the petition? He referred it and the accompanying affidavit to Mr. Hector Mitchell and Mr. Barnes, the persons who had already presented the papers he had referred to, and who had acted in the manner he had mentioned. What chance of justice had they when their petition was referred to those who had already complained of them; and who were now to report on their petition, without hearing a single word of the evidence they had to offer, or instituting anything like an investigation into their case? The Duke's letter to Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Barnes of the 8th of October, directed them to confine their inquiries to a single point—whether or not the parties were aliens? If it should appear that they were, then the order which had been made out must be carried into effect. The report of Messrs. Barnes and Mitchell expressly stated, that the men were aliens, and that the affidavits produced by them were altogether unworthy of credit. Now these were the very same affidavits upon which the court of King's Bench had determined that the parties were entitled to their privilege of evidence (hear, hear). As to Lecesne, the official copy of the will of his father showed that he was not born at St. Domingo, but in Jamaica. That will, too, declared that this son should be the executor of the deceased; it vested in him the care of his younger brothers, until they should have attained a certain age; and directed that the whole property should remain in Lecesne's hands for a period of six years at least. A strong reason for this sort of disposition was, that by the law of Jamaica an executor was entitled to six per cent. on the amount of property he administered; and a testator was always anxious, therefore, in that island, that his executor should be one of his family; because, by the whole of the estate passing through such hands, a considerable saving of expense was effected as regarded the parties intended to be benefitted. Then, as to Escoffery, they stated that he was an alien, and that satisfactory affidavits clearly proved that he had been unsuccessful in a former attempt to obtain privileged papers, and in fact had not obtained them. Nothing could be more gross than the conduct and the evidence which were here exhibited. Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Barnes were thus deceiving the Duke of Manchester, and getting up—whether from motives of private pique or with what other personal views, it might be easy, perhaps, hereafter to discover—a statement which they knew to be false. They knew that Escoffery was not an alien, and that he had obtained his privileged papers (hear, hear). But here he should perhaps be asked, how it could be imagined that two gentlemen, one of them a magistrate of Jamaica, the other mayor of Kingston, could have any interest in fabricating a false report on a petition of this kind? Perhaps there might be some cause assigned for the grossness of their interference, and the persecuting spirit they had manifested. In a lawsuit which had been instituted some years since, Louis Nicolas Regulier and Mary Hall were plaintiffs, and Mr. Barnes and another defendants. In that case, wherein Lecesne was interested against Barnes, it seemed that an estate had been devised by the father of these parties, upon which Mr. Barnes had asserted a claim of 4,000*l.* The matter, after a long litigation, was heard on appeal before the privy council, who declared Mr. Barnes's claim to be altogether fraudulent. He was obliged to infer, that some such circumstances as this had induced Mr. Barnes to act in regard to these two individuals in a manner so derogatory to the interests of justice, and his own honour. In all that he should say on this subject, he would be very cautious, and indeed he had not advanced a single syllable that he did not conscientiously believe he could satisfactorily prove. The learned gentleman proceeded to give a history of the proceedings which on a former occasion, in October, had been had upon the application before the Supreme Court, Jamaica, to bring up the parties by habeas corpus. That application was signed by no less than five magistrates; and among others by a member of council, and by Mr. Hall; and these petitioners expressed a concurrent opinion that Escoffery and Lecene were not only British-born subjects, but free from all blame in these transactions. The house would observe that the Duke of Manchester, in the first instance, had issued his warrant to the Provost Marshal, and yet at the foot of the same petition they would find the Marshal's own name, Angus Kennedy (hear, hear). This petition, thus respectably signed, the Duke treated as nothing—as unworthy of any serious consideration; and affected indeed to suppose that it came principally from creditors interested in the affairs of the distillery. The fact, however, was, that of the 35 or 36 petitioners, five only were creditors, and those not to a greater amount than 25*l.* The two men themselves bore a very good character, not only for their commercial dealings, but for their conduct in the militia. Mr. Hall had also borne testimony of his very good opinion of and confidence in them; but, notwithstanding all the testimony in their favour, the Duke of Manchester had thought proper to act upon an impression of precisely contrary nature, and unsupported by any kind of investigation whatever. Upon the hearing on habeas corpus, the court discharged both individuals. The affidavits adduced by Lecene established in the strongest manner the fact of his being a British-born subject; and besides the evidence then given by the woman who had accompanied his mother when she was pregnant with him, to St. Domingo, he had succeeded in obtaining the original bill of the accoucheur who attended her, properly verified in Jamaica. On behalf of Escoffery, 10 or 12 affidavits were given in to the same general effect, and so conclusive that they required no comment. Against Lecene's affidavits some evidence was relied on by the Duke of Manchester, as to which the learned gentleman declared his conviction of its falsity; and the Court of King's Bench, consisting of Mr. Scarlett, Mr. Mills, and Mr. West, upon the argument, ordered his discharge. On the occasion of the two individuals going up to seek their discharge they prepared to offer bail; they took with them six freeholders for that purpose, and Mr. Hall appeared as one of them. The Chief Justice said, that the court required no bail, for no offence had been committed. But what were the subsequent proceedings, despite of this decree of the court? In the House of Assembly, Mr. Hector Mitchell moved for a secret committee, which was granted. He was appointed chairman; Mr. Barnes was named next; and next the two advocates who had prosecuted for the crown. Now, what did this secret committee proceed to do?—to investigate this case—to examine into the truth of the statements? No; they did not call a single witness on behalf of those persons (hear, hear); they proceeded in a way that must disgust every hon. gent. who heard him, accustomed as we in England were to a pure administration of justice. The committee, however, made a report, in which they stated that having taken the examinations of several persons at Kingston, it appeared to them that an improper correspondence was kept up between some people of colour there and the emissaries of Boyer; and it was suggested that Lecene and Escoffery were very dangerous characters from the part they had taken in that correspondence. Another secret committee at the same time reported, in terms of the highest encomium, on the good dispositions and excellent conduct manifested by the whole black population of the island. On the 28th of November, the Duke issued his warrant for the deportation of these individuals; and he must say, that this order was executed with as much cruelty and severity, as it was in itself unjust and inhuman (hear, hear). And here he would ask, upon what principle of law it was, that after their discharge by order of the court of King's Bench, the reports of a secret committee, or examinations before the governor in council, in the case of these individuals or any others, were to overthrow the decrees of established courts of justice (hear), and to introduce a system of proceeding not only unconstitutional, but in itself abhorrent to every principle of rational justice. The learned gentleman then again adverted to the law of Jamaica, in respect of the privileged papers of free people of colour, contending that the Attorney-General of the island in either case—whether Lecene and Escoffery were British-born subjects or aliens—was in error, if he had recommended the measure of deportation, because the secret committee asserted that they proceeded on the evidence of a slave, as to the charge of Lecene and Escoffery's supplying arms. Now an act of parliament, it was well known, provided that a free man of colour might be prosecuted, convicted, and executed upon slave evidence. The Attorney-General would have had nothing to do therefore but prosecute in the usual manner upon slave evidence in this case. The learned gentleman after remarking on the enormous facility with which convictions could unhappily be obtained in Jamaica, and the avidity with which executions were looked for, stated what had been the sufferings of the two individuals he was speaking of, on their reaching St. Domingo, where they were disowned by the government, and even suspected, until they showed a report of the proceedings which had been had in court on their being brought up by habeas corpus. They were in Hayti compelled to sell their clothes and watches; and were only able to subsist, and provided with a passage to England, by the generous subscriptions of a few British merchants resident at Port-au-Prince. He proceeded to call the attention of the house to the conduct of Mr. Hector Mitchell towards the petitioners. He offered to two of their slaves 600 dollars to give evidence against their master, and threatened them, in case of their refusal, with punishment. He carried his threats into execution by committing one of them to prison for seven months, during the whole of which he was kept in a condemned cell, and was not suffered to leave it even for the purpose of taking a walk in an adjoining court. The other was kept in similar confinement for more than ten months, and when the Slave Court was held, both of them were discharged by proclamation: for by the slave law of Jamaica, a slave could be imprisoned six months, at the end of which time, if there was no prosecution against him, he was discharged by proclamation. The slaves who had suffered this cruel treatment had arrived in the course of the present week. He had examined them, and he was perfectly ready to produce them before a committee of the house, if the opportunity of doing so should be granted him. He was quite convinced that no man could see and hear them without being satisfied of their veracity. Another evidence he should have to submit was a poor Irish boy, who had been abandoned in the streets of Jamaica, where he was famishing and suffering under a bad fever, when he was found by one of the petitioners. This boy remained under his roof until the period of his deportation, when he attempted to accompany him; but being prevented, he worked his way to the place where he met his preserver. This boy, who was remarkably acute, he had also examined, and he would without fear submit his testimony to any scrutiny that might be thought fit. He felt himself now obliged to say, and he did so with considerable pain, that a very great portion of the blame in these transactions devolved upon the Duke of Manchester, who appeared not to have acted merely under the bad advice and the misrepresentations of others, but to have made himself a party in the cause. He had even gone so far as to make assertions which he had reason to believe were not founded in fact. He stated, that it had been proved beyond all doubt that the petitioners were aliens—an assertion which could not be true, because it was directly at variance with the decision of the Court of King's Bench and the evidence before the house. He concluded his despatch by saying that he should not have thought it necessary to make the details which it contained to their lordships, but that he had believed it was the intention of the petitioners to make some application to them. Could the Duke of Manchester imagine that it was not necessary for him to explain to the British Government the grounds upon which he had thought fit to transport two subjects of that government, at five minutes' notice, from the island of which they were natives, and to plunge them in almost total ruin? The report of Mr. Burge, the Attorney-General, upon which the Duke of Manchester relied, was, in many respects, wholly false (hear, hear). It was conveyed in such terms as he should have thought no man in his situation would have dared to use. He talked about "the difficulty of bringing before a court of justice evidence to prove the fact of the conspiracy which he had charged to have existed; because the persons who could give that evidence were either parties concerned and would not attend, or slaves whose evidence could not be received." This was false from beginning to end; for the former could have been compelled to give evidence and by statute law the evidence of the latter was directed to be received in all cases like this. He would, however, detain the house no longer with comments on these papers, every line of which provoked a comment. It was evident that by a gross abuse of power, and an utter disregard of the principles of justice, such as had been displayed upon the present occasion, the allegiance of the free coloured population of Jamaica must be alienated from the government; and the result could be no other than the total destruction of British power and property in the island. He concluded by moving for a select committee of inquiry.

Mr. W. Horton: He had in the first place to observe that his learned friend had not stated this case with his usual candour, because he had omitted to inform the house of a material fact. In a conversation with his learned friend, he had informed him that it was not upon the papers before the house that the case rested in any degree whatever. There was other evidence which it was not consistent with the duty of the Sec. of State to give out for general publication. Surely his learned friend ought to have stated this fact, although the coloring of the case had no doubt been improved by its suppression. He ought also to have stated that he (Mr. Horton) had consented to the appointment of a secret committee; before which alone the entire evidence could be laid, and which therefore gave the only means of redress to either party. As his learned friend had declined this course, he (Mr. Horton) could only undertake to defend the conduct of the Duke of Manchester;—the rest of the proceedings, it was impossible for him to enter into now. To proceed, he should pass by the topics which his learned friend had introduced into the beginning of his speech, respecting the condition of the free coloured people of Jamaica. It was enough for him to take things as he found them. The free coloured people of that island were under certain disqualifications, but that circumstance did not free them from their allegiance to government. The important question upon which this case turned was, whether a conspiracy existed against the government; and whether the petitioners were parties. This question could only be decided by the production of the evidence he had alluded to before a secret committee, because it was impossible for the house, or for any committee of the house to decide upon the conflicting testimony now upon the table. At the period to which the transactions referred, a strong feeling of alarm prevailed at Jamaica. If any body doubted the reasonable grounds of that alarm, he could refer them to a letter written by Mr. Samson and Mr. Scoller, the chairman and secretary of a committee of free coloured people, to Mr. Wilson, in London, in which they spoke of their "long endurance under an oppressive tyranny, which one energetic effort of their own would suffice to overthrow or destroy." Was it unreasonable to suspect people avowing these sentiments? With regard to the petitioners, the house of assembly and the council had reported, without a dissentient voice, that they were engaged in a treasonable conspiracy. What ought the Duke of Manchester, then, to have done with persons so dangerous—and how great would have been the responsibility he must have incurred, if he had acted otherwise? This course was sanctioned by the advice of all the officers of government in the Island; and although his learned friend had not scrupled to affect them with reproach, he was wholly at a loss to know upon what the charges his learned friend had brought against them were founded. The Attorney-General, whom his learned friend had charged, together with others, with having put into action that monstrous scene of iniquity he had detailed to the house, had always been acknowledged to be a person of ability and character. If the petitioners were innocent of the charges against them, there could be no doubt that they had been very hardly used, and that they were entitled to redress. But he must remind the house that the opportunity for obtaining this redress by means of a full examination before a secret committee of the house, had been offered, and till this was done, the opinion of the house must be suspended, because the facts of the case were not before it. If Mr. Hector Mitchell had been guilty of the atrocities laid to his charge, God forbid that he (Mr. Horton) should say one word in his justification: but to believe that he had done so, would be to believe that all the persons whose duty it was to watch over the administration of justice in Jamaica had neglected their duty in a most extraordinary manner. But whilst the charge of falsehood was thus copiously made against others, was all that the petitioners had stated true? They had said that they were never engaged in any illicit traffic with St. Domingo, and that they had never carried on treasonable correspondence—statements, the utter falsehood of which the evidence he had alluded to would establish, and prove the contrary, beyond a doubt. If the house were prepared to believe that the house of assembly and the council had conspired to falsify the evidence on the case of the petitioners, and that the Duke of Manchester had lent himself to aid their depopulation out of the country, then something like a case might be made out: until then, and he thought there was no present probability of any such event, the house must suspend its opinion. The evidence of which he was in possession was so satisfactory to his mind, and his knowledge of the private character and amiability of the Duke of Manchester was such, that he would not concur in any censure, implied or otherwise, which, upon grounds like those before the house, it might be attempted to pass upon him. He would never advocate the keeping back any evidence which was necessary for the ends of justice. He left it to the house, without hesitation, to decide whether the statement of his learned friend had established any thing like criminality against the Duke of Manchester (cheers).

Mr. Scarlett said, he thought the Duke of Manchester had been misled by the persons whose duty it was to advise him; and he understood the arguments of his learned friend to apply rather to those individuals than to the Duke. He had read the whole of the evidence attentively; he had been induced more particularly to do so, because a near relation of his own had sat in judgment on the subject. There were some circumstances in the evidence which excited strong suspicions in his mind. On the application for the habeas corpus, the strongest evidence against Lecesse was the affidavit of his sister Lucille, who swore that he was born at Port-au-Prince, Lecesse brought three persons to swear that Lucille told them she had been induced to swear to this, which she knew to be false, at the persuasion of a Mr. Villegreme, who told her if her brother were shipped off, as he would be, in consequence of her affidavit, she would become entitled to one half of her father's property; and threatened, if she did not make this affidavit, that she should be imprisoned. Now, although the court had in the first instance granted a rule to show cause, no attempt had ever been made, either by Lucille Lecesse, or by Mr. Villegreme, to contradict the very heavy statements which were made against them. While this imputation of Mr. Villegreme's having suborned perjury against the petitioners remained, he should suspect whatever came from the same source. The learned gentleman sat down by contending, that, whatever objection might exist to producing the evidence as to the sedition, there could be no mischief in publishing that, if there were any, which related to the question of alienage. It was impossible for the house to pay too much attention to appeals of a description like the present; as it was well known that, in the colonial assemblies, the coloured population was far from meeting with any thing like liberal consideration.

Mr. Canning said, that however he might have been disposed to prefer the course suggested by his hon. friend (Mr. W. Horton), he should not now oppose the appointment of a select committee. The short question upon the present charge, as it applied to the conduct of the Duke of Manchester, was, whether the Duke had or had not treated British subjects as aliens; that was a simple question, and one easily capable of proof, but one which certainly was neither proved nor disproved by the evidence before the house: in one admission, however, all parties must agree—that when the Duke of Manchester came forward, offering to waive the privilege which his absence gave him, and submit to clear his conduct by a trial by law, he entitled himself, so long as the question was pending, to a suspension of opinion as to his conduct. The learned member (Mr. Scarlett) observed, that if the Duke of Manchester had done wrong, he had probably been misled. In this opinion he entirely concurred; but it was yet to be shown that the Duke, in what he had done, had exceeded his authority: and that he himself entertained no apprehension as to the result of his conduct, was at least to be presumed from the readiness with which he courted inquiry into it. The main feature in the case then came out to be considered—to wit, what there had been in the conduct of other persons apart from that of the Duke of Manchester, which afforded grounds for complaint; and upon that point he was free to say that Government had at least so far thought there was ground for investigation, that the commissioners in the West Indies had received instructions (and in about a month, hence they would be in Jamaica) to examine into all the circumstances, and report generally upon the transaction. In this situation, therefore, he was not prepared to deny that further elucidation upon the subject was due to the satisfaction of the house; but if the motion of the learned member for a committee were agreed to, it ought in fairness to be understood that the Duke of Manchester's offer with respect to a trial at law ought not to be taken advantage of. It was farther to be recollected, that at so late a period of the session, and considering the distance from which all evidence would have to be obtained, no committee could be appointed with any advantage until next year. If it were agreed to defer the committee until next session, the report of the commissioners, and all other necessary evidence could be procured in the meantime, and there would be no difficulty then in instituting an inquiry as ample as the learned member could desire.

Mr. Brougham rose to request his learned friend to accede to the proposition of rt. hon. gent. opposite, which he thought, the state of the session considered, was the best calculated to do substantial justice. As the evidence stood, the transaction was a most iniquitous one, and he totally differed from the rt. hon. gent. as to the view which he took of the conduct of the Duke of Manchester. These three points would have to be made out—first, that there had been proof that the complainants were aliens; secondly, that there had been the sedition imputed; and thirdly, that there had been ground for sending them away without being heard in their defence. Now, as the case stood, it was nonsense to talk of conflicting evidence; the proof of the birth was as clear as could be desired. What might arise out of the papers further to be produced, he could not judge; but the matter stood as he described it at present. With reference to the postponement of the committee he would farther just observe, that there were two witnesses whom it would be necessary to produce, and who had been in England some time. Those persons had hitherto been supported by the charitable contributions of individuals; but certainly, as this delay was to take place, some means of existence ought to be afforded them by Parliament. For the other point to which the rt. hon. gent. opposite had adverted—the abstaining (an inquiry was to take place in a committee) from any proceeding at law—he agreed that such an arrangement would be most convenient; but it must depend upon the consent of the complainants concerned.

Mr. Canning objected to one of the suggestions of the learned gent. on account of the bad example it would set if the guilty accusers of an innocent man were to be supported by the public money.

Dr. Lushington, in reply, called upon the house to consider the condition of the injured parties, and what they were exposed to, in their destitute condition, by this new delay. He was ready to adopt the proposal of the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning) for appointing a committee next session; but he did that in the reliance of every facility being afforded for the obtaining and production of evidence. For the sentiments which had been expressed in a pamphlet, written upon the question (by the hon. member for Chippenhams)—for such sentiments as would deny men justice on account of a prejudice against their colour, he thought they could excite no feelings in the mind of any civilized being but those of disgust and unmitigated contempt.

Mr. Grossett said, that whatever contempt the learned member might feel for his opinion was fully equalled by that with which he looked at that of the hon. and learned member. He denied that he had ever felt any dislike or hostility to the welfare of the people of colour.

The postponement of the committee was then agreed to without a division.

*Mr. Shrewsbury's Case.**

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.—Mr. F. Burton rose to call the attention of the house to the case of Mr. Shrewsbury, a minister of the Wesleyan Society, who was engaged in their mission in the West Indies. It would, he said, be his duty to confine himself very much to a matter of fact detail; to give a plain, dry, abstemious narrative of the events, in the order in which they occurred, leaving those events to speak for themselves—as they did indeed, pretty loudly. Mr. Shrewsbury was, for some time, a Methodist minister in England; and conducted himself entirely to the satisfaction of those with whom he was connected. In the year 1816, he was sent as a Missionary to Tortola. He remained there two years; and, on his departure, Mr. Porter, then Senior Member of Council, now President of the Island, presented him with this testimony:—"I do hereby certify, that the Rev. William Shrewsbury, a preacher in the Wesleyan connexion, resided in this Island for about two years: during which time, his conduct was such as entitled him to the respect of this community."

"Tortola, April 7, 1818."

In 1818, Mr. Shrewsbury went to Grenada. After he had been there somewhat more than a year, he applied to the Governor, Major-General Rial, for his private subscription towards the erection of an enlarged chapel. The Governor's answer, sent through the hands of his Secretary, Col. Wilson, contained a check for 60*l.*, the Governor's donation, and 10*l.*, the donation of Col. Wilson; and concluded with these words:—"In making this communication to you, I am likewise desirous to convey to you his Excellency's approbation of your general conduct, during the time you have resided in this Government; and particularly of the mild and temperate manner which has marked the exercise of your religious duties."

"J. WILSON, Lieut-Col. Secretary."

Mr. Ross, of Clarke's Court, Grenada,—thou whom, he (Mr. Buxton) understood, there was not a more respectable man in the West Indies—the proprietor of one large estate, the manager of twelve others, and having under his superintendence a body of between two and three thousand negroes, having daily opportunities of witnessing Mr. Shrewsbury's conduct while in that Island, thus wrote of him, in a private letter, at the time:—"Mr. Shrewsbury is a superior man, who would do honour to any Church or Society of Christians." This same Mr. Ross happened to be in England, when the news arrived of the disturbances in Barbadoes, and he had the generosity to write this testimony:—"Having had an opportunity of becoming intimately acquainted with Mr. Shrewsbury during his residence in Grenada, whence he went to Barbadoes, I can with great truth testify, that I never knew a more pious or a better man. Possessed of a natural cheerfulness of temper, and without any thing of austerity or moroseness in his manners, he discharged the duties of his profession with zeal and assiduity, and acquired the good-will and esteem of the whole community; and it was to the great regret of all who knew him, that he was taken from us. I believe Mr. Shrewsbury to be incapable of doing an injury to any human being; and I am convinced he was eminently useful as a Christian minister, both among the free people and the slaves, in the Island of Grenada." Mr. Shrewsbury had devoted himself labouriously to the improvement of the negroes, and with the best effects. Instruction was gaining ground; marriages became more frequent; the marriage tie was held more sacred; a more orderly and moral deportment was observed among the negroes; and, in short, many of those changes so much desired by the house—so ardently looked forward to by the people of England—but not more ardently, he felt it but justice to say, than by many benevolent and respectable planters, followed his ministry. But, while he had devoted himself to the improvement of the negroes, he had won the confidence and esteem of the planters; and left the Island with the love of the slaves, the approbation of the masters, and universal testimonies of regret at his departure. In 1820, Mr. Shrewsbury went to Barbadoes, where a spirit of fierce religious persecution had long prevailed. The papers laid on the table of the house, in 1802 and 1805, gave a painful demonstration that it existed then: and it would appear but too clearly, before he sat down, that the same spirit prevailed, or rather raged, at the present moment. The Mission there required a man possessing great, but opposite qualities—great prudence, or he would do too much in the eyes of the planters—great zeal, or he would do too little for the slaves—great fortitude, a deep impression in his own heart, of the paramount importance of the duties he had to discharge:—without these, he would assuredly have been crushed by the opposition he was certain to encounter. But withal, that mission required a man of a meek, quiet, uncontentious spirit—calculated, by his gentleness, to subdue and soften those unfortunate jealousies and prejudices. These were Mr. Shrewsbury's qualifications; and, besides, it happened, most fortunately, that he was married to the daughter of a West India planter; and thus, in some degree, linked to the West-India interest. He was any thing rather than a warm partizan of the Abolitionists. Although he was subsequently accused of being an agent of the "villainous African Society," and particularly of corresponding with him (Mr. Buxton); and he understood, that persons in the West Indies, who ought to be respectable, had asserted, that they had seen letters which had passed between them. To this, he (Mr. B.) answered, that he never received or wrote a letter to Mr. Shrewsbury in his life—that he did not know that such a man existed, until he happened to take up a newspaper, and there read, with some astonishment, that he was going to be hanged for corresponding with him. It might here be as well to state—it might allay jealousies—that with the Missionaries in the West-Indies—Church of England, Wesleyan, Moravian, or London Society—he had had no communication. Indeed, he was told by one of the heads of those Societies in England, that though they agreed with him in their feelings about slavery, yet, standing in a peculiar situation, and trusted with the confidence of many of the planters, they did not feel justified in furnishing him with any calumnious intelligence. He blamed them for this. They ought to have told the truth, whether it made for or against the system. But, it was hard that they should be blamed by him and his friends for saying nothing, and by other parties, for saying a great deal too much. But, to proceed. In this peculiar predicament, and wanting a man of such peculiar qualifications, the Wesleyan Missionary Society selected Mr. Shrewsbury. During the whole time he remained in Barbadoes, he justified their choice—exhibiting the same moderation, forbearance, discretion, abstinence from all political interference, which becomes a minister of religion at all times and in all countries, but which are indispensable in a minister of the Gospel, placed in circumstances so difficult, and having to tread so narrow a path, as that which was chalked out for a pastor of slaves in a society of planters. He should be able to shew, by indisputable documents—such as satisfied the Governor of St. Vincent, with whom Mr. Shrewsbury found an asylum, and who was bound to ascertain his innocence, before he permitted him to preach in his government—that, during the whole time he exercised his ministry in Barbadoes, he exercised the same discretion, and forbearance, and silence upon slavery; and preached nothing to the negroes, but obedience and fidelity to their masters. But, this point would not be disputed. He said so confidently; because Mr. Shrewsbury's enemies had ransacked his life, private and public, in order to find some excuse for their cruelty towards him. They had found nothing: and he stood delivered over to universal execration, and under sentence of banishment—but uncharged with any offence in his conduct, his conversation, and his doctrine. In Feb. 1820, Mr. Shrewsbury went to Barbadoes. In the March following, he wrote home, as he was required to do by the rules of his Society, stating the condition in which he found his congregation. A painful description no doubt it was, and must have been, if he spoke the truth; but, in that letter there was nothing harsh, exaggerated, or sarcastic. Now, it might be said, and probably, as the Under Sec. for the Colonial Department had nothing else to say, he might maintain, either that that letter ought not to have been required from him—or, being required, he ought not to have sent it—or, being sent, it ought not to have been published. That was a doctrine which could be maintained by no member of the house; but, least of all, by the hon. Sec. for it so happened, that Lord Bathurst, the whole body of the Clergy in the West Indies, and that house, had done precisely the same thing. In 1816, Lord Bathurst addressed a circular to all the Clergy in the West Indies, requesting to know the moral and religious condition of the negroes. The Clergy sent their answers—true, no doubt; but containing statements infinitely more affronting to the planters, and more mournful to every friend of humanity, than any thing to be found in Mr. Shrewsbury's letter; and these answers were published by the house. In point of fact, however, this letter had nothing to do with subsequent events. It was not heard of in the colony for three years, even by Mr. Shrewsbury; and was only raked up at last, when an excuse was wanted for a persecution. Mr. Shrewsbury remained in the Island three years and three quarters. During the first three years and a half, he had to endure the common lot of a Methodist Missionary—some persecution, or, if that were too hard a term, some annoyance, some detraction, some bitterness of spirit, evincing itself in petty insults. For example: some of the gentry of Barbadoes felt it to be their duty to walk into his chapel on Sunday, during the time of service, with their hats on, whistling a tune, and keeping time to their own music, by drumming against the benches. In short, something of that little, pitiful, spiteful ignominious warfare, with which men of paltry minds love to vex those whose stricter lives are a comment and a reproach upon their own. But for these slight insults Mr. Shrewsbury had full compensation, in an increasing and improving congregation—in a very large school for mulatto and negro children—in the favour of several respectable planters—and in the approbation of the Clergy. In June 1823, a fiercer spirit of persecution arose. Mr. Shrewsbury was publicly accused in the streets, in open day, as a villain; and this, as he said, not by the mere rabble, but by the great vulgar—merchants from their stores, and individuals in the garb of gentlemen. He was assailed in the newspapers, under the name of “Mister Rascall,” and his antagonists were under the necessity of bearing testimony to the purity of his conduct. “Look at his actions,” they said; “hear his sermons, and you would say the man is a saint!”—“Observe him, hear him; but, under this garb of sanctity, by his praying, preaching, and teaching, he is undermining the West-India interest; and is very little better than an enemy of slavery.” He bore this, as his religion taught him to bear it, with the utmost humility. “He was as a deaf man, that heard not,” was his own true description of his behaviour. On Sunday, Oct. 5, 1823, riot the first took place. A large concourse of persons assembled round the chapel, for the avowed purpose of disturbing the congregation. They came provided with a number of thin bottles, filled with oil, assafoetida, and aquafortis, prepared, as there was every reason to think, at the shop of one of the magistrates, who was a chemist and druggist. These bottles were suddenly discharged into the midst of a congregation of some hundreds of females. One of them was aimed at Mr. Shrewsbury’s head, and narrowly missed its mark, but wounded another man. A second was wounded in the shoulder; and one of the bottles discharging its contents on the bosom of a mulatto female, burnt her severely. A lawyer, Mr. Newsome, chose his decorous station on the railing of the communion table, and cheered and encouraged the rioters. Two sons of the magistrate and chemist were seen conspicuously active. Upon this discharge, the utmost confusion arose. The females were greatly alarmed; and, in point of fact, one-third of the congregation ran away. The preacher retired into the vestry, in order to protect his wife, who was near her confinement. Having placed her in security, he began to shew somewhat of the manliness of his character. He returned to the chapel, reascended the pulpit, and, amidst the rattling of stones without and almost suffocating heat within, the windows being closed, resumed and concluded the service. The next day, he offered a reward of thirty pounds for the detection of any of the rioters; but no one came forward to give evidence; and he soon found, that the interruption met with general approbation. Passing by the shop of a considerable merchant, where a number of gentlemen were collected, he was assailed by such remarks as these—“Serve the fellow right.” “They ought to have gone and pulled the fellow from the pulpit.” And a magistrate, who was also senior member of the council, told a person of credit, that “If a sufficient number would join him, he would go and pull down the chapel at noon-day.” The name of this magistrate was Mr. Haines. He mentioned it, not only to do him honour, but for the purpose of remarking, that persons in a higher station of life were the real instigators of the events which followed; and for the purpose also of stating, that this same Mr. Haines continued a magistrate, and, as a magistrate, was the protector of the negroes, the dispenser of justice to the mulattoes, and the guardian of the public peace. On the Wednesday evening, Mr. Shrewsbury had his usual week-day service, and experienced somewhat of the same kind of disturbance; but not to the same extent. On the Friday, which was kept in Barbadoes as a fast-day, in commemoration of the great storm of 1780, the good joke which he heard from all quarters was, “While you are preaching of the storm within doors, you shall have a storm without.” On Sunday, Oct. 12th, while he was preparing for service, one of his congregation came to him privately, and stated, that something desperate was intended that day. He, however, determined to proceed. He went down to the chapel; what he saw, should be told in his own words:—“As I came down from the dwelling-house, and entered the side door of the chapel, the sight was really intimidating. Without the chapel; and throughout the whole length of the street, there was an immense concourse of people, some breathing out threatenings and slaughter; and others merely lookers-on: within the chapel, besides a fine congregation of my regular and serious hearers, there were planted all around the pulpit, and by the pulpit stairs, from 20 to 30 of the gentlemen-mob, apparently ready for any mischief, when those without should make a beginning. Just as we arose from prayer, two men, wearing masks, and having swords and pistols, came galloping down the street; and, presenting their pistols opposite the door, they fired; but only one pistol went off, and that discharged its contents, not within the door amongst the congregation, but without, beside the window, so that the men planted round the pulpit were completely disappointed: for it seems the design was to have fired crackers amongst the females, to set their clothes on fire; when advantage would have been taken of the confusion, to have wreaked their vengeance on me.” It so happened, that two officers were at the chapel that evening, and their servants were holding their horses outside. These men, having none of the feelings of true Barbadians, but feeling as every Englishman would feel under such circumstances, pursued the authors of the outrage and put them to flight. This attack disconcerted the intention of the rioters, and possibly saved the life of the Missionary. Tranquillity was restored; and Mr. Shrewsbury finished the service. In this mob there was not a negro—not a mulatto. It consisted of planters, merchants, and traders. If the population were divided into four parts—they would form the second and third—neither the very highest nor the very lowest. On Wednesday, the 15th, Mr. Shrewsbury determined to hold his usual service; but so large a concourse of persons assembled, and their conduct and language were so alarming, that he was glad to escape to the house of a relation; and he never afterwards returned. To shew how planned and organized the whole thing was, a party of gentlemen galloped down from the race-ground at seven o'clock, drew up in front of the chapel, and seeing the windows and doors closed, cried out, "the coward has fled; the coward has run away;" and retired, amid the plaudits of the mob. The next day Mr. Shrewsbury waited on the Governor; and as there was some slight immaterial difference between the report of the Governor and of Mr. Shrewsbury, as to what took place at that interview, he should follow the version of the Governor in all points in which they differed. After introducing himself, Mr. Shrewsbury said, "My congregation are not suffered to worship God in peace." The Governor advised him to apply to the magistrates: Mr. Shrewsbury said, "There can be no use in applying to the magistrates; they are among the bitterest of my enemies; and nothing can prove it more than this: three years and a half have I been in the colony, I have never been summoned to serve in the militia, but now that the mob are bearing me down, the magistrate, instead of affording me protection, summons me to a meeting, where he knows that if I appear I shall lose my life." Mr. Shrewsbury retired, saying, "In applying to your Excellency I have done my duty; I can do no more." But the Governor, it seemed, still thought that he would apply to the magistrates. That was his apology, and let it pass for an apology. He (Mr. B.), understood that the Governor was a very respectable man, and wished to perform his duty; but he was placed in circumstances in which any man might be embarrassed and overawed. Besides, he was very unpopular at that time; and the cause of his unpopularity was remarkable. A planter, named Best, had, a short time previously, flogged a negro to death. He absconded, and a reward was offered for his apprehension. Another planter seeing a woman plucking a few handfuls of guinea-grass, fired at her. The ball lodged in her back, and she died. He left the island, and a reward was offered for his apprehension. A white man was found dead in a wood. He was a man of dissolute and drunken habits; and the Governor, thinking he had fallen a victim to his own intemperance, offered no reward for the apprehension of the murderers; upon the very intelligible ground that he did not think a murder had been committed. This gave great offence. It was said, "Here is notorious partiality—a slave or two are unfortunately killed, and a reward is offered; but now one of our own body, a white man, is found dead, and no reward is offered for the perpetrators of his death"—the perpetrator being in all probability the rum-bottle. The Governor was unpopular—he could do nothing; at least he thought so. He treated Mr. Shrewsbury very kindly; he said, "I am extremely sorry for you—I wish you well—I have been abused more than any man in the colony—and the arm of protection extended to you would be represented as an arbitrary act." Mr. Shrewsbury did not apply to the magistrates; and as this was the only occasion in which there was any pretext for charging him even with an error of judgment, he, (Mr. B.) would inquire, whether he ought to have applied to the magistrates. To which of them should he have gone? To Mr. Haines, who said he would lead the way, and pull down the chapel at noon-day? To Mr. Moore, who summoned him to answer, for not having enrolled himself in the militia, before the court, where to appear was to perish? To the magistrate at whose shop the bottles were prepared? To Mr. Newsome, the lawyer, or to Mr. Walton, jun. of whom he would say something presently? To address himself to these was to address himself to the bitterest of his enemies. Nor would it be believed that those magistrates, who did not interfere when the rioters were in action, would have interfered, from the mere rumour of a riot, coming from so suspicious and obnoxious a quarter as Mr. Shrewsbury. But Mr. Shrewsbury did seek council and assistance; and he sought it in a remarkable quarter. This fierce sectarian, plotting the destruction of the church, and living in bitter enmity with its professors, went to a clergyman, whose kindness then displayed to a poor friendless missionary, hunted for his life by an infuriated mob, he, (Mr. B.) would now return—by concealing his name; knowing, that if he were to mention it with approbation, the fate of Mr. Austin of Demerara would await him. Mr. Austin, for the most noble act which had been done in our days, was a ruined and a banished man; and he spared the name of the other, in order to spare him—the honour, indeed, but—the sufferings of martyrdom. The clergyman advised Mr. Shrewsbury to apply to the Council—observe, he did not recommend an application to the magistrates, he knew them—and, in the interim, he recommended that the chapel should be closed. Mr. Shrewsbury, in both particulars, followed his advice, though somewhat contrary to his own judgment. He was rather disposed to brave the storm. He determined to apply to the Council, which was to meet in the ensuing week; and the next Sunday his chapel was closed, and he, with as many of his congregation as he could collect, attended the Established Church. Had matters stopped there, it would have furnished the most perfect sample of intolerance, save the sister case in Demerara, which had been exhibited for many a day, in any part of the British dominions. Had it stopped there, it would have deserved, indeed, the name only of a riot, but a riot of the worst spirit; and, considering where it was—in the heart of a negro population; when it was—at the moment when the minds of the negroes were agitated by rumours of conceded liberty—a riot of the most dangerous kind. But subsequent events cast all these transactions into the shade. Hereafter it assumed a new form, and exhibited a contempt of law, a defiance of authority, which changed the name and character of the transaction. On Friday, the 17th, a secret committee had met, and issued a circular, which, for distinction's sake, he would call "proclamation the first." It stated, that the gentry and inhabitants of Barbadoes had determined to meet, on the following Sunday, for the purpose of pulling down the Methodist chapel; and it invited the person to whom it was addressed, to appear in his place, properly provided. The proclamation had its effect. They met. There was not a negro amongst them—there was one mulatto, and only one. To shew the feelings of the coloured population, on whom the safety of the colony, in a great measure, rested, and to offend whom, was to risk the safety of the island, it was only necessary to state, that though they behaved with the most perfect propriety, had never repelled force by force, or outrage by outrage; yet so sensibly had they felt this insult, that no one of them had held any intercourse, or exchanged a single syllable with that man of their number, who joined the rioters. These consisted of whites, and were headed by persons of influence. The mob consisted, said the Governor, "of an immense concourse of persons." It consisted, said an eye-witness, a planter, an enemy of Mr. Shrewsbury, of "a thousand head-strong fools." Mr. Shrewsbury, with that indisposition to exaggerate, which had marked all his communications with him, (Mr. B.) said that he thought the numbers had been exaggerated—that they did not exceed four or five hundred; part of whom came provided with implements to pull down the chapel, and part armed with swords to resist the military. That they were thus armed, he stated; first, on the authority of Mr. Shrewsbury; but, secondly, on the better authority of the planter already alluded to, who said, "I am just returned from witnessing the effects of an infuriated mob of head-strong fools, so desperate that they had determined to resist the military." And the Governor put it out of all question, by saying, "the chapel was pulled down by an immense concourse of persons, many of whom were armed." They broke open the windows and doors of the chapel, destroyed the benches, pews, and pulpit, and tore and trod under foot, a large collection of bibles and tracts, intended for the use of the negroes and the school. They then stormed the dwelling-house, destroyed every article of furniture, chopped in pieces the tables and the chairs, unroofed the house, and, making a flag of his lien, which they had collected, waved it in the air three times, gave three cheers, and, it being now twelve o'clock at night, and they having been occupied laboriously for five hours, they adjourned until seven o'clock the next evening. At that time they met, according to appointment, in the same number, with the same spirit, with the same discipline, and completed the demolition of the chapel. "High-handed work," said the editor of a colonial paper—"High-handed work" he headed his article—"The Methodist chapel in Bridge-town has shared the fate of the temple of Jerusalem—not one stone is left upon another." The victory being thus obtained, nothing remained but to announce it in due form. And accordingly, announced it was the next day, in these terms:—

"Great and signal Triumph over Methodism, and total Destruction of the Chapel!!!

"The inhabitants of this island are respectfully informed, that, in consequence of the unmerited and unprovoked attacks which have been repeatedly made upon the community by the Methodist Missionaries (otherwise known as agents to the villainous African Society), a party of respectable gentlemen formed the resolution of closing the Methodist concern altogether; with this view they commenced their labours on Sunday evening; and they have the greatest satisfaction in announcing, that by twelve o'clock last night they effected the total destruction of the chapel. To this information they have to add, that the Missionary made his escape yesterday afternoon, in a small vessel for St. Vincent; thereby avoiding that expression of the public feeling towards him, personally, which he had so richly deserved. It is to be hoped, that, as this information will be circulated throughout the different islands and colonies, all persons who consider themselves true lovers of religion will follow the laudable example of the Barbadians, in putting an end to Methodism and Methodist Chapels throughout the West Indies."

The next day the Governor issued his proclamation, offering a reward for the detection of the rioters; but the entreating, almost supplicating language, in which it was couched, clearly proved that the mob were masters. The real tenor of it was, "Pray, gentlemen, recollect yourselves. If you are pleased thus to pull down the houses and chapels of the teachers of the negroes, who can tell but that the negroes may follow the example, and pull down your houses?" Having thus, as he hoped, seduced the more respectable into a belief, that, upon the whole, it were as well, for the sake of example, not to pull down innocent men's houses, he ventured to offer a reward for the apprehension of the offenders, and ended in the usual form, "God save the King!" The next day the rioters put forth a counter-proclamation, mimicking that of the Governor, beginning, "Whereas," &c. and ending "God save the King and the people." But, if they mimicked the form, they by no means attempted to imitate the very humble strain in which the Governor's proclamation was couched. Bold defiance of the law—vengeance, desperate retaliation against any who might dare to inform—a boast, that they had done the deed, and would do it again, if opportunity occurred—a boast, that perjury would protect them, was the bold tenor of proclamation the third. It ran thus:—

"Whereas a proclamation having appeared, &c. &c., public notice is hereby given to such person or persons who may feel inclined, either from pecuniary temptation or vindictive feeling, that should they attempt to come forward to injure, in any shape, any individual, they shall receive that punishment which their crime will justly deserve. They are to understand, that to impeach is not to convict, and that the reward offered will only be given upon conviction; which cannot be effected whilst the people are firm to themselves. And whereas, it may appear to those persons who are unacquainted with the circumstances which occasioned the said proclamation, that the demolition of the chapel was effected by the rabble of this community, in order to create anarchy, riot, and insubordination, to trample upon the laws of the country, and to subvert good order: It is considered an imperative duty to repel the charge, and to state; firstly, that the majority of the persons assembled were of the first respectability, and were supported by the concurrence of nine-tenths of the community; secondly, that their motives were patriotic and loyal, namely, to eradicate from this soil the germ of Methodism, which was spreading its baneful influence over a certain class, and which ultimately would have injured both church and state. With this view the chapel was demolished, and the villanous preacher, who headed it and belied us, was compelled, by a speedy flight, to remove himself from the island. With a fixed determination, therefore, to put an end to Methodism in this island, all Methodist preachers are warned not to approach our shores; as, if they do, it will be at their own peril. God save the King and the People."

When the governor saw this proclamation, he asked the council what he should do? and they answered, "Nothing at all!"—and, nothing had been done.—To return to Mr. Shrewsbury:—He had retired, on the Wednesday, to the house of a relative. On the Sunday evening he received information, that the mob declared; that as soon as they had finished the chapel, they would proceed to the house of his relation, search it, and, if they found him, hang him. Having no reason to doubt that they would be as good as their word, he retired to a house at a short distance from the town, and nearer the sea. His wife, who was not in a condition to move, was concealed in the hut of a negro. In the middle of the night some horsemen galloped up to the house which he had left, crying out, "Down with the Methodists! Down with all the Methodists!" But no attack was made. The next morning Mr. Shrewsbury received communications from many of his friends, all saying, "leave the island without a moment's delay; no man's life was ever in greater danger; the rioters are in search of you; and if they catch you, will undoubtedly put you to death." Upon this intelligence, taking his wife with him, little as she was in a condition to move, he embarked on board a small vessel, and sailed for St. Vincent's. In the passage his wife was taken ill, and was delivered shortly after her arrival at St. Vincent's. And here he (Mr. B.) must observe, that a sense of his wrongs and of his innocence—the loss of every shilling of his property—the destruction of his chapel—the extermination of his mission—it would, he repeated, have been but human nature, if these bitter recollections, rushing upon his mind, at the moment of his leaving, had driven him, as oppression driveth a wise man mad, so far to forget himself, as to pour forth execrations upon the head of his tormentors. He did write a letter; and, such a letter!—not an angry word in it; not a complaint—not an unmanly lamentation—no attempt to stir up the passions of the negroes. He just glances at his sudden departure, and then leaves that irritating topic. This is part of the letter:—

"Be patient towards all men. Never speak disrespectfully of any in authority, nor revilingly of any one who injures you. Whatever you are called to suffer, I beseech you to take it patiently. In general, it will be best for you to be wholly silent. From the affection you bear towards me, you will, perhaps, find it difficult to refrain when you hear me spoken against: but your wisest plan will be to hold your peace, for you would be in great danger of speaking with undue warmth, were you to undertake to defend my character. You that are slaves will, I hope, be exceedingly careful 'to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.' Let no slave who is a Methodist be dishonest, or lazy, or impertinent either in speech or behaviour: but let every one be sober, honest, industrious, and useful to his owner, even as we have taught you both in public and in private, from day to day. And as to political matters, whether ye be bond or free, never meddle with them; but mind higher and better things, the things relating to God and eternity. Never speak slightly of the regular clergy. In this respect imitate the example I set you while I dwelt among you."—On Mr. Shrewsbury's arrival at St. Vincent's, he applied to the Governor, who received him very kindly, but told him, that he considered him as coming under circumstances of suspicion, and that he must suspend him from the exercise of his clerical duties for the present. In consequence, Mr. Rayner, another missionary, went to Barbadoes, in order to collect testimonials. And this gave a new opportunity for exhibiting the spirit which prevailed there. He was not permitted to land. He learnt, at one time, that it was proposed to burn the vessel; at another, that boats were to be manned from the shore, to drag him from the vessel, and put him to death. And Mr. Walton, jun., then, but not now, a magistrate; for he met with an unfortunate accident: he was one night caught in company with Mr. Newsome, the lawyer, in the act of breaking the windows of a bearer of the Methodists, and, in consequence, ceased to be a magistrate.—Mr. Walton came on board the vessel, and gave them a second edition of the proclamation. He warned Mr. Rayner to be gone in four-and-twenty hours, or he must take the consequences. So alarmed was the captain, that he removed from Carlisle Bay, where he had anchored under the guns of a ship of war, and the officers of the vessel went on shore. They waited upon those persons of respectability, who had known most of Mr. Shrewsbury, but such was the terror that prevailed, that many of them refused to give testimonials, saying, their lives would be in danger. Others did give some, but in fear and trembling, and under a pledge of the concealment of their names. These testimonials, nine in number, were exactly what one would have expected. "I solemnly declare," said the first, "that I never heard Mr. Shrewsbury utter one word, tending to insubordination." "As to the negroes," said the second, "he was always particular in teaching them their duty to their masters, as part of their duty to God." They all ran in the same strain. With these testimonials Mr. Rayner returned to St. Vincent, and delivered them to the Governor. So satisfied was he with them, that within an hour Mr. Shrewsbury received a letter from him, stating, that he was at liberty to preach in any part of his government; and he preached accordingly the next day. Mr. Shrewsbury remained for some time in that island, but was now in England. At Barbadoes the ferment continued. They had then time to refer to the paragraph in their second proclamation: "It is hoped, that as this information will be circulated throughout the different islands and colonies, all persons who consider themselves true lovers of religion will follow the laudable example of the Barbadians, in putting an end to Methodism, and Methodist chapels, throughout the West India." And, accordingly, they sent a deputation, consisting of from eight to ten persons, to the neighbouring islands, in order to induce them to follow the laudable example of Barbadoes, and pull down the chapels. This commission landed at Tobago, stated their object, and the Governor ordered them to be gone in an hour. They landed at Trinidad, the Governor ordered them off in five minutes, and, at Grenada, they met with a still more inhospitable reception. The governor sent a body of soldiers to take them into custody, if they landed. They returned, therefore, to Barbadoes, from a very unsuccessful embassy. In that island things remained very much in the same state. They determined to celebrate the anniversary of the demolition of the chapel, by a similar outrage. The particulars were contained in the Governor's despatch, dated Dec. 2d, 1824.—"It was intended and proclaimed most publicly to meet in honour of the anniversary of the destruction of the Methodist chapel, and to pull down a house belonging to a coloured Methodist woman, who held meetings in her house; in consequence of which I ordered the whole of the military, town-militia, and life-guards, to be prepared and under arms on the evening of the day so proclaimed, and the magistrates to assemble near the spot before dark." It was "proclaimed most publicly;" and the house would like to hear the terms of the proclamation. It beat all the others. It stated, that the actors in the former scene had formed themselves into "a Committee of Public Safety;" that they had taken the name of "the Worthy." It invited the Worthy to meet "in love and harmony," on the 19th of October, and after dinner to proceed to pull down a house, "where Methodism began again to rear its hideous head." The Worthy were enjoined to come armed, that in case "any of the pest should resist, they might be sent to sleep with their forefathers." They were animated to their enterprize by the memory of the former 19th of October, "a day more dear to true Barbadians than Trafalgar to Britons." The whole concluded with a solemn oath to extirpate Methodism from the island "by fire and sword. So help us our God! (Signed) Rock."—The Governor, however, was upon the alert. He ordered out the military; and the 19th of October passed ingloriously. But the spirit of persecution was not extinct. In April last, the Missionary Society sent some of their number to Barbadoes to rebuild the chapel, with the concurrence of Lord Bathurst, and of the hon. Sec. (Mr. W. Horton), as appeared in the Barbadoes newspapers; but they were not permitted to land. Lord Bathurst's attempt to afford protection to the Methodists was described as the most "unlooked-for, uncalled-for, absurd, and dangerous measure, ever contemplated by a British minister." It was said that "the genius of Puritanism had spread its malign influence over the whole cabinet." However, he (Mr. Buxton) made light of all this. He rated it all as nonsense and idle gossip. But there was a fact stated to which he attached importance. It was stated, that the House of Assembly, who, he it remembered, had never stirred a step to bring the rioters to justice, had moved at last, and ordered a prosecution against a Methodist woman, who had devoted herself, most virtuously, to the instruction of the negroes, for the crime of holding religious meetings. The paragraph stated, that "the House of Assembly had ordered a prosecution to be instituted against a mulatto woman, for holding public meetings of this description; whilst his Excellency the Governor, in compliance with Earl Bathurst's instructions, had issued a second circular to the magistrates, calling upon them to afford every protection in their power, even aided by the military, to the reverend vagabonds above alluded to, which had a very portentous meaning, and which might God in his infinite mercy avert!" Now, could any thing exceed the effrontery of all this? Was there ever such a train and cluster of enormities? Looked at, in one view, it was religious intolerance, at its highest point of phrenzy; fire and faggot persecution. Looked at in another, it was unblushing contempt of authority, defiance of law, a triumph not merely over Methodism—that many gentlemen would approve—but a triumph over the Governor there, over parliament, and over the feeling of the people of England. He defied any lawyer to deny, that overt acts of rebellion had been committed. The people were invited to attend a meeting to pull down a chapel. They met, and pulled down the chapel—armed to resist the military, and to send any of the "pest" who might interfere "to sleep with their forefathers." Proclamation after proclamation was issued, full of defiance to legitimate authority, breathing the spirit of revolt, or rather of triumphant and predominant rebellion. Embassies were sent forth; ambassadors of persecution, to stir up the embers of civil commotion and religious discord in the neighbouring islands. A committee of public safety, on the French plan, was appointed. Captain Rock, on the Irish model, signed the manifesto. Unoffending men, bearing the passport and safe conduct of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, were not permitted to land in them. And, so little of penitence was there, that the day of Mr. Burewsbury's sufferings was dedicated to triumph, as a day "more dear to true Barbadians, than Trafalgar to Britons." Now, the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs, once told the house, that if he experienced resistance from the West Indies, partaking of the nature of contumacy, he would come down to parliament for counsel and assistance. And was not this contumacy with a vengeance—unbridled, unveiled contumacy—contumacy pushed to its extremest point? What was it called by the authorities in the island? The council, planters themselves, under the influence of planters, and in awe of the mob, called it "a disgraceful outrage." Lord Bathurst, who always answered the exasperated language of the colonists in the mildest and most gentleman-like terms, called it "a daring and scandalous violation of law." The Governor, helpless as he was, almost shorn of his authority, called it, in his despatch, "an outrageous violation of law and order, defeating the ends of civil association,"—rendering the laws "a scourge to the weak," pregnant with "the very worst consequences, and the most evil example" in a society of slaves, and "such as, if it were suffered to pass unpunished, would render every man unsafe, in person and in property, delivered over to the mercy of a mob." And this he said upon the first outrage, which was aggravated, a hundred fold, by what had since occurred. Now, the question which he (Mr. B.) wished to propound was—Should it pass unnoticed and uncondemned? He asked no punishment. He wished every blessing to the planters, and more especially, the blessing of a tolerant and peaceable spirit. He asked only—first, that law should be re-established in Barbadoes, after a long interregnum: secondly, that those who pulled down the chapel should build it up again: and, lastly, that law and justice, protection and toleration, should be secured to all his Majesty's unoffending subjects, in all parts of his dominions. Before he sat down he would compare the case of Smith, the missionary in Demerara, with the case of the magistrates of Barbadoes. He would put, side by side, the crime of Smith and his punishment, and the crime of the magistrates of Barbadoes and their punishment. Mr. Smith knew that a disturbance was approaching, half an hour, as some witnesses said; a quarter of an hour, as others deposed—before the insurrection began. That was his crime. The magistrates of Barbadoes were summoned before the Council, and asked, "Did you know that a riotous assembly had collected at the Wesleyan chapel, for the purpose of pulling down that building, and that they were actually engaged in destroying it?" "I did," was the answer of every magistrate who was in town at the time. So far, then, they stood in a parity of guilt. Mr. Smith did something. He remonstrated with the rioters, till his remonstrances were checked by a presented blunderbuss: but still he saved the life of Hamilton, the manager. "Did you," the magistrates were asked, "make any effort to disperse the meeting, and prevent the destruction of the chapel? Did you, Mr. Gill?" "I used no effort."—"Did you, Mr. Wickham?" "I used no effort."—"Did you, Mr. Grant?" "I used no effort on either of those nights."—"Did you, Mr. Walton?" "I used no effort on either of those nights."—"Did you, Mr. Waith?" "I made no effort, aware that it was useless." Here, then, Mr. Smith had the advantage of the magistrates. He did something; they nothing. Mr. Smith made no communication to the Governor, the time and the distance rendering it physically impossible. The magistrates were asked, "Did you make any communication to the Governor on the subject?" "I made no communication to him," was the answer of them all. The poor, reviled missionary, holding no commission, charged with no responsibility, at ten miles distance from the Governor and the military, because he did not communicate with the rapidity of a telegraph, was sentenced to be hanged by the neck until he was dead. And the magistrates, the responsible authorities of the town, in the neighbourhood of the barracks and the Governor, confessing that they knew every thing, did nothing, communicated nothing, were sentenced to this punishment—"the Council declared their opinion, that the conduct of the magistrates was reprehensible, with the exception of Mr. Moore and Mr. Waith, who lived in the country."—"The Governor then inquired what the privy council thought should be done on the occasion, when the board advised, that his Excellency's displeasure should be expressed to those who had neglected their duty; which his Excellency desired the clerk to do." And, even this egregious sentence, as far as appeared from the papers, was never carried into effect. So that, for the same crime, one man was sentenced to death, and another to a ridiculous reprimand from the mouth of the Governor's clerk. A hundred and ninety-three gentlemen voted last session, that Mr. Smith, sentenced to death, and hurried to an untimely grave, was not punished too severely. Every one of them would vote with him to-night, in common consistency.

For, to them, of all men, must it appear most monstrous, that the same crime committed by magistrates, should be avenged by a sentence of displeasure. But there was another comparison infinitely more revolting to his mind, and which he could not think of without horror and poignant commiseration, and without sickening at the idea of West India justice. The rioters were white men, and not the hair of the head of one of them had been touched. Had men with black skins committed such, one-half, one hundredth part of such enormities—had they attended one lawless meeting—had they fired one house—had they sent forth one emissary—had they issued one proclamation of defiance—had they armed to resist the military—or had a negro whispered—he spoke not of an imaginary, but of an actual case, detailed in the papers lately laid before the house—had a negro whispered in the secret ear of his son, one sentence of dissatisfaction with his condition, or one natural sigh for liberty, what a massacre, what lashings, what gibbeting, would have followed!—how would the Mac Turks have rioted in the blood of the slaves!—how would the halberds have streamed with the blood of men sentenced, "for mercy's sake," as it was impudently called, to a thousand lashes—which were inflicted! But, being white men, and not blacks; civilized men, and not savages—"gentlemen," forsooth, "of respectability," which aggravated their guilt a thousand fold—their riot was patriotic—their proclamation was loyal: because they were "true lovers of religion," they pulled down a chapel, and persecuted their neighbour, out of love and harmony! The black insurgents had quivered under the halberds, and were rotting on the gibbets of Demerara: the white insurgents held the king's commission; administered the laws; were the senators and magistrates of Barbadoes! "Equal-handed justice" was the boast and glory of the British constitution. He then moved, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, representing that this house, having taken into their most serious consideration the papers laid before them relating to the demolition of the Methodist chapel in Barbadoes, and the expulsion of Mr. Shrewsbury, a licensed teacher of religion, deem it their duty to declare, that they view with the utmost amazement and detestation that scandalous and daring violation of law; and to beseech his Majesty to take such steps as should secure the rebuilding of the chapel at the expense of the colony of Barbadoes; and also, to assure his Majesty, that the house will afford him every assistance which may be required, in order to prevent the recurrence of such outrages, and in order to secure ample protection, and religious toleration to all his Majesty's subjects in that part of his dominions."

Mr. Wilmot Horton said, that he should endeavour to confine himself to such a statement as would put the house in possession of the knowledge of the real condition of the island to which the motion of the hon. member referred, at the time when the facts in question had occurred, in order that the house might be enabled to form a correct judgment of the original causes which had led to so unfortunate a result. In the fulfilment of this duty, however, he should endeavour to offer such observations as might be calculated to conciliate angry feelings on either side, and to prevent the recurrence of such evils for the future, rather than attempt to follow, step by step, the minute and substantially accurate statement of facts which the hon. member had just made. No gentleman could feel less inclined than he was, to justify so gross an outrage as the destruction of the Methodist chapel at Barbadoes. In fact, a reference to the papers which had already been laid before parliament would sufficiently prove the sense which had been entertained by the noble lord at the head of the Colonial department, of the nature of that outrage. At the same time, he felt how unfortunate it would be, if any thing occurred of a nature to rekindle feelings of animosity, and place at issue with each other the Missionaries of the Wesleyan Society and certain Proprietors in the West-Indies; between whom so much misunderstanding had already prevailed. In the main, he agreed with what had fallen from the hon. member; but, he most object to the introduction of the case of Mr. Smith, the Missionary of Demerara. The hon. member had endeavoured to establish an analogy between that case and the present one of the Magistrates of Barbadoes; but, he thought that it was very unsatisfactory in principle, if not more objectionable, to attempt to establish such analogy; and he thought that the hon. gent. had failed in doing so on the present occasion. It was to be remembered, that the subject of slavery generally, never could be approached, without adverting to the fact, that it was a state, however objectionable in itself, which had received, from time to time, in the most unequivocal manner, the sanction and support of this country. It was mixed up, in the minds of the West-India planters, with the question of property; and, if it could be shewn, that the irritation, distrust, and dislike, which had been entertained in the minds of the planters at Barbadoes against Mr. Shrewsbury and the Wesleyan Missionaries, arose from an apprehension which they entertained for the security of their property, as involved in the possession of slaves, some apology would be furnished by that consideration. If they considered that the doctrines held by these Missionaries were dangerous to their interests, as being subversive of subordination among the slaves, inasmuch as they inculcated the doctrine that slavery was incompatible with Christianity, that again would make the present case one which ought to be considered on its own peculiar grounds, and not in analogy with that of Mr. Smith, the Missionary of Demerara. Now, whether Mr. Shrewsbury or the Missionaries ever inculcated these doctrines, or, if they did, whether they acted under a sense of duty in doing so, was a question upon which he would not pause to make any observations. He would only say, that the state of slavery being a recognized state, and certain rights of property being mixed up with that state, it would have been wise on the part of the Missionaries, with reference to late discussions which had taken place in parliament on the subject of that state, to have conciliated the planters, by endeavouring to remove from their minds any doubts or apprehensions, that they meant, in any degree, to weaken the spirit of obedience in the slave. With respect to Mr. Shrewsbury himself, he did not mean, for one moment, to question the respectability of that individual. The testimonials to which the hon. member had referred came from persons of high character, and were, on that account, entitled to every consideration. At the same time, it was beyond a doubt, that that Missionary, perhaps unintentionally, had given offence to the great bulk of the white population of Barbadoes, who considered themselves likely to be prejudiced by his conduct. For, only one month after he arrived in the island, he had written home a letter to the Wesleyan Missionary Society, containing some severe strictures on the state of religious instruction, as then existing there. Those strictures containing, or being supposed to contain, harsh reflections on the white inhabitants in general, excited against Mr. Shrewsbury strong feelings of disapprobation in Barbadoes. Mr. Shrewsbury had written to the Committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, on the 28th of March, 1820, in the following words: "If we now pause, and take a calm review of the moral condition of this populous colony, the sight will be painful and affecting in the extreme. Surely, the fear of God is hardly to be seen in this place." And, although, in a subsequent part of that letter, he directed his observations towards the free black and the slave population, still, a general censure on the whole was considered to have been made. And here he wished it to be understood distinctly, that he had no complaint to make against the Wesleyan Missionaries in the West Indies. On the contrary, speaking generally, from all that he had heard, he was disposed to speak favourably of their conduct and of their usefulness. But he might, he hoped, without giving any offence, recommend the greatest caution to those persons, in the existing state of feeling in the colonies.—It appeared, too, that Mr. Shrewsbury, instead of disarming the prejudices which prevailed, had taken steps, which were rather calculated to aggravate them. With the view, as he said, of explaining the real state of the case to the public, he had himself laid a copy of the letter in question upon the table of the public Commercial Room—a step, which many persons in the colony considered as not done in the spirit of self-justification, but in that of defiance, and with a view to shew how little he valued his opponents;—especially as he did this at the time when the alarms of the people of Barbadoes were excited, not only by the discussions that had taken place both in and out of parliament, but by the intelligence lately received of the formidable insurrection in Demerara.—to the supposed origin and causes of which, he should not now advert. Whatever might have been Mr. Shrewsbury's motive in this respect, it was sufficient to say, that his conduct had given rise to feelings, which led to the circumstances which the house was now called on to discuss. With regard to the chapel which had been destroyed, he could inform the house, that at the period of Mr. Shrewsbury's arrival in Barbadoes, in Feb. 1820, so far from its appearing, that there was any general indisposition towards himself or his Mission, on the contrary, every sort of assistance was given him:—and, in proof of this assertion, he could state, that one-third of the expense of building this chapel which had lately been destroyed, was raised by voluntary subscriptions. Nothing could more clearly establish the fact, that this irritation, on the part of the people of Barbadoes, did not arise from original ill-

will towards the Wesleyan Missionaries, but from particular circumstances, which had characterized the mission of this individual. To the argument of the honourable member opposite, who had observed on the continuance of these feelings in Barbadoes, he must however, observe—and he did so with considerable regret—that circumstances had occurred, which tended to keep alive the suspicion and jealousy, which existed in the minds of the white inhabitants of Barbadoes, and to which he had alluded; namely, a jealousy of the supposed tendency of the Wesleyan doctrines to diminish the obedience of the slave. It appeared, that in last September, certain Resolutions were passed at a meeting of Wesleyan Missionaries in Kingston, Jamaica, the first of which was expressed in these words: "That they entertain a decided belief, that Christianity does not interfere with the civil condition of slaves, as slavery is established and regulated by the laws of the British West Indies." The Committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society at home thought it necessary, explicitly and distinctly to protest against the doctrine contained in that Resolution; and they declared, that they held it to be "the duty of every Christian government, to bring the state of slavery to an end, as soon as it could be done, prudently, safely, and with a just consideration of the interests of all parties concerned;"—and, thus far, they went little beyond the Resolutions of the House of Commons. They then added, that "the degradation of men merely on account of their colour, and the holding of human beings in interminable bondage, were wholly inconsistent with Christianity." Now, of whatever qualification this opinion might be susceptible, to preach to the slave, that Christianity was his first duty, and to tell him, at the same time, that his state of slavery was wholly inconsistent with Christianity, was to inculcate doctrines, which would naturally appear dangerous to those who felt, that their property, the property of their families, and their very existence, were necessarily involved in the possession of slaves. The hon. member had expressed little or no censure on the conduct of the Governor of Barbadoes. He (Mr. Horton) felt assured that the house would consider that the Governor had done every thing in his power. In referring Mr. Shrewsbury to the magistrates for protection, he had felt, that he was only giving that importance to the execution of the law which it was his duty to give. If Mr. Shrewsbury had applied to the magistrates, and they had refused to act, he might then have immediately returned to the Governor, who would have found himself placed under circumstances, in which he could have had no hesitation in interfering personally. But, the impression which existed in Mr. Shrewsbury's mind, that he would not receive assistance from the magistrates, was pleaded as an excuse for not having made the application. In that exercise of his discretion, he considered Mr. Shrewsbury to have been entirely in the wrong; and that he was so far responsible for the circumstances which had succeeded. He would mention another cause of the continued irritation which had existed in Barbadoes. In the Report of the Committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society to December 1824, page 105, were the following remarks, with reference to the destruction of the chapel: "The whole shews, that even the poor excuse of temporary excitement, founded on exaggerated reports as to the insurrection in Demerara, and misapprehensions as to the contents of Mr. Shrewsbury's letter, cannot be allowed to the leaders and excitors of these disgraceful outrages. They argue a deeper and more permanent principle—a settled hostility to religion itself, and to the religious instruction of the negro and coloured population." Now, he thought that he could satisfy the house, that it was not a settled hostility to religion itself, that existed in Barbadoes,—but a hostility to religion, as they understood it to be preached, or expected that it would be preached by the Wesleyan Missionaries. The religious establishment which parliament had provided had been received with the utmost cordiality and gratitude. He understood that the legislature were prepared to grant 3,000*l.* towards the expense of building a new church at Bridgetown, and to make an annual grant of 600*l.* for the support of the Colonial School. The Moravians had lately received from one individual a donation of 2,000*l.* But, he would refer more particularly to the authority of the Rev. Mr. Hinds, a gentleman of the utmost respectability, the Principal of Codrington College, a college under the direction of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel; and it was to be remembered, that the statement of that gentleman was upon oath. Mr. Hinds stated, that when officiating as Missionary from the Society for the Conversion of Negro Slaves, he made many applications to the proprietors and overseers of estates, for liberty to instruct their slaves in religion; that, without any exception, all his applications were favourably received; and that, in several instances, great zeal and earnestness were manifested in the cause in which he was engaged. He had known the proprietor of an estate himself read prayers and explain the Scriptures to his slaves; and he adds, "from the inquiries which I made, as well as from my own observations, the impression left upon my mind is, that the general sense of the proprietors is in favour of the religious instruction of the negroes, whenever undertaken by ministers of the Established Church." Many additional passages might be quoted, in corroboration of this opinion, and to shew the extent of religious instruction which the slaves received, not only at the several parish churches, which were open at extraordinary hours, for the special purpose of giving to the slaves lectures adapted to their capacity, but also at their own houses; and an estimate had been made that 10,000 slaves were receiving religious instruction weekly.—He should conclude his observations by repeating, that he had nothing to offer in the way of apology for what had occurred in the destruction of the chapel, which had given rise to the hon. gent.'s motion. He was willing, however, not only to hope, but to believe, that the actors in that disgraceful outrage, although they might have been under the influence of a sort of moral demerement, were not actuated by any want of intrinsic respect for religion itself. He hoped, that the proof which these circumstances exhibited of the existence of an angry and dangerous spirit, would have the effect of inculcating caution on all classes of religious Missionary Societies, and of inducing them to endeavour to disarm that spirit, by adopting measures of conciliation, and thereby to give full effect to those general measures of instruction and improvement which the house and the country had sanctioned.

Mr. W. Smith had no hesitation in saying, that there was not a shadow of a charge against Mr. Shrewsbury. The obnoxious letter, of which so much had been said, contained no reflections on the white population of the colony, half so strong, as those which were to be found in almost every publication, which had come, even recently, from gentlemen, who were the best acquainted with the condition of the West Indies. From the days of Bryan Edwards, down to the present year, similar descriptions had been uniformly given, by every writer who had resided there. He could, if necessary, furnish instances, abundant and indisputable; but, the facts were too notorious to be denied; and, whether true or false, these representations were not confined to Mr. Shrewsbury, and could not therefore furnish ground of charge against him in particular: nor, however disreputable such conduct might appear in the eyes of the sober part of the British public, were the charges of a nature to excite the negroes to insubordination; but, they were amply sufficient to stimulate the colonists to give vent to their dislike of the Missionary system, and to the sullen feelings which they had long indulged against Mr. Shrewsbury and his brethren; men, however, whose character neither depended on their report, nor was to be accepted from such prejudiced hands. The hon. Secretary had recommended conciliation and forbearance. Now, conciliation had been very long tried; and, he was sorry to say, had not produced the beneficial effects which had been promised. When Lord Seaforth had proposed a bill, to declare the wanton and wilful killing of a slave to be murder, the planters pertinaciously opposed the enactment; not on the pretext, that the mere supposition of such a law being necessary was an insult; for its necessity had been demonstrated by a recent occurrence—but merely because they were, forsooth, too high-minded to submit to a law which they disapproved: and the manner, too, in which it had been refused was most offensive. Nor had he been able to trace, from that day to this, any change of feeling in the people of that island, which could lead him to suppose, that such an outrage as was now complained of, might not, at any time, have been committed: the extravagance of the action did not, in his mind, form any presumption against its probability. Stronger measures than any which the house had yet taken, were, he was convinced, necessary to repress this spirit; and, if some such steps should not be taken on the first occasion which should present itself, whether a bishop or a missionary were employed in the obnoxious work, the most reasonable demands would be rejected, if they happened not to suit the pride of the Assembly, or the caprice of the people. There had always existed, on the part of the inhabitants of that island, the most inordinate and ridiculous ideas of their own importance. They seemed, in this instance, to be nearly on the same level with the poor simple Welchman, who exclaimed, when he was about to leave the city of Bristol, "Alas! what will become of thee, poor Bristol, when I am gone!" They should be taught, that, however valuable to a few individuals might be the estates they possessed there, to the empire of Great Britain, as a national possession, their island was but as a toy, which, if destroyed, would, in a very short time, be scarcely missed, and ere long be quite forgotten: and that, instead of being one of the props of this country, as had been silly boasted, her conduct tended only to embarrass and to tease the too-forbearing Government of the mother country, and to bring the colonies into contempt.

Mr. Buttsworth: The hon. Secretary had stated, that all these subjects relative to missions in the colonies, should be treated in a spirit of conciliation, and not with hostility. He could assure the hon. gent. that a spirit of conciliation had uniformly been manifested by Mr. Shrewsbury and the rest of the missionaries, as well as by those who had the management of the Wesleyan missions. Nothing could more directly prove this, than the conduct of Mr. Shrewsbury, when, after the destruction of his house and property, for no offence—when he had been forced to escape for his life out of the island of Barbadoes, with his wife, at the very moment she expected to be confined, he sat down as soon as he landed in St. Vincent's, and wrote that most judicious and conciliatory pastoral letter to his distressed flock in Barbadoes, which had been alluded to by the hon. member. In this letter he entreated them not to resent the unprovoked injury which they had sustained, but to bear with meekness and patience every insult, and not to render evil for evil. Nothing could be more conciliatory, nor better evince the christian spirit of forbearance, than that admirable letter. With regard to the conduct of the Wesleyan Mission committee, although they had deeply felt the gross injury and violent outrage which had been committed, yet they had excited no spirit of resentment at home. The table of the house might easily have been covered with petitions from all parts of the kingdom for justice in so flagrant a case; but, not one had been presented, and, indeed, the present motion was not made by the instigation of the mission committee: it was the spontaneous act of the hon. mover. So far from the Society wishing to excite a spirit of resentment, they only lamented, that the gentlemen of Barbadoes did not see their own true interest, and encourage the missions, as had been done in the other West India colonies. For, certain he was, that the slaves became more industrious, more sober, more honest, and, in every respect, more valuable, when brought under the influence of moral and religious principles. He did not give this as his own opinion merely; for he had abundant evidence to prove it. In the year 1817, when prejudices were excited against the missionaries, he, together with the late member for Midhurst, Mr. Thompson of Hull, sent a circular letter to the West India colonies, addressed to gentlemen not belonging to the Methodist society, inquiring into the character and conduct of the Wesleyan missionaries, and of the effects produced by their preaching and labours on the slaves; and he had now in his possession abundance of letters, from governors, members of council, judges, barristers at law, physicians, planters and proprietors of estates, merchants and others, bearing ample testimony to the beneficial effects of the Wesleyan missions on the minds of the slaves, and of the general good character and conduct of the missionaries. He was sorry that Barbadoes was almost the only colony in which the missions were not encouraged. Liberal subscriptions had been contributed to the missions by proprietors of slaves, in most of the other islands. He regretted that the hon. Secretary had made any animadversion on the annual report of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. It was surely necessary, that such a flagrant outrage as the one committed at Barbadoes should be noticed in the annual report; and it certainly had been done in temperate, measured language; considering the unprovoked injury which had been sustained. The hon. Secretary had also said, that the doctrines preached by the missionaries tended, in the opinion of certain persons at Barbadoes, to inculcate insubordination among the slaves, and to lessen their value. He (Mr. B.) would challenge any one to prove the fact. These missions were not of yesterday; they had been established upwards of 40 years; and, during all that time, there never had been a single charge substantiated against the doctrines taught by the Wesleyan missionaries. Indeed, their doctrines and liturgy were those of the Established Church of England. With regard to the instruction afforded by the clergy of the Established Church in the colonies, it was generally admitted, by their own returns to Lord Bathurst's circular letter, printed by the house in 1816, that the clergy did not consider themselves fitted, or responsible, for the instruction of the slaves; nor had they the means of affording instruction. If he recollected right, in the return made by Mr. Chaderton, rector of St. Paul's, Antigua, he had stated, that he could only admit about 80 slaves into his church after the whites were accommodated; and there were nearly 4,000 slaves in his parish. The hon. Secretary had charged Mr. Shrewsbury with exciting the violence which had occurred at Barbadoes, by exhibiting his letter by way of defiance. The very reverse was the fact. The letter had been printed in the colony for three years, without exciting any particular observation; but, when the unhappy affair in Demerara occurred, it produced a bitter spirit against all Missionaries, and then the Barbadians endeavoured to find some charge against Mr. Shrewsbury. They examined his reports, as printed in the Missionary Notices, and particularly his letter of 1820, which was a public document in the island, and they grossly misrepresented it. Mr. Shrewsbury, merely in self-defence, to prevent such further misrepresentation, and from the best motives, to promote peace and good-will, took the printed copy of his letter and left it at the Commercial Rooms, that it might speak for itself. With regard, therefore, to Mr. Shrewsbury's motive, it was merely to silence clamour, and certainly not to provoke hostility. He had received the most ample testimonials to Mr. Shrewsbury's general good conduct, especially from one highly respectable gentleman in Granada, who owned, or had the charge of about 2,500 slaves, with whom Mr. Shrewsbury lived some years, and was particularly useful in improving the general character of his negroes. As there did not appear to be any particular objection to the motion, he should refrain from offering to the house some further observations, which he should otherwise have made, respecting the general object and tendency of the Missions.

Mr. Canning said that of the transaction to which the papers on the table of the house related, it was impossible that there should be more than one opinion: namely, that it was unjustifiable, indefensible—a violation of law and justice—a defiance of all legal authority

—a flying in the face of Parliament, and of the country (hear, hear.) In every expression of abhorrence at so great an outrage, he fully concurred with the hon. member (Mr. Buxton;) and, if he differed from that hon. gent. in opinion, as to the mode in which the house ought to proceed upon the occasion, that difference was solely founded on practical considerations, arising out of the circumstances of the case, and not upon a favourable estimate of the character of the transaction itself. He admitted even, that it was a case, in which the duty of the House of Commons would be better performed by interfering, than by passing it by unobserved; but, he thought it at the same time, expedient for the house, so to regulate its interference, as neither to leave unmarked, on the one hand, the expression of its indignation, nor to involve itself, on the other hand, in questions of unnecessary difficulty. The case of Mr. Shrewsbury had been placed in comparison with that of Mr. Smith, the Missionary of Demerara; but very erroneously, as appeared to him; since there was a striking difference in the two cases. Of Mr. Smith he was desirous of saying nothing harsh or disrespectful. His guilt or innocence was not the debate of that night;—and, whatever his errors might have been, he had, God knew, more than amply atoned for them. But, in Mr. Smith's case there was an imputation of guilt, or error, call it by what name they would—which at least provoked, if it did not justify, animadversion. In the conduct of Mr. Shrewsbury, he must be allowed to say, that there did not appear the slightest ground of blame or suspicion (hear, hear.) Allusion had been made to the letter which Mr. Shrewsbury had felt it his duty to address to his correspondents in this country. It could not be denied, that Mr. Shrewsbury was at liberty to write that letter. To Mr. Shrewsbury, therefore, no blame whatever attached, on account of its contents. But, he must say, that it was a gross instance of imprudence to publish that letter; nor could he conceive any thing more likely to paralyze the future efforts of their Missionary, than that publication by the Missionary Society. The sending back to Barbadoes, to be circulated throughout the colony, Mr. Shrewsbury's free remarks upon its inhabitants, was to mark him out for distrust and dislike, if not, as had turned out to be the event, for persecution. The object of the Missionary Society ought to have been, to enable Mr. Shrewsbury to stem the prejudices which prevailed against his sect. Before he had time, however, to conciliate, by his peaceable and steady behaviour, those to whom he was sent, this firebrand had been flung amongst the Barbadians; and, from that moment, all the prospects of his individual usefulness in that community, were at an end. But, of this unlucky mistake the blame rested not on Mr. Shrewsbury. Nor did he state the provocation—though a most unwise and unnecessary one—as a justification of the conduct of the Barbadians. In considering the course which it was the duty of the house to adopt upon the present occasion, it was necessary for hon. gents. to bear in mind, that there were four classes of persons to whom the attention of the house had been drawn. In the first place, there was that class of unknown persons in Barbadoes, who had personally committed the outrage which formed the subject of the motion; secondly, the insular Magistracy, who, it was impossible to say, had done their duty, or had even shown themselves sensible of the duty which they had to do: thirdly, there was the Governor of the Colony: and, lastly, there was the Government at home. With respect to the conduct of the Governor he was disposed to view it with great indulgence. Indeed, there was no disposition, in any quarter, to impute blame to him. Undoubtedly, it was in his power to have called out the military under his command; but, that was an extreme course, which, the rather, perhaps, from his being a military man he was unwilling to take, when informed by his official legal adviser, that such a course was not within the limits of his authority. The Governor did not appear to have been then aware of the extent of that authority: but, having been since instructed, by the Sec. for the Colonies, that his authority, as Governor, was much wider than he supposed it to be, he had shewn every disposition to exercise it to its utmost extent: which, indeed, he had so effectually done, as to prevent the repetition of similar outrages in the colony. With respect to the conduct of the Government at home, he thought it was impossible—indeed, no disposition was evinced—to charge it with remissness. Lord Bathurst had done every thing in his power, to avoid a recurrence of the disgraceful scenes that had taken place, by calling upon the Governor to exercise an extended authority; pronouncing animadversions on the magistracy; and requiring a more accurate investigation into the manner in which that body discharged its functions. It had been asked, why the Magistrates had in no way been punished, except by a slight reprimand from the Governor; and how it came to pass, that their dismissal had not been recommended? Looking on the face of the papers, it certainly did appear to him, that many of those magistrates ought to be removed from their offices. But, unacquainted, as he necessarily was, with the state of society in Barbadoes, he was not prepared to say, that, if the present magistrates were displaced, others could be procured, who would discharge the duties of their office in a more satisfactory manner. This could be no very satisfactory reason, to be sure, for continuing things on their present footing; but, it was an imperative one, if it existed: and, not knowing whether it existed, or not, the Colonial Sec. of State could not, without great indiscretion, and risk of mischief, have sent an order to displace a whole magistracy—even if the Government had the lawful power to do so. The fourth class were the rioters themselves;—guilty, but numerous, and unknown. In defence, or in extenuation at least, of the riot, blame had been thrown upon the Wesleyan Missionaries in general. He was not all inclined to disparage the character of that body, or to undervalue their labours. But, with every due sense of their merits, and of the good which they had effected in the colonies—good, not only spiritual, but political—he was not disposed to confine the education and moral improvement of the inhabitants of the West-Indies, to their exclusive protection. He was a friend to toleration, in the full extent and meaning of the term; but, he did not understand that kind of toleration, which was to be confined to one particular class or body, to the exclusion of other bodies, equally meritorious. He wished the Established Church to live in charity with all sects; and to avail itself of all the aids and appliances which they might furnish. But, he did not see why the Church of England should be considered as the only establishment unfit for its own work; and incompetent to deal with the subjects and colours of England. He said this in passing; because, he thought he observed a disposition to raise the Sectaries, not up to a level with the Church, but beyond it; and to make the Church itself an exception, rather than the rule and standard of our Ecclesiastical Establishment. But, to return to the immediate question. A reference had been made to certain expressions which had fallen from him, in a former session, during the discussion of certain propositions, calculated to promote the amelioration of the condition of the negroes of the West Indies. Undoubtedly, he had said, that if, in the prosecution of that cause, he experienced resistance from the West Indies, partaking of the nature of contumacy, he should consider it right to come down to parliament for counsel and assistance. To that opinion he still adhered: and it was plain, that he so far admitted its application to the present case, as to allow that it was one in which something should be done by the House of Commons. The question was, what that something should be. The proposed Address to the Crown pledged the house to assist His Majesty, in enforcing the rebuilding of the chapel which had been demolished, at the expense of the people of Barbadoes. Such a proposition appeared to him to involve a most dangerous principle. It was one which had very rarely been acted upon in this country. There were, he believed, in the annals of Parliament, two prominent instances of penal infiction upon a large community, for the acts of undiscovered individuals. Those instances were that of the Porteous riot, at Edinburgh, and, more recently, the Boston Port bill. The former had not been without its difficulties. The latter was a most inauspicious precedent; and one which he was sure the house would not be very precipitate to adopt. If, however, the house were prepared to admit such a principle, they should also be prepared, with all their hearts, and with every nerve of their frames, to follow it up, and fearlessly meet the result. The Executive Government alone could do nothing to accomplish the hon. gent's object. The Address would, therefore, be a delusion, if it did not point distinctly to an act of the Legislature. It was by an act of parliament alone, that the people of Barbadoes could be compelled to do that which the hon. member recommended. But, was the house prepared to levy money, for internal purposes, on the people of that island, who had an independent legislature of their own? He begged to be understood, as not giving any general opinion, as to the existence or non-existence of that transcendent power in the metropolitan parliament of the Monarchy. That was one of the questions which lay deepest in the penetralia of the constitution, and which, as he had said upon the occasion before referred to, it would be unwise to stir, except upon an adequate occasion. Was this an adequate occasion? He thought not.—Was he (Mr. Canning), however, desirous to induce the house to pass over the outrage which had been committed? No such thing. Although he did not think the case was one which called for such an exercise of authority as the Resolution of the hon. member indicated, he nevertheless thought it was one, on which it was fitting that the House of Commons should express its opinion—not in censure of the Governor of Barbadoes—nor of the Home Government—but, in aid of both, and for the purpose of proving to the colonies, that the opinion of the house and the country was, that the Governor had done his duty, and that they were ready to give him their support, if necessary, in what future exigencies might require to be done. He had prepared an amendment to that effect, which he would read to the house:—

“Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, to represent to His Majesty, that this house, having taken into their most serious consideration the papers laid before them, relating to the demolition of the Methodist chapel in Barbadoes, deem it their duty to declare, that they view with the utmost indignation that scandalous and daring violation of the law, and having seen with great satisfaction the instructions which have been sent out by His Majesty's Sec. of State to the Governor of Barbadoes, to prevent a recurrence of similar outrages, they humbly assure His Majesty of their readiness to concur in every measure which His Majesty may deem necessary for securing ample protection and religious toleration to all His Majesty's subjects in that part of His Majesty's dominions” (cheers). The hon. mover would see, that the principal difference between the Amendment and the original Resolution—except in what related to the rebuilding of the chapel—was, the substitution of the word “indignation” for “amazement and detestation” (a laugh). He believed the substituted phrase was the more parliamentary. At all events, it was, on the present occasion, the more correct: for it did appear somewhat extraordinary, that the hon. member should propose to declare the “amazement” of the house at an event, which he had stated, both at the outset and the conclusion of his speech, to have been exactly agreeable to his own expectation (a laugh). As an admonition to the inhabitants of Barbadoes, and as an expression of the opinion of the house, he (Mr. Canning) thought the amended Address would be equal in effect to any questionable attempt at more serious practical punishment. Let not the principle of such more weighty infliction be supposed to be disavowed: but, contented to meet the present occasion with what was sufficient for the purpose, let that principle be permitted to lie dormant in the omnipotent bosom of parliament; never to be brought forth into action, until the Legislature saw itself called upon, by a more urgent exigency, to arm itself with extraordinary terrors; and was consequently prepared, with all efforts and at all risks, to push that principle to its utmost extremity. The Amendment further inquired, as he (Mr. Canning) thought, upon the original Resolution, by expressly approving of the conduct of the Executive Government at home. The effect of passing any resolution which did not contain such an expression of approval, would be to impeach that conduct; and, sure he was, that it was not the intention of the hon. mover to do that, which would be, in effect, to side with the contumacious Barbadians, against the Sec. of State. On the contrary, the hon. gent. would feel, that a cordial approbation of what the King's Government had done, would be the most useful encouragement and support to them, in what they might yet have to do. He should, therefore, conclude by moving that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. Brougham was happy to say, that he highly approved of the amendment; which, unlike many other propositions bearing that name, and proceeding from the other side of the house, was, in truth as well as in name, an amendment of the original motion. But, he would now, as he did upon all other occasions, enter his protest against any parallel being set up, between the case of the Northern States of America and the West India islands. He denied that there existed the remotest similarity in their relations with the mother country. The defiance of North America was truly formidable, and to encounter it was, on the part of this country, the height of folly: the threats of the islands were justly a subject of ridicule. It was not, however, because they were powerless, that he would argue that any illegal or unjust course was to be adopted towards them. Far from it. He had ever contended, that even the weakness of a community constituted a stronger claim against being trampled upon by oppressive interference. It was because he held the right to be on our side, that he warned the islands once more against provoking us to show our power also; and reminded the house that, as for the safety of exercising our undoubted prerogative, Great Britain had nothing to fear from the West Indies—from its largest colony, down to the smallest of the Virgin Isles. They might menace—but, it was all trifling. The language of this country should be to the West India Assemblies—that, if they did not discharge their duties, the United Parliament would do its duty—that it would exercise that legislative right, which, except upon the point of taxation, it had reserved to itself, and secured by a declaratory law. No man who knew the least of the question could harbour a doubt on this point. No man who had read the words of our statutes, or reflected on the events out of which they arose, could hesitate an instant in admitting, that parliament possessed the full right of internal legislation in all the colonies—frequently exercised that right—and had only consented to abandon it upon the single matter of revenue. There was, he thought, a very remarkable difference between the tone of the rt. hon. Sec. of State and the Under Sec. for the colonial department, in speaking of the outrages which had been committed in Barbadoes. On this subject, the hon. Under Sec. was rather mealy-mouthed. He dealt out his censure very charily, upon the conduct of those by whom the disgraceful outrage in question had been committed. According to the hon. gent., they had been betrayed by their feelings into the course which they had pursued. In an amiable excess of sensibility, they had only burnt down a chapel—only made a great riot—only levied war against the king, and committed high treason (a laugh)! This aimable indiscretion, it seemed, was occasioned by a wish to preserve their property, on the part of those who committed it. Just as if a man, professing merely to protect his own purse, should indiscreetly, but through a pardonable, if not an amiable indiscretion, take his (Mr. Brougham's). To protect their own property, these amiable but indiscreet persons went and destroyed a meeting-house belonging to others. And then, these offences, committed day after day, and night after night, were absolutely gloried in by their perpetrators, and called the triumph of true religion! Excesses had often been perpetrated in the name of religion, as well as of liberty; but, never before, even in the most barbarous times, had that sacred name been more prostituted, than in Barbadoes. With respect to the Missionaries, he must declare, that they had done great good—unmixed good—in the West India colonies. The Church must, of course, be protected; but, he would deal with an equal hand, and afford protection to the sects likewise. The Church was not adapted to the spiritual exigencies of the colonies. It was quite impossible that the task of instructing the slaves could be left to the Established Church alone. The very accomplishments of its clergymen, the education which they received at Oxford and at Cambridge, unfitted them for the task of converting and educating the unfortunate beings, who ought to be the peculiar objects of proselytism and instruction. In a very able pamphlet on the Treatment of the Negroes, published by Sir George Rose, the author, a member of the Church of England, and warmly attached to its doctrines and discipline, notwithstanding all his prejudices in favour of the establishment, had laid down the principle to which he (Mr. B.) had just adverted, had supported it by argument, and illustrated it by example. Nay, even the clergy of the West Indies themselves, had, many years ago, borne the most satisfactory testimony to the superior advantages possessed by the Methodist ministers, in teaching the negroes; and had admitted, that if those negroes were to be taught at all, it must be by such instructors. The question, indeed, now was, whether the negroes should be taught at all: for, if they were to be taught, Methodists alone could teach them. He was exceedingly sorry, however, to find, that such was not the opinion of a rt. rev. person who had lately been sent over to the West Indies, as Bishop of Jamaica. Bishop Lipscombe, in his despatch to the noble earl at the head of the colonial department, asserted, that the negroes were very favourable to the Established Church, and, on the contrary, regarded the sectaries with a most unfavourable eye. It was worth observing, that this despatch from the rt. rev. prelate was dated the 12th of March. He could not have arrived in the colony long before the beginning of March, notwithstanding which, the moment he got there, he saw what was the religious disposition of the slaves. Let the house remark, how very much the rt. rev. prelate differed from his more humble ecclesiastical predecessors. He said, "A very strong predilection exists among the slaves for the doctrines of the Church of England, if opportunities for attending Divine Service were afforded them." Here it would be seen, that the rt. rev. prelate had arrived at a perfect knowledge of the predilection of the poor negroes for the Established Church, including the 39 articles, and its practical as well as religious relations, in the course of the first fortnight after his arrival (a laugh). Lord help him, to think that the rt. rev. personage was speaking of the negro slaves of the West Indies. They knew nothing, poor things, of the difference between consubstantiation and transubstantiation, or that "verily indeed," meant "indeed and verily" (a laugh). The bishop proceeded thus—"Wherever I go I find that the greatest aversion exists against sectarians of every denomination, and they have every degree of confidence in any teacher of religion whom I may be pleased to appoint" (laughter). He had no doubt, from what the bishop afterwards said, that he happened to have a deep sonorous voice (a laugh). "The psalmody and the organ have great attractions for them. They are peculiarly fond of form and ceremony, and are greater critics than many persons give them credit for" (a laugh). (Mr. Canning asked whether it was the negroes who were spoken of in that passage?) Oh, yes; it was the negroes. The bishop had fathomed their character as quickly as the negroes had fathomed the merits of the Establishment, and discovered the means which was concealed in its bosom. He had examined them with the eye of a lynx, and got at the depths of their character. The report proceeded—"On account of the capriciousness of the negro character, it is difficult to ensure their attendance, even where great pains have been taken; but, whenever a preacher is popular, they dress out their children and themselves—a sure sign they are in good humour." This was the first time he had ever been aware of that trait in the negro character. He knew, indeed, that with respect to bishops, the better humour they were in, the more magnificently they dressed themselves out in lawn, and satin, and powder; but he never knew that negroes were in the habit of expressing their satisfaction in a similar way (a laugh). He was surprised that in the same sentence in which the bishop said the negroes were fond of ceremony and form, he should call them capricious; because the more they were fond of ceremony and form, the more episcopalian were they in the cut of their opinions (a laugh). Now came the passage, which when he wrote, the bishop must have been thinking of his own voice—"They are greater critics than many persons will give them credit for being, and they have a great predilection for a powerful and sonorous voice" (great laughter). The rt. rev. prelate then proceeded to say—"As soon as my archdeacon and myself have visited the several parishes, which we purpose doing immediately"—by which it appeared that the bishop made this report, before he had seen the people. The learned divine reversed the usual course of proceeding—which was to see first and report afterwards; for he made up his report in the first instance, and then said, that he would go and see what he had been writing about! The bishop went on thus—"I shall not fail to communicate to your lordship whatever I may deem useful and practical. In the mean time, I am happy in being able to assure your lordship, that a very general wish to ameliorate the condition of the slaves, and to instruct them in the principles of the Established Church, seems to pervade the great mass of proprietors, and every facility is afforded me of visiting the several plantations." Now, whatever the bishop of Jamaica and his archdeacon might think, he really could not help believing, that the bishop and the archdeacon knew very little about the best way of teaching or educating the negroes. The fact was—and it was known to all who knew any thing of the West India islands—that the missionaries were the only real and efficient teachers of the black population; and hence the peculiar atrocity of that gross and scandalous outrage to the law, to the interests of religion, to sound policy and the best interests of the planters themselves, which had been perpetrated, in so daring a manner, in the island of Barbadoes;

and which was the subject of the present discussion. It had been said, that Mr. Shrewsbury should not have written the letter which had been alluded to. He could not, however, for a moment believe, that the letter was the cause of the ill-treatment which that excellent man had received. Confident he was, that the outrage was not directed against Mr. Shrewsbury as a libeller, but as a missionary. It was now about a year since the house was occupied in discussing another outrage similar to the present, as to the motives in which it originated; and he then solemnly adjured the house to redeem its pledge, if the planters persevered in forfeiting theirs; warning the planters, moreover, that the house would one day do its duty, if they obstinately persisted in breaking all faith, and putting off for ever the day of amendment. Month after month had rolled away—and, what had they done? Nothing—or, rather, he could not say nothing—but that which far more significantly than mere inaction indicated their determination to violate every vow, and go on deceiving and mocking the house, as long as they would submit to be mocked and deceived. In Trinidad, they had offered every impediment short of open resistance to the enforcement of the order in council. In no one of the islands had they carried the great measure of admitting negro testimony: and, in one only, had they attempted it. Yet, mark the instructive history of that attempt. A bill was brought in, providing for the competency of negro evidence, within very limited bounds, it was true—but still an important amendment of the law. The Duke of Manchester reported on this step; and congratulated the government at home on the prospect of its being carried, as it had been brought in without a division, and by the most respectable and leading member of the Assembly. But, soon after the date of his Grace's despatch, came the first reading; and then, the division being taken, there appeared, out of thirty-five present, exactly thirty-four against the bill, and one single voice in its favour! Whoever, after this, should expect much from Colonial Assemblies, would have himself only, and not them, to upbraid, for whatever disappointment he might experience.—But, if they abandoned their duty—if they would not redeem their pledges—at least he (Mr. B.) would redeem his; and unless, before the next session of parliament, he should see them acting in good earnest, to show that they were at length resolved to make amends for the time thus squandered away, he desired to be understood as now giving notice of his determination to present a bill to the house, for the purpose of bettering the condition of their fellow subjects, the negroes, in all the British colonies. That measure would embrace the following distinct objects:—First; to make negro evidence admissible in all cases, in all courts, leaving of course its credit to the consideration of the court and jury: Secondly; to prevent the use of the whip, as applied to women, entirely; and as a stimulus to labour, whether for men or women: Thirdly; to attach all slaves to the soil, rendering them inseparable from it, in any circumstances: Fourthly; to prohibit persons holding West India property, or any mortgage upon such property, filling any office, civil or military (except regimental) in the West Indies: and, lastly; to secure, by such means as might be safe at once to the owner and the slave, the gradual, but, ultimately, the complete admission of that injured class of men, to the blessings of personal liberty (hear). If he (Mr. B.) were alive and in parliament, he would, early next session, move for leave to bring in such a bill. He knew that he should have the zealous support of almost all who sat around him. He trusted he should have the concurrence of a majority of the house. He was sure he should have with him the great body of the people out of doors. Nor, should he be wanting, would this measure be abandoned. It was the result of mature deliberation: it was the fruit of extensive concert: it was now pressed forward after long delay, and great forbearance: and, as it signified little to whose hands the proposal was entrusted, so by some one or other, would it surely be brought forward, even if he were no longer present to discharge that duty; and, unless the West Indians should of themselves prevent it, let them be well assured, that it would, sooner or later, but probably at no distant day, be carried (hear, hear).

Mr. Bernal said, that after the great temper and moderation which had been shewn in the early part of the discussion, he thought it hard, that the learned member (Mr. Brougham), should have diverged into so wide and sweeping a field of invective. Those members, who were connected with the colonies, had not had any previous notice given to them, that they would thus be put upon their trial. Could any one have expected, after hearing the terms of the original motion, and the judicious and discriminating amendment of the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs, that those proprietors would have been exposed to the unsparring abuse of the learned gent.? He could state from unquestionable authority, that the learned gent. was not warranted in the attack which he had thought proper to make on the House of Assembly in Jamaica. He denied, that the bill which that Assembly had passed, to prevent the arrest of slaves on a market day, was so much for the benefit of the master, as it was for the slave. The Assembly had not been influenced by motives of a selfish nature. They had, he firmly believed, been actuated by the desire of considering the interests of the negroes; and of proceeding in a due course of improvement, temperately and steadily. With respect to the immediate subject before the house, he admitted, that he had always entertained a great respect for the labours of the Wesleyan and other Missionaries in the West India Islands. Those labours had always tended to preserve that peace, which the gospel of Christ inculcated. Nor would he, for one moment, attempt to justify the outrage which had been perpetrated in the island of Barbadoes. With regard to the excitement in that island, that might, in a great measure, be attributed to circumstances connected with what had taken place in other West India Colonies as well as in Barbadoes itself. The Barbadians, apparently, were under great irritation. The Governor of Barbadoes, as would be seen from the papers which had been laid on the table, had been advised, that the provisions of the riot act did not extend to the island of Barbadoes; and that the calling out of a military force in aid of the civil power, would have cast a burden of considerable responsibility upon the Governor; and, subsequently, the opinions of the first Law Officers of the Crown were applied for, and obtained, in England.—He must repeat his regret at the tone which the learned gent. always assumed, when he spoke of the West India Islands. It was a tone of menace: it was a hostile threat. It had no resemblance to the conciliatory advice of a sincere friend. If the learned gent. thought that by assuming such a tone, he stood a chance of doing good in the colonies, he was entirely mistaken: for, not only in Jamaica, but throughout the whole of the West Indies, nothing could be calculated more effectually to create irritation, than the course which the learned gent. uniformly thought proper to pursue.

Mr. Manning said he was very desirous of saying a few words, in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. member (Mr. Buxton) respecting the inhabitants of the Island of Barbadoes. The hon. member need not suppose that it was at all his intention to justify the outrage committed in that Island, by the destruction of the chapel. He had, from the moment of its occurrence, always expressed, both in public and private, his abhorrence of a conduct, which he had believed could only have existed on the coast of Africa. From all he had heard of Mr. Shrewsbury, with whom he had no acquaintance, he believed him to be a very respectable man; and this opinion was confirmed by Mr. Ross of Grenada, and other West Indian proprietors.—It had fallen to his lot to have seen a good deal of the inhabitants of Barbadoes, as well those resident in the colony, as in this country; and he would take upon himself to say, that a more honourable class of persons did not exist in any part of His Majesty's dominions. There were many persons there of liberal education and considerable classical attainment, and who were wholly incapable of giving any sanction to the act, of which the hon. member complained. It was however, to be recollected, that just previously to this act, the news of the insurrection in Demerara had arrived; and many persons in Barbadoes were impressed with a notion, that the Methodist Missionary there had been mainly concerned in promoting that tumult.—However lightly the hon. gent. opposite might think of those matters, he believed that, when any set of individuals conceived their lives and property to be in danger, they did not very coolly deliberate on the probable result of measures which they might take; added to which, just before this disturbance, was most unfortunately published a letter from Mr. Shrewsbury, written three years before to the Society at home, and which tended materially to inflame matters in that island. It was therefore hard in the hon. mover to impute the blame of this misconduct upon the majority of the inhabitants. He (Mr. M.) was old enough to remember Lord George Gordon's riots in 1780; when, for three days, in the heart of the metropolis, the Government was set at defiance by a lawless mob. As well might the hon. gent. if he had been a member of the house at that time, have called for a general censure on the inhabitants of London and Westminster. They had the best security against the recurrence of such measures, in the gracious act of His Majesty, in sending out the bishops and clergy to the West India colonies; and it was gratifying to see the manner in which they had been every where received. This was the best answer to the many calumnies which had been thrown out against the proprietors of estates in that part of the world, asserting their reluctance to have religious instruction conveyed to their negroes. Although he should certainly prefer this good work to be done by members of the Established Church, he would not on this occasion omit his debt of gratitude to the Moravian and the Wesleyan Missionaries, who had certainly been very active, and done great service, in many of the colonies. In St. Kitt's alone there were above six thousand negroes in the congregations of the two societies to which he had referred; and, he believed, in Antigua, a still larger number. But he could not omit to express his regret, that the Wesleyan Society at home should have thought fit to disavow the proceedings of their Missionaries in the Island of Jamaica. A more injudicious measure, with a view to the beneficial results which they were all anxiously looking for, could hardly have been taken. Those persons, from motives of conscience, thought fit to give their observations on what they were daily witnesses of in that Island—an act of justice on their part, and towards which he could boldly assert, from the best authority, that no influence whatever was exercised with them—it was the pure, honest impression of their own minds, and for which he lamented to see they had incurred the displeasure of the Board at home. He could not conclude without expressing his surprise, that the learned member (Mr. Brougham) should, on this occasion, renew his attacks on the West India Legislatures; as if the application of harsh terms in that house, to persons at that distance, were the best means of obtaining a compliance with the wishes expressed by the learned gent. He would take leave to express his opinion, that, although they might not advance so rapidly as the learned gent. might desire, they were taking in many of the colonies—and particularly in Jamaica and Grenada—such measures, as would gradually and safely bring about such an improvement in the condition of the slave population, as all reasonable persons could desire. He had no wish to offer any objection to the Amendment, though it was a matter of regret with him, that, after so considerable an interval of time, it had been thought necessary to call upon the house for an expression of its opinion. He should very much have preferred, that the parties offending had been punished by the due course of law.

Mr. Canning said, in explanation, that the hon. gent. who had just addressed the house, considered the Amendment as comprehending the whole of the population of Barbadoes, and as casting a censure upon them all. This, however, was not the case. It reflected upon nothing but the act; for one of the difficulties, and, indeed, the great difficulty of the present case was, that the actors were not known, and therefore could not be brought to justice.

Dr. Lushington said that the hon. member (Mr. Manning) had failed in making out a defence for the extraordinary conduct of the white population of Barbadoes; whose supineness, under what had occurred, placed them in a situation, very little better than that of accessories after the fact. The magistrates of that Island had not only manifested a culpable remissness in the discharge of their duty, but had evidently shown a disposition to secure impunity to those who had committed the most disgraceful outrages against the laws of the Island, and the peace of the community. It appeared, from the papers on the table of the house, the correctness of which was not disputed, that two of the magistrates, though cognizant of the outrage about to be committed, had concealed from the Government the knowledge of the illegal acts intended to be done; and they had thereby prevented the timely interference that might have stopped the commencement of the riots, or have enabled the Governor to suppress them before the object was accomplished, and to have detected and brought to punishment the guilty; nor had the Local Authorities, after the disapprobation of the Governor had been publicly declared, redeemed their character, by any zealous exertion to bring the delinquents to trial. He was satisfied, that the magistracy of Barbadoes had no just feeling of the atrocity of this transaction and that their errors were wilful. The utter inefficiency of the magistracy was not more to be censured, than the morbid state of feeling in the white inhabitants was deserving of reprobation. In what way had the Barbadians expressed their abhorrence of those scandalous acts? They had expressed no such abhorrence at all; and were, consequently, guilty of a criminal acquiescence in the offences which had been committed. He would take that opportunity of telling the West Indians, that, so long as they continued to shew such a total indifference to the due administration of justice, and the feelings of humanity, and such a contempt for the declared sense of that house and of the country, so long should he continue to take every opportunity of exposing unjust and unjustifiable proceedings. Censure had been cast upon the Wesleyan Society at home, for having manifested their disapprobation of certain resolutions published in Jamaica, by some of their missionaries; but, instead of censure, that body deserved the highest commendation for their immediate disclaimer of the unauthorized acts of a few of their missionaries, and for their bold and uncompromising avowal of the true principles of religion, justice, and humanity. That most respectable body had, very properly, declared their conviction, that slavery was inconsistent with Christianity. And, was there any man in that house who could rise and say, that slavery was consistent with Christianity—that the mild and benevolent spirit of Christianity warranted a system, under which the wife was torn from her husband, the child from its parent, the sister from her brother? When gentlemen set about founding measures of legislation on such a system, the ground sunk from under them: there was nothing in nature or in reason to support the superstructure. It was no wonder that the house should feel itself in an embarrassed situation, with regard to the government of these colonies: for, whenever an attempt was made to legislate on a system of slavery, difficulties would always arise, to perplex and confound the sagacity of the most skillful legislator.—He approved of the recent measures for sending out two bishops to the West Indies; but he sincerely regretted, that the first act of the bishop of Jamaica should have been to appoint the rev. Mr. Bridges as his chaplain—a gentleman who was only known as the libeller of Mr. Wilberforce. Such an appointment, he must acknowledge, had considerably shaken the trust which he might otherwise have been inclined to place in the new Establishment, for, however he might differ from many of the opinions of Mr. Wilberforce, he could not avoid saying, that that enlightened and benevolent man had, by his invaluable exertions to obtain an abolition of the barbarous traffic in human flesh, built up for himself a character, which time could not efface, and which was entitled to the applause and everlasting gratitude of every one who was an enemy of slavery.

Mr. Buxton said, that he was abundantly contented with the alteration of the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs; he had left what was all that he (Mr. Buxton) cared for—the declaration of the Commons of England, that they would have religious toleration in the West Indies. He rejoiced that the discussion had taken place, as it had given an opportunity to his learned friend (Mr. Brougham) to state the course he would pursue in the next session; and every man interested in the welfare of the negro population would join in considering the dedication of his most extraordinary talents to the cause, as the greatest matter of congratulation, which the abolitionists had yet enjoyed. He (Mr. Buxton) would hope, however, that the planters would avert the necessity of his learned friend's interference. He would entreat them to take warning before it was too late; he would say to them, "You have interests greater far than any other class; and interests which will be decided by your conduct now. The Abolitionists would pretend, that such enormities as those which had been described, are natural to slavery. They insinuate, that, in a state of society where one class are masters and the other slaves, there must be, and will be, cruelties, and blood, and a deadly hatred of all those who would impart knowledge or Christianity to the negro. But, it is your part to dispel the delusion, if it be one—to separate slavery from these its wretched accompaniments—to sever your system from a system of fierce persecution—to give the people of England the satisfaction of knowing, that there is law and justice for the negro and his teacher. You are in a perilous condition. The reproach of slave-holding is as much as you can endure. If you expect favour,—if you ask toleration from the people of England, you must demonstrate, that slavery is not inseparably connected with a host of other, and, if it be possible, greater evils than itself." If he were merely an enemy of slavery—if its extinction were the single (as it was the chief) object of his life—he would say—"Go on—persevere—open the eyes of the people of England. You have had your triumphs. The Missionary Smith sleeps in his grave, branded as a traitor—the Missionary Shrewsbury is an exile; his persecutors keep the anniversary of his sufferings, as a festival—the gallant Austin, because he acted with more true heroism than the conquerors of Austerlitz and Waterloo—because he singly stemmed the torrent of persecution, has lost his golden certainties of preferment, and is at this moment earning the scanty bread of a stipendiary curate in an English village. Proceed, then, faster and faster: you are doing our work: you are accelerating the downfall of slavery. A few more such triumphs, a few more such speaking testimonies to the merits of your system—and the people of England, with one heart, will abhor it, and with one voice will dissolve it." But, enemy as he was to slavery—and nothing human should win him or drive him to be any thing else than a free to slavery—he was not for its rapid and terrible overthrow; and, therefore, he raised his voice in that house, warning the planters, that if they repeated these outrages—that if they would link persecution to slavery—slavery, which already tottered, would fall.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Cape of Good Hope.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.—Sir N. Colthurst asked whether the commissioners at the Cape of Good Hope had made any report on the case of Mr. William Parker.

Mr. W. Horton replied, that he might almost reply in the negative.

Mr. Brougham said this was a droll answer to a very plain question. Nothing could surely be easier than to say "aye" or "no." If the hundredth part of what he had heard respecting Lord Charles Somerset should be confirmed by the report of the committee, it would be absolutely necessary to make a serious inquiry into the matter.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.—Mr. Hume rose to present a petition from Mr. Carnall, complaining of a series of oppressive acts to which he had been subjected at the Cape of Good Hope. It had been considered that British subjects resident in the colonies were entitled to all the rights and privileges which they enjoyed in their own country; but it would seem, from recent transactions, that they now enjoyed their liberty, property, and even their lives, at the will and pleasure of the respective Governors of our colonies. But he still trusted that if a case of clear oppression could be made out against the Government of any colony, the Government at home would not permit it to go unpunished. In this view the present case was an important one; all the circumstances detailed in the affidavit to which he begged to draw the attention of the house, had been verified on affidavit by the petitioner. To explain the case, he would enter on a short statement of facts. The petitioner first became acquainted with a Mr. Edwards, a notary at the Cape, in consequence of his having attended as a witness in a trial in which Edwards was concerned. On the 17th Sept. Mr. Edwards, then on his way from Cape-town to embark for Botany Bay, under sentence of transportation for having addressed a certain letter to the Governor, called, on the plea of sickness, at the petitioner's house, and was invited to breakfast. During breakfast Mr. Edwards retired, on some ordinary excuse, from the parlour, closely followed by the police-officer in attendance. He, by some means, then effected his escape; to which the petitioner averred he was no way accessory. On the news of this escape, the petitioner was forthwith seized by his Majesty's Fiscal, and committed to the gaol at Cape-town. He demanded to see the warrant of arrest; but none was produced. He was confined in a solitary cell, of about 10 feet by 12, from Dec. 17, to Dec. 24, with no other bedding allowed him for the first two nights than the stretcher and mattress on which the dead were laid out in prison, and both swarming with vermin. The petitioner was subject to fits, and was afflicted with several severe paroxysms during the first days of his imprisonment. But although suffering under these afflictions no relief was allowed him for several days, and throughout the greater part of his imprisonment he was kept in solitary confinement, and debarred from any intercourse with his wife or friends, deprived of every comfort, refused the refreshment of wine or spirits, and incessantly annoyed by petty vexations quite unnecessary to his security. At last he was brought to trial before two commissioners of the Court of Justice, and found guilty of having assisted in the escape of Edwards, on the testimony of a Hottentot girl in his service, who had since confessed that her evidence was all previously dictated to her by one of the Fiscal's men, and her obedience exacted under the threat of a severe flogging. He was sentenced to a fine of fifty rix-dollars and a year's banishment from the colony. It might have been supposed that all this had been sufficient to satisfy the rancour of his persecutors. But his Majesty's Fiscal—who, on his first examination had declared that he would pay off an "old grudge" to the petitioner—his Majesty's Fiscal not deeming that debt yet satisfied, appealed to another jurisdiction and again brought the petitioner to trial. The second sentence condemned him to 5 years' transportation to New South Wales—a sentence afterwards commuted to 5 years' banishment from the colony. He was further compelled to give security for complying with this sentence by a deposit of $2000 rix-dollars, and by other oppressive exactions. In the mean time his property was greatly damaged, and sold at a disadvantage; the proceeds were seized by Government; whether or not they had yet been given up, the petitioner was entirely ignorant, and in the meantime he was suffering under poverty, and reduced to total ruin.—Such, to omit details, were the main facts of this petition, which, in his opinion, detailed a case of as great hardship and injustice as it was possible to conceive. Every form of law and justice had been violated by the governor of the colony. It was repugnant to the principles of English law, that an individual should be tried for the same offence of which he had once been found guilty; but Mr. Carnall had twice been subjected to trial for the same offence. The hon. member concluded by declaring that the state of the law and of the government of the Cape of Good Hope was utterly intolerable. The powers of the Governor—put into operation under the semblance of legal proceeding—were so tremendous, that certain ruin was the portion of any man who became in the slightest degree, obnoxious to him. This was a condition of things which could not continue; it was a disgrace to the country that it should have lasted so long; and the Colonial Department would have much to answer for, if he could show—as he believed he should do if the case were referred to a committee—that Lord Bathurst and his colleagues were perfectly aware of its existence. For the present he should move, that the petition should lie on the table.

Mr. W. Horton rose to justify the conduct of the Colonial Department, and not to discuss the merits of the petitioner's complaint. The hon. member spoke as if the petitioner's punishment were the arbitrary act of the Governor. It was no such thing; it was the sentence of a court of justice. The petitioner had applied to the Colonial Department for redress; but was it contended that the Colonial Department ought to remit the penalty inflicted by a court of law upon the mere affidavit of the party suffering it? If such were to be the doctrine, what colony could continue to exist? All that the Government at home could properly do, was to give relief where it was distinctly shown that injustice had been sustained. It was well known to what an extent this attempt was carried through the country to get up a feeling against the Government at the Cape. Since the month of Jan. 1894, there had been no less than twenty-four articles in one newspaper, inculcating the Government of that colony. The house was aware, that in the year 1823, a commission had been sent out to the Cape; did the hon. member for Aberdeen mean to impugn the character of the persons who composed it? Were they fit for the duty assigned to them? If they were, Government could do no more. The business of the commissioners was to assimilate the Dutch law to the English. That was a work which could not be done in a moment. They were farther to inquire into the administration of the law generally, and to report to the Government at home their opinions on that subject. Could more beneficial measures be taken or suggested? At the time when this very act of which the petitioner complained had been committed, these commissioners would be found to have been at the Cape; was it likely that, under such circumstances, any thing very flagrant would have been attempted? The petitioner had written to the Colonial Department, in terms sufficiently decided. He demanded that his sentence should be remitted, and compensation made him for the loss which he had sustained. Of course, the only answer which could be returned had been returned—that the authorities in England had nothing yet before them to warrant such a proceeding. He did not mean by any thing he had said, to depreciate investigation into the circumstances of the Cape; but he thought that the house ought to wait for the report of the commissioners of inquiry (hear, hear).

Sir M. W. Ridley and Mr. Ridley Colborne bore testimony to the high character and capabilities of one of the commissioners, Mr. Bigg.

Mr. Hume said that it should be ordered, and the sooner it was done the better, that every Governor of a colony, the moment he sentenced an individual to banishment, should send home all the circumstances of his trial and offence. As matters stood, the constant answer, when any atrocity was complained of, was—that Government was not yet in possession of proper information on the subject.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.—Mr. Brougham said that he had a petition to present from Mr. Bishop Burnett, of the Cape of Good Hope, which stated sundry proceedings regarding the government of that colony, which were highly deserving the consideration of the house. He would open to the house the facts stated in the petition, and would then beg leave to lay it on the table, premising thus much—that he did not intend to make himself liable for the truth of the petitioner's statements. He had, however, made such inquiries of the petitioner respecting his statements, as had convinced him, from the tests to which he had put the petitioner's accuracy, that he was at least consistent in the story he told. The petitioner stated, that in the year 1820 he went out, under a contract with Government, as a settler in the district of

Albany, in the Cape of Good Hope; that he expended more than 20,000 six-dollars in prosecution of his design, and in order to show the house the lucrative nature of the speculation in which he employed it, declared that he had been offered from 7,000 to 10,000 dollars as the estimated gross produce of his first year's returns. The petitioner said that he had to complain of the proceedings of the colonial courts of law. He stated that he had been engaged in a suit at law with one Robert Hart, for the recovery of 900 dollars; that Robert Hart proceeded through forms of law with which he was utterly unacquainted to judgment against him, and that in consequence of that judgment he prepared to make a public sale of the petitioner's property. The judgment was followed up by a publication of his insolvency, though he had at that time a bond fide claim upon the Commissariat for forage he had supplied to it. He further declared that the sale had been as arbitrarily suspended by the Colonial Government as it had been illegally threatened, and that in spite of every remonstrance he had made on the subject, the affair had remained in abeyance for two years, notwithstanding the public judicial declaration of a Commission of Circuit that these proceedings were in error, and that the petitioner was not insolvent. He then instituted proceedings both against Robert Hart and the public sequestrator, for their attempt to ruin him by a false declaration of insolvency; but he found the proceedings of the Commission of Circuit so illegal and corrupt, as to convince him that no redress was to be obtained from such a quarter. He found that he had not only to struggle with the corruptness of the courts, but also with the decided enmity of the Colonial Government; in short, that Lord C. Somerset was his decided personal enemy (hear). The petitioner considered the cause of that enmity to be a fear on the part of the Governor lest there should be a scrutiny into his conduct by the Commissioners of Inquiry who had been sent out to the Cape of Good Hope, and a wish to get rid of a person who could give such strong evidence against him as the petitioner. The petitioner proceeded to state, that he found it his duty to represent his case in a memorial to his Excellency, with a bond fide view of obtaining inquiry and redress. His Excellency, however, not only did not institute any inquiry into the merits of the petitioner's memorial, but treated it after the precedent of James II., as a libel on the Government, and placed it in the hands of the fiscal for prosecution as a libel. Now, if this fact were true, it was a ground of impeachment against Lord C. Somerset (hear, hear). That was his opinion as a lawyer, and he had no doubt of its correctness (hear, hear). A prosecution for libel was begun. The petitioner stated, that "as no lex loci was applicable to his case, as there was no English statute nor Dutch decree, nor even summary enactment of a Cape proclamation, the fiscal obtained his conviction upon his own warranted assumption of Roman practice"—which Roman practice, if it alluded to the lex regia, was the most arbitrary of all practice, amounting in one stage of it to the infliction of capital punishment—"both contrary to the laws of the ten tables, of the pandects of Justinian, the acknowledged bases of that code by which the Batavian republic and its provinces had hitherto been governed." The result of the proceeding was, that the pe-

tioner was sentenced to five years' banishment from the colony for presenting a memorial to his Excellency which it was his duty to receive. The petitioner next complained of an attempt which had been made to charge him with the fabrication of a libel which had been issued against Lord Somerset, containing charges of the grossest kind; a libel which the petitioner declared he was as incapable of uttering, as Lord Somerset of perpetrating the atrocious practices to which it referred. The real author of this publication was a certain Jones, who proved to be no other than Mr. Oliver, the celebrated spy. He dared to say that Edwards and the illustrious Castles were there also: Why not? The patronage they had enjoyed at home was equally due to them abroad. But Oliver was assuredly there, engaged in the atrocious occupation at what he was so skilful. Such were the charges of the petition. It complained that the judicial institutions of the colony gave no adequate securities to the enjoyment of personal liberty and the rights of property. That the business of the commissariat department, instead of an open bidding for the supply of the rations for the troops, was settled by a private tender. The consequence was, that 23 stivers and a fraction were paid to the bailiff of the Governor's establishment for rations, which the petitioner says he would have gladly supplied at 10 stivers. He confessed that to himself and his colleagues about him this and the following charges looked and savoured too much of profit—they had, as it were, too lucrative an aspect. The next charge was relative to the exchanges of money, which were observed to run peculiarly in favour of his Excellency's arrangements, accordingly as his affairs required them. Whether he had to draw or to remit, he was sure to be fortunate with the exchanges. In cases of appeal to his Excellency from the tribunals, little good was to be expected, according to the petitioner, from the present administration of that court. A Dutchman of the name of Dune had succeeded in causes wherein he was appellant to his Excellency, "shortly after the purchase of one of his Excellency's horses for 10,000 dollars, which died after payment, and before delivery from the stables." He wished the house to consider this transaction. Ten thousand dollars for a horse! Why this was the dearest horse that ever was known since the horse of Troy; and it ought to prove as fatal either to the petitioner or the Governor as the contents of that renowned wooden horse did to the people of Troy. There was something peculiar in the nature of these things, which required explanation. He did not think the Governor capable of a twentieth part of the charges generally made against him: but if he were justly to be suspected of one half of these—if he believed there was evidence to support one half, he should feel it his duty as a member of parliament to impeach him. After some further remarks on the delay of the commissioners to the Cape in presenting their report, he said he should move, in the first place, for leave to bring up the petition.

Mr. W. Horton thought that the learned gent. had not treated him with the usual courtesy in not informing him of his intention to present Mr. Burnett's petition. He was happy that he chanced to be present. If the learned gent. would move for official correspondence on the subject, he would not object to its being laid on the table. This petition contained many charges which, in common with other charges against Lord Somerset, were matters of notoriety. In many points it would be necessary to wait for the report of the commission, before answers could be made to those charges. But one of the main charges was directed against the Judicial Establishments of the colony. Now the principal object for which the commission was constituted was with a view to assimilate the Dutch Law at present prevailing in the colony, to the English. As to the charge respecting the commissariat, he had never heard of it before. Undoubtedly, it deserved inquiry. As to that respecting the rates of exchange, measures had recently been adopted which would prevent the recurrence of any such transactions, if any such had taken place. Of the allegations of the petitioner on the subject he did not believe one word. The proposition was so monstrous, that on a prima facie view he had instantly rejected it. With regard to the allegation respecting the Dutchman and his cause, all that appeared, even in the petition itself, was a coincidence between an act of the Governor in his judicial capacity, and the act in his private character of selling a horse. Now he was sure he need not caution the house against giving ready credence to such reports as those, which assigned this transaction to an unworthy motive. If a twentieth part of the charges which had been preferred against Lord Somerset were true, he would be the first man to protest against such conduct, and was quite ready to second any proposition which the learned gent. might make upon it. But it was his bounden duty, in justice to Lord Somerset, to say that there was evidence which in his mind went to prove, that there was, to a certain degree, a conspiracy existing against that noble lord. The house should pause in giving credence to petitions urged on individual suggestion against persons holding high and responsible situations under government, and within the regular control of parliament.

Mr. Brougham said, that he would take an early opportunity of putting the sincerity of the hon. gent. to the test, in his offer to produce the correspondence. Would he, to begin the experiment, produce the correspondence of Sir Rufane Donkin? If, after this, it were refused, he should know what to think.

Mr. W. Horton declared that he was utterly unconscious of any correspondence of Sir Rufane Donkin being in his office, which contained any specific charges against Lord C. Somerset.

Mr. Brougham said, that he did not at first believe that Government would be willing to give up the correspondence. The hon. gent. chose to qualify what he had said. He had only spoken of the correspondence without saying that it contained any specific charge. By the conduct of the hon. gent. he was confirmed in his first belief.

Mr. Baring said, that the present debate was a proof of the bad system which had been set up for the government of this colony. Formerly, this country colonized upon a different plan; and by giving better institutions, she had established one colony, the power of which was likely to transcend that of any other state in the world. Latterly, the Government seemed to have adopted the Spanish principle of colonies; a little despotic government was set over each of them. He suggested, as a remedy to these grievances, the establishment, in each colony, of a representative system. As long as the power remained despotic—no matter who was chief governor—it was not in human nature that it should continue for any time without abuses.

Mr. Hume was afraid that there was no very well-founded hope of seeing any report from these commissioners. He had seen a gentleman from the colony very recently, who had assured him that there was nothing there but arbitrary and despotic power. Any one obnoxious to the Government authorities was removed without difficulty. This petitioner was banished for five years, merely for sending in a memorial. Did the Governor send home any copy of it, or his own proceedings upon it? What grounds did he give for his own sentence? The hon. Sec. would find that the same opinions pervaded all minds in the colony. The 10,000 dollars for the Governor's horse were considered there as a most unquestionable bribe for the settling of an appeal in favour of the purchaser. The colonists looked upon themselves as being under a corrupt and despotic government. He had entertained some hopes of Mr. Biggs till now: recent accounts however had almost proved to him that they were groundless. Let the hon. gent. look well to it. Property would not be embarked in any undertaking on those shores, while the rights of property and of personal liberty were so much at stake. He (Mr. Hume) assured the house that he advanced what he had offered upon the testimony of men whose veracity had never been doubted.

Mr. W. Horton advised the hon. member to move for such papers as he thought necessary, giving the customary notice. He was not there to stand up for the system of Dutch and Roman law, which he admitted to be bad. But the Government had taken the very course now prescribed. It had not only appointed commissioners to make a general investigation, but it had within these few months, of its own free motion, directed that there should be a council appointed to act with the Chief Governor, and that they should take and remit minutes of their proceedings, bringing the colony, as far as they could, into conformity with the system of Indian Government.

Mr. Elliot said, that Government ought certainly to effect a revision of colonial law. Most of the colonies were governed by some old system now got into disuse in the countries from which the laws were derived. In the French colonies the old Bourbon law prevailed, though that was rejected at home in favour of the code Napoleon. And now upon a case of any complexity, even the French themselves could not agree upon the proper interpretation of it. Another great evil in matters of colonial law, was the fluctuation of the orders in council, which strangely unsettled it.

Mr. Brougham said, that if instead of moving that the petition should lie on the table, he should move to refer it to a select committee, it seemed that he would be doing that which best suited the views of all parties. Lord C. Somerset ought not to be the sport and victim of charges loosely ventilated in that house. If those charges were untrue, they ought to be able to punish the authors of such misstatements. Lord C. Somerset ought to challenge investigation, and Government ought to wish for it. If, however, the hon. gent. opposite objected to a select committee, he would for the present content himself with having the petition laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. Hume put a question respecting Edwards, to know if any measures had been taken in consequence of his banishment from the colony to which he was sent.

Mr. W. Horton said, that by subsequent accounts it appeared that Edwards had run away.

Mr. Brougham gave notice, that he would on Tuesday next move to refer the petition to a select committee.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.—Mr. Brougham postponed his motion relative to the petition of Mr. Bishop Burnett until next session. Upon consideration, he thought it would be very unjust to open charges which, from the probable duration of this session, could not be answered.

Mr. Canning said that he had not been present when the petition was presented; but he had made inquiries since. He found that the circumstances had been referred to the commissioners sent out to the Cape. Leave of absence had also been forwarded to Lord C. Somerset, that he might, if he thought fit, return to meet the charges against him. But whether his lordship came home or not, the commissioners would prosecute their inquiry at the Cape; and until some return were made from them, no opinion could be formed on the case.

Mr. Brougham admitted that it would be unjust to agitate this subject now, when there was no chance for his lordship to be heard in his justification—especially under the circumstances detailed by the rt. hon. gent.

Lord E. Somerset seized the first opportunity which presented itself of assuring the house, that his noble relative was most anxious that his whole conduct, and the measures of his government should be submitted to the investigation of Parliament. The rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs had said that there were commissioners sent out to inquire. Undoubtedly it would be the first object of his noble relative to give the utmost facilities to the views of the commissioners. The sooner the investigation commenced, the sooner would his noble relative be relieved from the abuse and the attacks which were poured forth upon him. The libels which were uttered both here and at the Cape were numerous and atrocious; some of them were so inconsistent with themselves that they destroyed their own credibility. He implored the house to suspend their judgment (hear, hear), until the report of the commissioners had arrived. If his noble relative thought that his justification should need it, he would, without hesitation, avail himself of the leave of absence, and return home.

Mr. Brougham, to quiet the feelings of the noble lord who had just spoken, declared that he had never read a line against Lord C. Somerset, except so much as was contained in the petition; and except that petition, and a case in which he was engaged before the Privy Council, he had never heard of any charge being made against the noble lord.

TUESDAY, JULY 5.—Mr. Brougham presented a petition from Mr. Bishop Burnett, of the Cape of Good Hope, requesting leave to return to the Cape for the purpose of collecting evidence before the contemplated inquiry in the ensuing session of Parliament.

Mr. Hume said that Mr. Burnett had been banished from the Cape of Good Hope by Lord C. Somerset, and it was necessary that he should return thither to obtain evidence in support of his petition. He wished to know if he would be permitted to do so?

Mr. W. Horton said, that it would be necessary for the petitioner to show that he really had cause for proceeding again to the Cape, notwithstanding his sentence.

Government of Ceylon.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.—Mr. Hume moved for a copy of the regulation of the government of Ceylon, dated the 12th of Jan. 1824, for removing all doubts respecting the right of the Governor of the island to arrest and detain in custody any person or persons for the same; a copy of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Colombo, of the same date, in the case of "The King v. John Daniel Rosier;" and for copies of all correspondence which had passed between the Government of Ceylon and the Colonial Office, on the subject of the same transaction. The ground of the motion was, that Rosier had been illegally arrested at Colombo, and, moreover, that the judgment of the Supreme Court upon that arrest wholly nullified the effect of the writ of Habeas Corpus in Ceylon. Mr. Rosier had been seized on board the ship Madras, which touched at Colombo on her way from Calcutta to England, and detained in custody, contrary to law, until the vessel departed, leaving him a prisoner.

Mr. W. Horton said, that Rosier was a deserter from the East India Company's service, and he believed that the Governor of Ceylon, Sir A. Campbell, had power to detain him. He had not the smallest objection to the production of all papers on the subject.

The papers were ordered to be laid upon the table.

Hindoo Widows.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.—Mr. Hume said that he would call the attention of the house to a subject which, he regretted to say, had not been noticed in an earlier part of the session. He alluded to the Government of India permitting the practice of women immolating themselves on the funeral piles of their deceased husbands. He held in his hand a petition upon the subject, and it would be impossible for any member to give his attention to the subject without very anxiously feeling a desire that an end should be put to so revolting a practice. He wished to know when the hon. member for Weymouth intended to bring forward the subject, as he was in possession of a great mass of information relating to it. The evil was of a great magnitude: in the Presidency of Bengal alone, the numbers of immolations were as follow:—

1821	-	-	654

It was surprising that the greatest number of these were at Calcutta, where the religion was the purest. This practice, he could take upon himself to say, was not enjoined by, or consistent with the Hindoo religion, and it was the opinion of the best informed people in that country, that an end might be put to this inhuman practice, without exciting commotion or danger of any sort.

Mr. F. Buxton stated, that he had refrained from bringing this subject before the house, chiefly on account of the Burmese war; and the topics both of a civil and military character which had been agitated on that continent within the last two years. As the peculiar feelings to which these topics had given rise had passed away, he proposed in the first week of the next session to bring the question directly before the house. He remarked, that from the returns already made in five years, there had been in the province of Bengal alone 3,400 females burnt on the piles of their husbands. The real amount probably went far beyond the returns. He had been assured that the real numbers would be more like 10,000 than 3,000, in the province of Bengal alone. He feared that the conduct of government had unintentionally promoted this wickedness. The police of the Indian Government were required to attend the burnings, but they were directed not to interfere. This was construed into a silent acquiescence in these abominations. Now, what rendered these facts the more melancholy was, that the practice itself was not absolutely required by the Hindoo religion. Many of their Pundits had written expressly against it. Menu, their greatest law authority, merely said, that the widow must be prepared to practise austerities—to live chaste, retired, and abstemiously, or else she ought to ascend the funeral pile of her husband. A native author had described the descent of Albuquerque on the territory of Goa, and added, that his countrymen said much good of him, because he put a stop to the burnings. Some of the most active and intelligent of the local magistrates and judges had recorded their opinions that the practice might be put a stop to by the mere will of the British Government, and that the natives would be highly gratified with the change.

Mr. Tynt said that, the design of moving for a committee in the next session had been so directly avowed, that he having had considerable experience in this matter, from a long residence in India, could not refrain from giving some expression to his sentiments on this occasion. His mind was made up—that it would be highly dangerous for the British Government to interfere with a violent band in any thing which concerned the religious rites of the Hindoos. He had known a native of that country, the most enlightened of all the Asiatics whom he had met with, who was sufficiently convinced of the superiority of European education to make him resolve to have his children brought up in their schools. In a conversation with this person upon these burnings, enlightened as he was, and well inclined to Europeans and their manners, he justified the practice and said, "That is a point of our religion, and your Government must not interfere with it."

Mr. Wynn was convinced that parliament could do nothing in this matter with any propriety. They could not make laws for so vast a continent as they might for a limited territory, inhabited by people of one religion and one common sentiment. They were to consider the varieties of population and feelings, and other circumstances which must belong to a country measuring 2,000 miles from north to south, and the same from east to west. The task of suppressing the practice must be left to the discretion of the local authorities, and the directions which they would receive on that head from the Board of Directors.

Sir C. Forbes said, that when Lord Wellesley was in India, 30 years ago, he might, had he not been restrained, have put an end to this practice at a blow. He had shown his power by the peremptory suppression of infanticide, which was as stoutly defended on the score of superstition as the practice of burning widows. But the case had materially altered. Since then religious jealousies had been awakened. A formidable church establishment had been erected; shoals of missionaries had been sent among them, and their feelings had been wrought up to an unprecedented degree of hostility. Still Government would do well to compel the Directors, and through them the local authorities, to interfere. The sacrifices were not voluntary. In every case they were the effect of persuasions from the Brahmins and the relatives of the women. The miserable victims would be happy to take refuge from these cruel suggestions under a law of the British Legislature. Until something of this kind were done, it would be in vain to expect from the local authorities any efficient means for suppressing the abominable rites.

Sir E. Hyde East was convinced not only of the impolicy of interfering, but that the sacrifices themselves were considerably increased by the repeated discussions in Parliament. He attributed many of them to the growing jealousy of the natives, and the shoals of missionaries who had mingled with them. If these men merely preached the Gospel, he would have no objection to their teachings; they might persuade the unfortunate widows, in the language of the apostle, that it was better to marry than to burn, but nothing effectual would be done by parliamentary interference.

Mr. Money referred the house to several instances in the reports, wherein local magistrates, intent on the discharge of their duty, had, by mere persuasion, prevented the burnings. In one province it had been prohibited, and the natives rested satisfied; nor were they known in a single instance to have sought an opportunity of eluding that regulation, though they had only to cross a river and enter the Mahratta territory, where they would be entirely free from it, and at full liberty to effect their cruel sacrifices.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

East India Judges' Bill.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.—On the motion that this bill be committed,

Mr. Hume adverted to a provision which was contained in the fourth page of the bill, by which the recorder of Prince of Wales's Island was liable to be removed from his situation, at the pleasure of his Majesty. He wished to know, why the person appointed to the recordership should be placed in a situation different from other judges, who held their appointment for life?

Mr. Wynn said, the provision in question was not a new one, but was in conformity with the act or charter under which a recorder had been originally appointed. The only alteration in the present bill, was an enactment by which the judges were paid in India instead of British currency.

Mr. Hume objected to the appointment of a judge who was removable at pleasure. Such a system was dangerous as affecting the independence of judges. The house, perhaps, was not aware, that Indian governors had sometimes punished even jurors, because they had done their duty. If a judge were also liable to the visitation of power, he would be placed in a situation where he might find it beneficial to his interest not to perform his duty. It would not be forgotten, that at a former period Sir H. Gwillim had been removed from Madras, in consequence of a dispute between him and the Government. The system of intimidation was carried to such an extent that no man who differed from the Government could hope to escape proscription. Many persons had been banished, and within the last month two indigo planters had arrived in England, having been deported from India without notice or trial. It became the duty of the house to consider whether such a system could safely be allowed to endure. The half-castes were not allowed to sit on juries, and yet they were allowed to hold land; while Englishmen who possessed the former privilege were wholly precluded from the latter. It was quite necessary that some system should be established for securing the independence of the judges in India, and interposing the protection of a jury between British subjects and the public authorities.

Mr. Wynn said, that the judges were in fact independent of the local authorities, and could only be removed by the Crown. He admitted the possibility of disputes arising between the judges and the governors, but even in such cases the difficulty, almost the impossibility of bringing over the witnesses necessary for investigating them, rendered the exercise of a discretionary power necessary. He would be quite ready to give his attention to any measure which should propose a practicable remedy to the existing defects.

Dr. Phillimore said, that if any alteration were necessary, it must be provided for by another bill; but that now under discussion contemplated nothing but a change in the judges' salaries.

Mr. Hume had no objection to the judges' salaries being raised, but he complained that the most important interests of India were neglected, while such paltry considerations as these occupied the attention of the house. The hon. gent. read an extract from a letter, written from India, setting forth the evils of the present system; and concluded by asserting that it was unavoidably necessary to restrain without delay the power which the Government at present possessed of transporting any individuals who might become obnoxious to them.

Mr. Wynn had no wish to prolong the discussion, but he would tell the hon. gent. that the judges of India were as honourable and independent as any of those in this country. The greatest care had been taken in their selection, and in their subsequent conduct they had never shown themselves subservient to the power of the governors. The power of deportation was granted by the last charter, and when it should again come to be considered by the house, it might be restrained in such a manner as the circumstances might authorize.

Mr. Hume had no doubt of the ability of the judges in India, but they ought to be as independent as they were able. He suggested the appointment of a temporary judge in cases of vacancy, in the same manner as was provided in case of vacancy among the members of council.

Mr. Wynn saw several objections to the proposed change, especially to the temporary appointment of a barrister as judge, who must afterwards descend to the bar.

Mr. Hume objected to the clause empowering the authorities of India to transport offenders to Prince of Wales's Island, or any other place, to which they might at present be sentenced, because the climate of that island was such as to ensure the death of almost any European who should be condemned to hard labour there.

Sir C. Forbes proposed, that the salaries of the judges should be raised from 48,000 to 60,000 rupees, and moved an amendment to that effect.

Sir C. Cole seconded the amendment.

Mr. Wynn said, the late loss of life rendered it necessary to offer every temptation to persons qualified to fill these offices. The proposed alteration amounted to not more than 200l. per annum, and he therefore thought it was not worth while to adopt it.

The amendment was carried.

On the clause which enacted, "that one year's salary should be given to the family or next representative of a judge dying in India,"

Sir C. Forbes proposed, that if a judge should die on his passage out, his next representative should be entitled to a full year's salary.

Mr. Brougham approved of the amendment. He also thought that judges should be entitled to a pension after seven years service, instead of ten years, as was the practice at present.

The Chairman reported progress, &c.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.—The order of the day for the further consideration of the report on the Judges' Salaries bill having been read,

Mr. Hume said, he was desirous of proposing a clause to enable natives and half-castes to serve on juries in the presidencies of Madras and Bombay. The courts-martial in India were composed solely of natives, and the manner in which they were conducted was such as to give the highest satisfaction. He should follow up this motion with other clauses, empowering the several high sheriffs of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, &c. to summon on grand and special juries, according to their several qualifications, all subjects of the King born within any of such presidencies, or other parts of India under the protection of the British flag; and also to make foreigners within our jurisdiction, service, or protection, in India, competent to serve on juries; and if the house should entertain these clauses, he would finally move another, empowering the same parties to serve as jurors on civil cases in India (hear).

On the first clause being read,

Mr. Wynn opposed it in its present shape, at the same time concurring in the principle which recognized the eligibility of our native subjects in India to serve as jurors generally. But he did not think that to enable them to act as jurors in civil cases would be an arrangement which would operate beneficially for the interests of our Indian empire. The rt. hon. gent. intimated his intention of bringing the subject, in a different form, before parliament in an early period of the next session.

Mr. W. Smith thought that the clause should not be brought in at the tail of the session. That there should be some intermediate judges between the Europeans in India and their Indian subjects, between those who commanded and those who obeyed, was a matter of the most essential consequence to the welfare and best interests of both parties. But he should apprehend that the mere expression of a strong opinion to this effect by the rt. hon. gent. would answer every purpose in view.

Mr. Trant observed, that if the hon. member, in consequence of what had fallen from the rt. hon. gent. had not yet given up his intention of moving for an enquiry into the administration of justice in India, he would recommend him to consult a very able book on that subject, by Mr. Fullerton, at that time a member of Sir Thomas Munro's council at Madras, and now Governor of Prince of Wales's Island. The hon. gent. read a long extract from the work in question, tending to show the cumbersome and unwieldy system of the present proceedings in the native courts. If, however, it should not be the intention of the hon. member for Aberdeen to persist in this intention, he pledged himself, should be, in the next session, have the honour of a seat in that house, and it should appear that the rt. hon. President of the Board of Control was not inclined to originate any such proposition as he had promised to do in respect of Madras, he would himself submit a motion for the adoption of the inquiry in question. (hear).

Mr. Hume, in consequence of what had been said by the rt. hon. gent. would consider whether he would not bring in a bill hereafter, and the clause was withdrawn.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 30.—The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of the Judges' Salaries bill.

The Marquis of Lansdown objected to the exclusion of that part of the population called half-cast from all civil duties, a practice which he thought likely to be attended with disagreeable consequences. He advised the extending to juries in India the power of assessing damages in civil cases; and he also suggested the propriety of allowing natives to sit on juries. As they performed every kind of military duty, he thought it was time to consider how far it was practicable to make the more respectable part of the natives discharge civil duties.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the suggestions of the noble marquis could not then be made a subject of consideration. Whether right or wrong, they had no reference to the measure before their lordships.

The bill was then read a third time.

Banishment of British Subjects from India.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, FEB. 24.—Mr. Hume rose to submit a motion on this subject. It was well known that the India Company had the power of banishing any persons who interfered with the trade of that country. This power continued until the 53 Geo. III. by which the trade was in a great measure thrown open to all British subjects trading from England. If he understood this act rightly, it was intended to give a vent to the capital of Great Britain; but the practice which had since grown up, was, he thought, in opposition to the spirit of that act. That law declared in substance that no man was to be removed by the mere freak or whim of any

Governor or President in India, and that such removal should only be ordered in cases where the presence of the particular individual was likely to disturb the country. Nearly half of those at present trading and residing in India had not a regular licence to remain. They had been permitted to remain and to trade, but it mattered not, in his opinion, whether a man had a licence to remain or not; if he were settled there, it was unjust, and against the spirit of the act, to send him away. Under the government of Mr. Adam and Lord Amherst, many persons who had been settled in India, in a prosperous trade, had their prospects entirely ruined by being sent out of the country. Many of those persons had been long settled in the country; and he would contend that their banishment was an act of great cruelty and injustice. It was said that the exercise of such a power was justified by the act of Parliament. If it were, he maintained that such an act was against justice and policy. It was not necessary for his purpose to detail acts of this kind, which had originated in personal feelings and motives; but, leaving such cases out of consideration, he would assert that the effect of the general practice was, that no person in any of the presidencies durst express his opinions, if those opinions should be hostile to the Government. Some Governors were, he knew, more liberal in this respect. Lord Hastings, for instance, did not think it beneath him to submit his conduct to the opinions of the European population in India; and though the proceedings of the noble lord in this instance were not quite pleasing to the Government at home, yet it showed his liberal feeling on the subject. The conduct of Governor Adam and of Lord Amherst in this respect was quite different. They had sent away certain individuals for the expression of opinions through the medium of the press, and had enacted such restrictions on the press in general, that a general gloom was cast over the public mind in that country; and the fear of deportation was so prevalent, that no man dared express his real sentiments upon what was passing in the country. The consequence was, that the people of this country were, generally speaking, as ignorant of what was passing in India, as of what was done in Japan. A war was now raging in India, and yet the English public knew scarcely any thing about it. The effects of this system of restriction on the press were seen in the deportation of Mr. Buckingham from India, and in the atrocious conduct pursued towards Mr. Arnot. After such conduct, the persons at present connected with the press in India could only pursue one course: if they wished to remain in India, they must remain silent on all subjects the discussion of which might be displeasing to the Government there. He had in his possession two notes sent to individuals connected with the press of India, cautioning them against any notice of the case of Mr. Buckingham, or of the conduct of the Government in general. Such a system was, he contended, contrary to the spirit of the regulations established when the courts of Calcutta were formed in 1775. It was then declared, that every person resident in India should be under the protection of British law. In the recent cases, that protection had been wholly withdrawn, or set at naught by the local authorities. It had been lately the fashion to say, that the British possessions in India hung by a thread. This he denied. While we maintained an army of 250,000 men in that country, it was impossible that we should lose our possessions there. But the best way to ensure the permanence of our power, would be to allow the exposure of delinquencies by the press. If that were prevented, mischiefs of the most serious nature would ensue. He concluded by moving for "a return, showing the number of British-born and other European subjects removed from any of our presidencies in India by order of the local governments, or by direction of the Company here, stating the cause of such removal, and whether it had been attended with personal arrest or imprisonment; and if so, for what period, and where, and whether such arrest had been followed by any judicial proceeding; the return to include the names of all persons so banished from the year 1784 up to the present year."

Mr. Wynn said, that by the act of 1793, any man resident in India without a licence was guilty of a high misdemeanor, for which he was punishable by fine and imprisonment; and that the act of 1814, which made no difference as to the amount of the offence, only gave the authorities leave to send him out of India without subjecting him to a public trial. The hon. member had made several observations relative to the manner in which the permission to remain in India was granted by the Governor-general. In answer, he would observe, that the act provided, that if the Governor-general found any individual resident in India without a licence, and granted him permission to remain there, he should state in his despatches to the Court of Directors his reason for granting such permission. This was the most easy and natural mode of proceeding; for it would be very hard indeed upon the Governor-general to call upon him to state his reasons for sending an individual away. The hon. member had also said that no person could go to India without the special leave of the Court of Directors, thereby insinuating that it was matter of some difficulty to obtain it. The applications which had been made for such leave since 1814, were 963; of these 743 had met with a successful issue from the Court of Directors, and 41 with the same from the Board of Control: so that in the whole period there had not been more than 179 refusals. The hon. member had found fault with the act, because it provided that a man without a licence might be removed by the Governor-general's power alone. Now, he could inform the hon. member, that no man could be removed by the power of the Governor-general alone, but only by the Governor-general in council. Therefore, every member of the council had a right to state his opinion with regard to the propriety of removal, and thus there was some control upon that arbitrary exercise of power against which the hon. member had claimed so warmly. He was ready to give in substance all the information for which the hon. gent. asked, though he could not consent to his vague and extensive motion. He would therefore move, as an amendment, that "there be laid on the table of the house a return of all persons removed from, or ordered to quit India, from the year 1784 to the present time, on the ground of their being found in India without a licence; together with a return of all persons whose licence or permission to remain in India had been revoked, stating the special ground of each revocation, distinguishing the persons who had licences from those who had received permission to remain, stating whether such removal had been preceded by any personal arrest or imprisonment, for what time and at what place in India, or preceded or followed by any judicial proceedings in India or elsewhere."

Mr. Hume submitted to the amendment, though he said it would by no means fully answer his object.—The amendment was then carried without a division.

Imprisonment in India.

TUESDAY JUNE 7.—Mr. Hume said, that he moved two years ago, for returns of persons confined by the several governments of India, without the form of trial, for reasons of state policy, or other pretences of the like nature. As the power of arbitrary imprisonment was in all countries to be watched jealously, so there were reasons which made it particularly desirable that there should be strict limits put to its exercise in India. The peculiar character of the country, and the defenceless state of the people—their distance from the Supreme Government—every thing tended to create objections to the exercise of the power of imprisonment without first instituting legal proceedings. In a former debate, the rt. hon. Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs had been understood to express a wish that there should be a law passed to prevent appeals to the Supreme Government from the decisions of the presidents in council. He considered that this observation of itself greatly aggravated the dangers of abuse. He did not say that Europeans had often been imprisoned arbitrarily; but there could be no doubt that many natives, of high caste, must have suffered under circumstances of hopelessness and solitude, to think upon which must be appalling to the minds of Englishmen. At all events, if the existence of such a power were requisite, the greatest precautions were necessary for its control. He concluded by moving for returns of "all persons imprisoned by the Governors in council of the several presidencies of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, without the institution of judicial proceedings, and without a verdict obtained against them; distinguishing the number in each government in each year; the time, place, and all other circumstances of their actual imprisonment; the causes which induced the governments thereto, the periods of confinement, and the age, sex, and rank of the parties."

Mr. Wynn said, that the returns were incomplete for Bengal, which was the most considerable presidency, though for the others they were made up. He agreed in the principle of the hon. gent., that the power of arbitrary imprisonment ought to be rarely exercised, and that it should be carefully watched. But there were circumstances which made it impossible for the Government to do without it in India. Individuals might, in consequence of the wars in which they were engaged occasionally with the natives, and other political circumstances of a threatening nature, be subjected to restraint or actual imprisonment from the necessity of the case, without reference to their guilt or innocence. The sons of Tippoo Saib were under the strict observation of Government. He could easily conceive reasons which would make it indispensably necessary to restrain their liberty, though he was not aware of an offence which could be imputed to them. He had no objection to the motion, though he did not believe that the returns would furnish any good grounds of complaint against the resident governments.

Sir C. Forbes thought that it would be more advisable for his hon. friend to move for copies of the memorials addressed to the Supreme Government, and forwarded to the India House, by persons suffering under arbitrary confinement. He was afraid that it was too common a case for the governments there to keep back memorials from the directors, while the parties were languishing in hopeless confinement. One case he knew of. The Rajah of Anginore had fallen under the suspicion of the resident government for no other apparent reason but that he was beloved by his subjects. His aunt, or sister, more subservient to the British authorities, was put in his place. He had been in close confinement 15 years. In that period he had remitted three memorials. He had seen the copy of one of them, and mentioned it to a director, who assured him that no such paper had reached this country. He very much regretted the little attention which was given to India affairs in Parliament. The very mention of India, it had been said by a foreigner, was enough to clear the house. He regretted the discontinuance of the custom of bringing forward in every session an Indian budget—a practice which was first discontinued when Lord Mulgrave was at the head of the Board of Control. The temptations to acts of tyranny and arbitrary power would be much fewer, and the complaints of grievances would gradually cease altogether, because parliament would find remedies for them all. He remembered what the rt. hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs had said upon those appeals. No doubt, considering how many complaints there were coming from every part of the continent against the conduct of the Indian Government, the rt. hon. gent. on going out would have found it very convenient to carry a law in his pocket to prevent them for the future.

Mr. Canning denied the sentiment attributed to him of wishing to stop appeals from the local to the Supreme Government. So far was that representation from being true, that it was in fair interpretation, the reverse.—And now he recollected the fact upon which he had been induced to speak. Certain European bankers having made loans to the native powers, which were expressly against the law, attempted to persuade the Supreme Government to interfere with those native princes to get back the money lent. In reference to these designs, he had expressed a wish that there should be a law passed to prevent any appeals to the Supreme Government, on occasions of this kind, where the original transactions had been in contravention of the law. Nay, more—he would now say deliberately, and in the face of any East India loan contractor whatever, that all the opprobrium, all the scandal, all the shame and reproach which fell upon the British Government in the minds of the natives might be traced to these scandalous and unlawful loan transactions. And this was to be converted into an express desire to deprive the natives of their right of appeal to the Government at home. Could any man deny that the effect of the slightest interference on the part of the British Government in this business fell nothing short of absolute command, and extortion of payment for those loans which were made contrary to law? Was not his purpose, therefore, to defend the natives, and not to oppress them? He expressed his sincere wish that those loans might never be paid. If his voice could reach any of the native princes, from whom a single rupee was owing, he would caution him against paying it, and assure him that he was in no danger from the power of the Supreme Government.—He did not know to which of the hon. gentlemen he was indebted for this compliment. They sat on different sides of the house; but so strong was their identity of feeling, if not of person, that they themselves were a little confounded by it. One hon. gent. did not know whether he himself, or the other hon. gent. had the paper in his pocket. They were very like two gentlemen in the Spectator, who were so closely united, that they were thought to have between them only one opinion, one idea, one religion, and one hat.

Sir C. Forbes said, that he could assure the rt. hon. gent. that he would never be found saying any thing in his absence which he would not say to his face. He would venture to tell the rt. hon. gent. that which his friends, perhaps, would be slow in telling him—that his wit was often misapplied, and injured the cause he would serve. He had said in the presence of the rt. hon. gent. on a former occasion, that which he now repeated; that if the rt. hon. gent. had gone out to India, he would have found it very convenient for his comfort on arriving there, to have taken out that loan, which he then proposed, in his pocket. As to the debts of the native princes, and the unlawful character of the loans, he had nothing to do with them. He had never advanced a single rupee to the native princes, and most likely never should. The rt. hon. gent. might have spared his ill-tempered wishes, and the thundering tone and manner in which he expressed them.

Mr. Hume said, that the assertions of the rt. hon. gent. were as opposite to the real state of the question as they were unwarrantable in the manner of advancing. It was not for him to persist after a member had disowned particular expressions. But sure he was that the impression conveyed to his mind was that which he had expressed to the house, and which had called forth the observation of the hon. bart. opposite.

The motion was then carried.

Mr. Hume had already called the attention of parliament to the propriety of allowing that class of natives in India who were called half-castes, to serve as jurymen. If the house would only allow those memorials from the half-caste natives to which he had referred to be produced, it would find that the Court of Directors and the Government of Calcutta had done every thing which was calculated to outrage and distress the feelings of the Indian people. He now begged to move “for copies of any memorials or representations submitted to the Government of India, by the Indo-Britons respecting their petition; together with copies of any representations or memorials to the Governors or Governments of India touching their present condition, and of any proceedings which may have been had thereon; and of all correspondence relative thereto, between the Indian Government and the Court of Directors.”

Agreed to.

Mr. Hume then said, that at the time Lord Hastings was in India, his lordship, taking into consideration the sufferings of this half-caste, made a minute in council authorizing their nomination to certain local appointments in different parts of India. This, like many other good orders, had been rescinded by the subsequent government. He moved, “that there be laid before this house copies of the Marquis of Hastings’s minute of council in the year 1817, respecting the appointment of Indo-Britons to certain offices in India, and of any proceedings or correspondence thereon.”

Mr. Wynn could find no such minute as the hon. gent. referred to; though he had discovered a document by which it appeared that the half-caste Indians had been employed by our Government in India. If the hon. gent. could afford him any information in the matter, he should be very glad to avail himself of it; but meanwhile he must be aware that other matters were frequently mixed up with minutes of this kind, which it might be quite improper to publish in this incidental form.

Mr. Hume could not imagine what objection could lie against his motion. If there were really no such minute in existence, the return to his motion would of course be nil, and there would be an end of the matter.

The motion was not pressed further.

Dr. Bryce.

Mr. Hume next called the attention of the house to the case of Mr. Bryce, who had been appointed clerk to the stationary committee of the Governor in Chief; and in respect of whom the Presbytery of Scotland were now discussing whether any Presbyterian clergyman could lawfully hold a plurality of offices of any sort. Mr. Buckingham having published some remarks on this gentleman’s appointment in his paper, which was widely circulated over India, was on that account alone, banished from India; and another individual for a similar offence had been imprisoned, whom it was understood that Lord Amherst had persisted for several months in keeping in confinement. Now Dr. Bryce was an acknowledged writer in the John Bull in the East—the John Bull of India (a laugh)—a twin brother of the John Bull of London. The Presbytery considered that it was not for the honour of the Scotch church that this individual should continue a member of their body and retain this office. And it seemed of great consequence that the house and the country should have the opportunity of considering the conduct of Mr. Adam and Lord Amherst in their government of India, as displayed in single acts of this kind, as more general inquiry was denied. He moved, therefore, “for a copy of the minute of the Supreme Council of Bengal, by which the Rev. Dr. Bryce, chaplain to the Scotch church at Calcutta, was appointed clerk of the stationary committee; together with a statement of the duties to be performed in that office; and copies of any correspondence that had taken place on the subject between the Court of Directors and the Government of India.”

Mr. Wynn conceived that the hon. gent. had failed in laying the slightest ground for the production of these papers. Of Dr. Bryce’s appointment there could be no doubt; it was as certainly disapproved by His Majesty’s Government in England, as soon as it was known; and in consequence, orders had been dispatched to India directing it to be revoked. Some delay had intervened in the execution of those orders, and Government here were still awaiting further information on the subject, having concurred in the directions transmitted for cancelling the appointment.

Mr. Hume contended that the revocation of the appointment was no valid objection to his motion. He expected to discover from the papers a good foundation for a charge of misconduct, either against the Government of India, or some individual member of it.

Mr. Denman could not imagine why the Government of India should refuse to do that which the rt. hon. gent. admitted to have been proper, and which was an order prompted by the Board of Directors here. It would be the duty of the house to accede to his hon. friend's motion; and his hon. friend would desert his own duty if he failed to take the sense of the house upon so reasonable a proposition.

Dr. Phillimore objected to Mr. Hume's withdrawing his motion, as if it were allowed to be withdrawn it would be re-produced on a future day; and the appointment being revoked, the production of the documents was useless.

The gallery was then cleared for a division, and the numbers were—Ayes, 26—Noes, 74—Majority against the motion, 48.

Burmese War.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29.—Mr. Hume rose to move for certain papers relating to the Burmese war. The information of which the house was at present in possession on that subject was so scanty, that it would not enable individuals who were acquainted with India, much less those who were not, to come to any conclusion upon it. He was anxious that the house, when it should meet again, might come to some opinion as to the causes of the Burmese war, and as to the manner in which it had been conducted. He did not intend to give any opinion upon it now; but as certain documents were referred to in the papers already printed, he now moved for their production. It was stated that it would appear from certain documents that the Burmese had been encroaching on our frontiers near Chittagong ever since the year 1822 or 1823. In the papers now before parliament, it was asserted that the island of Shahpooree belonged to the East India Company, and that the Burmese had taken possession of it. That small island was therefore the cause of the war. From time immemorial, it had been in the possession of the Burmese. The East India Company now said it was their's; he wished, therefore, to see the document by which it was made over to them. His next object was to ascertain the extent of Shahpooree and the revenue it produced. That object might perhaps appear to some unnecessary, as it was admitted to be of no value at all. Still he wished the point to be placed before the house in an authentic form. The fourth return for which he moved was the number of troops stationed in Shahpooree, and from what period. His object in moving for this return, was to show that we had no troops in that island till very recently, and that we were the aggressors on the Burmese territory in stationing them there.—Ordered.

Indian Army.

THURSDAY, MARCH 24.—Mr. Hume rose to move for the copy of the despatch of the Marquis of Hastings, of the year 1819, respecting the organization of the Indian army. He began by observing, that nothing was more desirable in regard to the Government of India, than that it should not be annoyed by the improper interference of Parliament, or any other body at home. The authorities of this country were confessedly so little calculated to manage the concerns of that distant and extensive Empire, that its affairs were necessarily and prudently left to the administration of those appointed to govern in India by the Crown. With regard to those persons, he admitted that there had been a succession of wise and able governors, and he had hoped that under the Marquis of Hastings, who had shown himself one of the persons best qualified for the station, that the prosperity of those possessions would have reached the highest pitch. He had expected that the liberal system of European politics, penetrating these distant provinces, would have removed the shackles which restrained the resources of that country. He entreated the house to weigh well the effect of good or bad government upon that large and fruitful territory,—to consider its extent and resources, and to reflect upon the powers by which it was held in obedience to the British. A military force, only 22,000 Europeans, held an extent of country reaching from the utmost Indus to the Burmese frontier—from the mountains of Thibet to the southernmost point of Asia. The population of this immense tract, amounting to 80 or 90 millions, had settled down in peace with us. The offices of Government were ably filled—the civil servants in good understanding with each other. This state of things continued while the Marquis of Hastings remained in India, and for some time after his departure. The case was very different as soon as Lord Amherst was sent out. He did not blame Lord Amherst for going, but he blamed those who sent him (hear). Nobody who knew any thing about the Government of India, or was at all connected with that country, could conscientiously declare that he thought Lord Amherst a proper person for such a situation, however amiable his lordship's private character—a point which he readily conceded to hon. gentls. opposite. In a time of peace, with the assistance of an able council, Lord Amherst might possibly be competent to discharge the duties of his station; but in a time of war, when numerous and skillful enemies were attacking our frontiers, he was very incompetent to the post (hear). A period of little more than two years had sufficed to verify the fears of many who conceived that Lord Amherst ought never to have been sent out in so arduous a capacity. The country had been plunged into a war which could not now be closed with advantage to the interest of the East India Company. For the sake of the argument, however, he would admit that the Burmese war was just and proper, and, under the circumstances, unavoidable. But then came another question—how a war of this kind, having been commenced, ought to have been carried on and continued (hear)? The declaration of the Burmese war was unnecessary and precipitate, even if, on more reflection, a similar step had been determined on. But the conduct of the war was still less defensible. Every body was aware that India had its periodical rainy seasons, during the prevalence of which no military operations could, with propriety, be commenced. This was a fact of which he spoke from his own experience. He had himself been in camp to the wet season; and he knew well the disastrous effects which service at such times produced upon European constitutions. In a wet season, out of an European force of 10,000 men, not more than 1500 remained available. It had been the invariable rule of all former Governor-general to undertake no war during such seasons. Now, seeing that Lord Amherst was vested with full powers to act, and that without control from other quarters, his determination to advance the troops upon Rangoon, at such a period, must rest on his own head. Our troops had made repeated attempts to bring the main force of the enemy into action; but in these attempts they had been unsuccessful. The consequence of these delays, the weather, and their fatigues, had been a mortality among them, so dreadful in its amount, that he was almost afraid to state what he had heard upon that subject (hear, hear). Unhappily, no certain public information was now officially communicated in such cases by the Government of India; and the press in that country not being allowed to speak out on political subjects, he could only resort to the medium—possibly a perverted one—of private letters. If he might speak upon such authority as that—if he might speak from letters written by parties actually on the spot—he should state to the house, that on the part of the Europeans we had lost by disease and casualties, from 800 to 1000 out of 10,000 men (hear). Taking the lowest average, the mortality arising from these causes, and from the diseases to which persons not accustomed to such fatal seasons must inevitably be exposed during such a state of operations, had certainly been most alarming and extensive. The general result of the campaign had excited a degree of alarm over Hindoostan, such as had scarcely ever been experienced before. It had never been heard of before, that the Bengal native troops refused to march on a service of danger and importance, unless, indeed, he were to except a mutiny that occurred among these troops in 1795, in the new appointment of some commanders of corps—appointments which had never since been renewed. To the honour of the native troops, instances of insubordination were very rare. The native army at present stood on very ticklish ground (a laugh.) A severe example had been made of the mutineers among them; and, indeed, it was felt by those who were best acquainted with the subject, that it had been much more severe than it ought to have been. He was at a loss to know what was the original cause of the late mutiny at Barrackpore—whether some misunderstanding of the orders of the Governor-general, or some difficulty in executing them, occasioned by the Burmese war. When he hinted at the severity of the punishment, he would not for one moment defend the recourse of the parties to arms (hear). However grievous, or even just their complaints, the welfare of India required the immediate suppression of their mutiny. But after its suppression, the Government might have had time to inquire into its detail with calmness; and had the Governor-general, or his Council, been competent to their offices, the matter would have taken a very different course from that which it had done. Was it possible that in any country—but in India of all others—any government could, under circumstances so unfortunate, resort to a measure of such extraordinary severity, as to confound the innocent with the guilty (hear)? For his own part, he did not know of any instance in the annals of military punishment, that could furnish a parallel to that inflicted on the 47th native regiment (hear). When the three officers who were deputed to undertake that difficult duty, had exhausted every effort to repress the mutiny of the corps, and to induce them to return to their duty, they called upon all those who were true to the Government, to separate themselves from the mutineers. Every commissioned and non-commissioned officer in the regiment left the ranks, and returned with the three persons composing the deputation (hear). Now, would it be believed, although the statement had been published in the Calcutta Gazette, that the Governor-general had thereon issued a proclamation, in which he stated that it was impossible the mutiny could have taken place without the privity of the commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the regiment; and that therefore, as being no longer worthy to serve in the armies of the Government, they were dismissed from the service with infamy (hear, hear)? Such was the treatment of these gallant men, whose fidelity, instead of punishment, should have met with reward and honour. It was after their dismissal—as if to heap blunder upon blunder—that Lord Amherst added, that a court of inquiry might be instituted into the conduct of these officers (hear)—that was, after they had been already punished and degraded. If he were rightly informed, the despatch to the Court of Directors, announcing the intelligence of the mutiny, concluded by stating, that if it should appear, on enquiry, that the conduct of the native officers was justified, they might be reinstated in their rank (hear). He called upon every gentleman who had received letters from any of the presidencies, to declare whether people in all parts of India were not agreed that Lord Amherst was the most incompetent man for his high office that could have been selected. It had become an act of duty on the part of the house to inquire whether Government at home had yet taken any measures with regard to this nobleman's appointment (hear, from Mr. Wynn). He was glad to hear that cheer from the rt. hon. gent., which seemed to say that he could justify the policy of late pursued in India; he was glad that matters were not quite as he described them; but when official information was so studiously concealed in India—when facts of this grave nature only now and then crept out, as it were, it was no wonder that some cases were magnified, and others diminished, through the uncertainty of private accounts. In England, therefore, no man could be blamed for possessing but imperfect information on Indian affairs. Speaking to the best of his own knowledge, he must say that the discontents which took place at removing the troops from Calcutta to the south-east part of the frontier—the grumbling of the army, in short (a laugh)—might have sufficiently informed the Governor-general of the necessities of the army, and might have taught him the duty of relieving them. Formerly, when the native troops passed our Indian frontier, they were paid double full batta; but that allowance had been subsequently pared down, first to Lucknow, then to Cawnpore, then to Benares, and so on, until it was reduced to mere necessities. Perhaps the house was aware, that in order to enable the sepoy to move their baggage and their families with facility, they used to be accommodated with the necessary cattle on easy terms. They had bullocks and coolies for this purpose; the fact being, that for every single soldier in an Indian army there were about ten followers, which, indeed, was in some sort necessary. It was impossible in that climate for sepoys or any other troops to carry behind them the same quantity of baggage that soldiers carried in other countries. When the troops were ordered to march from Barrackpore, upon the south-east frontier, dividing Hindoostan from the Burman empire, the Government at Calcutta were apprized of the wants of the sepoys, in respect to these necessary and accustomed accommodations. But Government had purchased up every sort of carriage previously; and if even, as it was said, the sepoy regiments had each of them 5,000 rupees for the purchase of these articles, there were in fact hardly any to be bought (hear, from Mr. Wynn). So little did the rt. hon. gent. know about India (a laugh), that he (Mr. Hume) was willing to rest his case upon the fact that no carriages were to be had in India, even for money, without the assistance of the English civil functionaries, a statement in which every person acquainted with India would bear him out. Nothing could be more grievous to the sepoys, than the withholding such assistance. Formerly the commander of marching troops used to send to the kutwal, or head man of the village, for coolies and bullocks; but this practice having been found to be oppressive, the system was very properly altered, and the agents of Government now provided the means of transport. The neglect, on Lord Amherst's part, to secure such a provision, was another argument to show his entire ignorance of the wants of an Indian army (hear, hear). At the time of the Mahratta war, so different a feeling pervaded the native troops, from that which had been manifested on the late unhappy occasion, that for every vacancy in the forces, they had at least fifty candidates among the natives (hear, hear): it was not then thought necessary to invite, as he was sorry to perceive had been the case under Lord Amherst's government, by promises and rewards. There was then nothing like desertion heard of, but the greatest eagerness to serve was testified on every side. It was urged, in mitigation of the severe example lately made, that only eleven out of sixty mutineers were hanged: but were the house aware of the effect that so ignominious a punishment would produce on the native troops? The Bengal infantry was composed principally of Brahmins—men of as high and delicate a sense of honour as composed the ranks of any army. Of those who escaped the gallows, many were exposed in chains upon the public roads; a punishment calculated to have a worse effect on the feelings of the native population than any other that could, by possibility, have been devised. To clear up these matters, in some degree, he wished to be furnished with the instructions which the Court of Directors sent out to Lord Hastings, in 1814 and 1815, respecting the re-modelling of the army. Lord Hastings refrained from carrying those orders into effect; but he appointed a committee of military officers and civilians to inquire into, and report upon, every office that it was proposed to alter, and every allowance that was to be regulated anew. After receiving the various reports in 1816-1817, Lord Hastings drew up that important document which he was so anxious to see laid on the table of that house, and dispatched it to England. His lordship therein first stated his own opinion on the subject of the instructions of the Court of Directors; he then availed himself of the best opinions that the military and the civil services in India afforded, and concluded by declaring that he could not set upon the instructions that had been sent out to him. The answer from the Court of Directors, which he believed was not at all in conformity with Lord Hastings' opinions, he was also anxious to inspect. He had understood that Lord Amherst went out determined to carry into effect the Directors' orders; which was itself a striking proof of Lord Amherst's wisdom for his office; for how could a Governor-general determine beforehand, what was fitting to be done or not? As he understood that the Court of Inquiry had not, at the last advice, terminated its investigations, he would of course dispense with so much of his original motion as was intended to call for the minutes of their proceedings; but as he could not imagine that any danger to our empire in India, could arise from the papers he wished to see, he should move for "a copy of the military despatch, transmitted by the Marquis of Hastings in the year 1819, to the secret committee of the Court of Directors, relative to the organization and allowances of the British army in India; also for a copy of the despatch of the Court of Directors to the Government of India, dated in 1823, on the same subject; together with a copy of any despatches from India, in reply thereto, stating how far such orders and instructions of the Court of Directors had been carried into effect."

Mr. Wynn concurred in thinking that a very large discretion must be left to the Government in India, as to executing any orders from home. He was surprised that the same principle had not reminded the hon. gent. that an individual placed in a situation of such difficulty as the Governor-general, and armed with so large a discretion, was entitled to the confidence of his country, at least till he had an opportunity of meeting charges against him. Of the mutiny at Barrackpore he possessed no official account; that which he had was written only five days after the mutiny occurred; and before the Court of Inquiry had finished its investigations. Under these circumstances, it would be the height of injustice to lay any information on the subject before parliament, till Government should be in possession of more ample documents, and thereby be better enabled to meet the calumnious misrepresentations on this painful subject which had been circulated in private letters (hear, hear). None of the papers for which the hon. gent. moved could throw the least light upon the subject. The new regulations referred to were not likely to produce the bad effects apprehended by the hon. gent. On the contrary, they were likely to remedy many serious evils which had existed, hitherto, in the Indian army. He denied that the Indian Government had manifested inattention to the complaints of the sepoys. In a letter written by the commander-in-chief in India, it was expressly said, "that some dissatisfaction having been noticed to the commander-in-chief as prevailing among the sepoys, in consequence of a want of bullocks for baggage, an immediate order was issued to furnish them with bullocks;" and Sir Edward Paget ascertained, that those provided for the 47th regiment were actually within the lines at the then (hear). This was before the mutiny. He regretted the calamity that ensued in the destruction of so many lives—180, as he understood; not 480 to 500, as had been mentioned in private letters. The difficulty of arresting the destruction at the moment when the officer who commanded could have wished it, must be obvious, when it was recollected that the artillery was in action in the midst of a multitude. As to the execution of the eleven offenders—admitting the number to be correct—what means had we of impugning the decision of the court martial by whose sentence they suffered? Again, he differed from the hon. gent. as to the punishment that had been imposed on some of the guilty parties. The exposure in chains was more salutary than many military penalties that were but too common in India. With respect to Lord Amherst's policy, he thought it most unfair, in the absence of any positive evidence, to excite prejudice against that nobleman. He might have had very good reasons for adopting those measures which the hon. member had condemned. The hon. member had argued that the war was ill-timed. But were the Indian Government allowed to select their time? If provocation were offered, the Government must proceed to war. In the present case, Lord Amherst proceeded on the best opinions that could be had; he was particularly guided by the authority of a meritorious officer, Major Canning, who had since fallen a victim to the climate. He admitted that it would be better if war could be avoided. This country had already dominions enough in India—more, indeed, than could well be managed (hear). But, in his opinion, Lord Amherst was compelled to enter into the war (hear, hear). On this point he should say nothing more, as the hon. member had stated that he would introduce the subject in a more formal shape; when it was so brought before the House, he should be ready to meet all the arguments which the hon. member might advance. With respect to the abilities of Lord Amherst, he thought the hon. member had expressed too decided an opinion. When he was sent out, the Company's territories were in a state of profound peace. It was hoped that peace might have been preserved; and Lord Amherst appeared the most likely person who could be selected for ensuring the continuance of tranquillity. It was true, that during the administration of Lord Hastings, a war with the Burmese had been prevented. But how? By sending back the letter of the Burmese monarch, declaring that our Government conceived it to be a forgery. Such a plan might succeed once, but certainly not a second time. With respect to the destitution of the native officers of the 47th regiment; the opinion of every person with whom he had conversed on the subject was, that it was quite impossible the mutiny could have been carried on without the knowledge of the native officers, if they had performed their duty. If he stated his own opinion, he should say, that the native officers had been guilty of great neglect, and deserved the punishment of destitution. It appeared to him equally necessary, that they should be dismissed under the peculiar circumstances of the case, as it would have been, had they taken an active part in the mutiny (hear). The hon. member had adduced many reasons for the alleged unpopularity of Lord Amherst; but he really believed, that the circumstance of Lord Amherst having placed the lady of a commodore above the ladies of the senior merchants, on the table of precedence, had excited more hatred, jealousy, and ill-feeling, against Lord Amherst, than any other of his acts since he became Governor-general (hear, hear).

Col. Davies condemned, in strong terms, the conduct which had been pursued towards the native officers. He had been informed by officers who had served in India, that a braver, a more loyal, or "better disposed set of men" did not exist, than those who composed our Indian army (hear). He trusted, that this business would be sifted to the bottom as soon as fresh advices were received:

Mr. Fremantle was astonished at the language of the gallant officer who had just sat down. As a military man, he ought to see the necessity of at once putting down a mutiny, under any circumstances. At that very moment, a military inquiry was going on for the investigation of the case. This, therefore, he considered a very unfit period for the promulgation of such statements. The mutiny, he would take leave to say, was not put down by force until every other means had been resorted to. This being the case, he was astonished to hear any gentleman blame the steps which had been taken to put it down, however severe they might seem to be. He contended, however, that the severity was not excessive. There was great danger, that disaffection, if a proper example were not made, would spread around. In a case of that sort, therefore, no time was to be lost; no opportunity could be allowed for a lengthened negotiation. It was complained, that a dreadful fusillade was opened on the mutineers, who were described as having been taken by surprise. But this was not correct. A full opportunity was given them to surrender, and when they despised that offer, they must have known what consequences would ensue. He denied the assertion of the hon. member (Mr. Hume), that the mutiny was occasioned by the withdrawing of any allowances from the native troops. In the despatch of November, 1823, not a word was said on the subject. The directions contained in that despatch applied to English officers; and in that arrangement the principle laid down by Lord Hastings was adopted generally. On some of the points mentioned by the noble marquis, the Court of Directors differed from him; some of them were deferred, but the general principle was adhered to. The great object of the directions sent out in 1823 was to place the troops at the different presidencies on the same footing, which, though very proper, was a difficult undertaking. The allowances were not taken from any officers, who were then receiving them, but were made to apply to those who afterwards entered the service. With respect to the alteration of batta, it referred to the removal of troops from different cantonments, and three years were allowed to elapse before the alteration was to take place. In no one instance had any remonstrances been made by the local Governments on account of this alteration; and therefore the mutiny could not be traced to that source. On the whole of the arrangement of 1823, the Company effected no saving. On the contrary, they added 200,000*l.* annually to their expenses. He conceived that such statements as had been made in the house that evening, by the hon.

member (Mr. Hume); and those who supported his motion, were calculated to have a very bad effect on the tranquillity of India (hear).

Col. Baillie said, that the Indian army was as loyal and gallant an army as any in the world. But in all armies, disaffection would sometimes appear. He recollected that 30 years ago a mutiny broke out in a regiment of those troops, which was commanded by one of the most gallant and humane officers in our service. He, however, found it necessary to have recourse to force; and that mutiny was put down in a manner fully as calamitous as that which the hon. member (Mr. Hume) had described. The 15th regiment was for ever excluded from the list of the Company's force. Some of the mutineers were brought to a court-martial; a part of them were capitally punished; and many others were punished, in degree according to their guilt. Some of them, on expressing their contrition, were admitted into the service again; and the same result might, perhaps, occur in this instance. From a knowledge of the Indian army during 30 years, he believed that a mutiny could not be brought to a head in that army without the knowledge of the native officers (hear); and therefore he looked upon the officers, in this instance, to have been conniving, at least, at the conduct of those who were placed under them (hear). The native officers were connected with each other by the nearest degrees of blood. Many of the junior officers were children of men who had served 30 or 40 years in the Indian army; and it was impossible to conceive that a mutiny could be in progress without their knowing something of the matter. The hon. member (Mr. Hume) was mistaken when he asserted that a great proportion of the native troops were Brahmans. The officers consisted of Rajpoots, and men of other high castes, but there were very few Brahmans amongst them. The information which had reached this country, as to the number of troops who had been cut off, was not to be depended on. It was exceedingly contradictory. He had received three or four letters from India, in one of which the number of men killed in the suppression of the mutiny was stated to be 580, in another 470, in a third, 360, and in a fourth, 130. As to the Governor-general, they ought to know something more about his conduct before they stigmatized his character or his measures.

Sir C. Forbes said, that he should treat the conduct of Lord Amherst with the utmost freedom. With respect to the alteration he had made in the table of precedence, he gave him credit for his conduct, as he did to the President of the Board of Control, who, he believed, had supported him in giving a certain degree of precedence to the Lady of Commodore Hayes. With respect to the mutiny, how, he would ask, had it originated? The troops were ordered, at a day's notice, to march from Muttra to Barrackpore, a distance of 1,000 miles, to join the British army (hear). He knew this from a letter which was written before the mutiny broke out. This march was ordered in the monsoon season—an unhealthy period of the year. They were ordered to fall into the ranks with their arms and accoutrements: their knapsacks, in particular, were directed to be fastened on. They declined this. They said, "We are not coolies; we will not degrade ourselves by carrying our cooking utensils on our backs." It was this circumstance which gave rise to the ill-feeling amongst the troops, which at last broke out into open mutiny. If the public press in India had been at all free, this event would not have happened (hear). He was not prepared to say that unrestricted freedom of the press there, would, under existing circumstances, be proper. But he certainly did wish it to be redeemed from its present state, which was one of slavish degradation (hear). He had received a letter from a lady (a laugh) on the present state of India, part of which he would read to the house. His hon. friend (Mr. Hume) had, it appeared, received letters from civil, military, medical, and commercial characters, on this subject; but the letter he was about to read, and it was a very sensible one, was from the lady of a gallant officer, who was with the army at Rangoon. The writer said—"Lord Amherst must have enough on his mind at this moment (a laugh). Certainly it is a most nervous and critical time for every one of us (a laugh). The public prints will have told you of the mutiny at Barrackpore before you receive this. The 47th regiment has been struck off the army-list in consequence. The artillery and two European regiments were brought out against the mutineers; and it is hoped that Sir E. Paget's decided conduct will have a good effect. Yet the feeling of discontent is apprehended to have spread widely through the native troops; and there is no knowing whether it may not show itself somewhere else, where there are no European troops to put it down" (hear, hear). The letter went on to complain of that economy which had curtailed the native troops of their accustomed allowances. He concurred with the gallant officer (Col. Davies) that the mutineers ought not to have been pursued after they had taken to flight. The artillery might be necessary; but the pursuit was cruel, and needless. The hon. bart. sat down by declaring, that at no former period had India been in so perilous a situation as at present. Lord Amherst's friends could not do him a greater kindness than by soliciting his recall; nor could the house do the country a greater service than by assenting to it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the present debate had led to some extraordinary assertions with respect to public officers. The conduct of Lord Amherst or Sir Edward Paget had nothing to do with the motion. The motion was for a military despatch—not of Sir Edward Paget—not of the year 1824—no; but a military despatch of the Marquis of Hastings in the year 1819. With some ingenuity, but very little fairness, the hon. member thought he had connected his attack upon Lord Amherst with this despatch. It was a document which referred to the allowances of the Bengal army at the date. But the hon. member forgot, or perhaps was not aware, that the paper did not bring his observations within the record; for it concerned allowances of the European officers only. When hon. gentlemen impugned the conduct of such men as Lord Amherst, it was surprising they had not courage to call upon the house for a vote, instead of throwing out charges, in a way which precluded the possibility of their being answered (hear, hear). How could Lord Amherst or Sir Edward Paget defend themselves against attacks like those? For his part he knew Lord Amherst personally; but he would not, on such an occasion, utter one word in his defence (hear, hear). He did not think that it would be just to Lord Amherst or to Sir Edward Paget to attempt to answer them (hear, hear). Let the hon. member (Mr. Hume) call on the house for censure, and both the individuals whom he attacked would find abundance of defenders, and of able ones; but unless he could connect his recent observations with the despatch of the Marquis of Hastings in 1819—and he defied him to do it—he had treated Lord Amherst unfairly.

Mr. Atell said, that with regard to the Burmese war, upon which many observations had been made, all the papers were already upon the table. As to the late mutiny, a court of inquiry was sitting upon the circumstances connected with it; and he trusted, that until that court reported, the house would suspend its opinion.

Mr. Watts was surprised at the charge against his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) of sliding into discussions on the general affairs of India, on the present occasion. Nothing was more usual in that house than the introduction of matter collateral with the subject of the motion. Here, however, the discussion complained of was intimately connected with the papers moved for, and he was only astonished that so many weeks of the session had elapsed before the subject was brought forward. With regard to the state of India he agreed with his hon. friend and should support the motion.

Mr. Hume replied. If he had brought forward a specific motion against Lord Amherst, hon. gent. would have said "Give us the official documents before you ask us to condemn him." Now that he called for the official documents, he was told that they could not be granted, because they were wanted as ground of attack against an individual who was not present to defend himself. They were already in possession of a few meagre details, and why were they refused a full disclosure if there were no reluctance on the part of Government to meet the question? He held in his hand a Gazette, printed under the authority of the Government of India, out of which he could condemn them upon their own showing. He had also a circular addressed to the editors of newspapers, desiring them, in the name of the Government, not to notice the conduct of the 47th regiment. He had done his duty in bringing the question before the house; it might have been done in a better manner, but it was his duty, and he had heard no valid reason for opposing the measure.

The house divided—For the resolution, 15—Against it, 58—Majority, 43.

Deccan Prize Money.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—Mr. Hume presented a petition from Col. Fitz-Simon, complaining of delay in the distribution of the Deccan prize-money, and praying for inquiry. It set forth: That Col. Fitz-Simon was an officer in the Deccan army, during the war against the Pindarrees and the Mahratta princes, in 1817 and 1818: That, in the course of the successful operations of that war, great booty was captured from the enemy: That, in 1821, after the close of hostilities, certain officers were appointed by Sir Thos. Hislop, the commander in chief, to ascertain and enforce the claims of the army upon this booty: That, after a long litigation between the East India Company and the army, the Lords of the Treasury recommended to the Crown that the booty (with a certain exception) should "belong to the divisions of the Deccan army engaged in the respective operations in which it was captured." That the Duke of Wellington and the Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot were appointed trustees for its distribution—which had not yet been made: That the trustees had refused all communication with the general prize-agent and law-agent of the army in England, since Oct. 1823; which, in conjunction with certain reports relative to arrangements having been entered into that the army should receive from the Directors, in compensation of their claims (admitted, as petitioners had heard, to have been realized to the amount of 700,000*l.*) a sum wholly inadequate to meet them; and, from the consideration that no just distribution could be effected without a free correspondence on the part of the trustees with the army-agents, owing to the great variety in the claims of the captors, had produced a deep alarm in the claimants: That the delay, which had already occurred, had proved most injurious to many of the claimants, and more especially to such as had since become widows and orphans, under circumstances frequently of much distress: Wherefore, &c.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained some circumstances which excepted this booty from the general law of prize. An appeal to the Lords of the Treasury had in consequence become necessary; the prize-money having vested in the Crown, although ordered for distribution amongst the captors. This appeal had produced delay, beyond the usual time. The rt. hon. gent. eulogized the assiduity of the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot, to whom the Treasury had referred the business, and who had undertaken it gratuitously, without any other interest in the issue than that of doing justice to the parties. If such charges were attended to, it would not be easy in future to find gentlemen willing to undertake a similar task. It was not till the 1st of June that the parties interested in the property had furnished the list of claimants, upon which alone any distribution could take place.

Dr. Lushington said that there had never been an instance in which the distribution of prize-money had been so conducted. No sooner were the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot appointed trustees, than they took the steps best calculated to cause delay. In all other cases, trustees of prize-money had kept up constant communication with the claimants. They had no right to decline it in this case. The parties had great reason to complain of the contempt and disregard shown to them by the Duke, whose conduct, especially in a letter sent by him, in answer, to Sir Thomas Hislop, one of the chief claimants, was contrary to all rule and precedent. That letter, the learned gent. observed, was an insult to the parties. He knew the facts of this case, having advised professionally on the business. He put it to ministers if there were not at one time an intention of appointing the son of Mr. Arbuthnot as agent; and if that intention had not been laid aside on discovery of the young gentleman's legal incapacity to discharge that duty.—He trusted the house would inquire into the business.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer regretted that Mr. Arbuthnot was absent from his place, by reason of indisposition; he would otherwise have explained satisfactorily all the topics to which allusion had been made. The son of Mr. Arbuthnot was never appointed an agent in this case. The trustees were empowered to appoint an agent, and at one time, Mr. Arbuthnot had intended to appoint his son; but the appointment never took place. It was unjust to impute any thing to Mr. Arbuthnot for having once entertained that intention.

Dr. Lushington had not uttered a single word which he did not believe to be true. The rt. hon. gent. was quite mistaken about the right of the trustees to name their agent. The appointment of an agent in such a case was regulated by act of parliament, and the party appointed must answer the requisitions of the act.

The Attorney-General contradicted the learned member's statement. The property was originally in the Crown, and being relinquished in favour of the army, the Crown had undoubtedly the right of appointing its own officers for distributing it. The delay was owing to no fault on the part of the trustees, but to the complexity of the business.

Mr. Hume thought it strange that the trustees should have refused to communicate with the agents for the captors. He should move, in the course of the day or to-morrow, for accounts of the different sums paid into the treasury on this account, in order to see where the property was, and to ascertain its total amount.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.—Col. Lushington presented a petition from four officers of rank in the East Indian Army, interested in the distribution of the Deccan prize-money. The petitioners stated their satisfaction at the conduct of the trustees, and prayed that the proceedings might not be interfered with by the house. The hon. member concurred with the petitioners, and thought the claims of the army, in many respects, so extravagant, as to operate to the prevention of a speedy settlement of the business. The army had set forth an unsubstantial demand of 2,000,000*l.* and they had, moreover, claimed the value of all the towns and palaces which had been captured by the British forces, and which had afterwards been given up to the native princes. As well, in his opinion, might the army of Waterloo claim the value of the Tulleries, which had been given up to the Bourbons after the capture of Paris.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was glad to hear the expressions of the petitioners. The trustees had been severely treated. They knew well what obloquy would attend the discharge of the duty they had voluntarily undertaken, from the extravagant expectations entertained by both officers and men, as to the amount of the booty. Other men would have declined the responsibility, and the Duke of Wellington had been advised to that effect; but he was above every private consideration, where there was any prospect of achieving a public good. With a magnanimity not surprising in him, he considered that no man in the service being better acquainted with that army, and the circumstance of the capture, no man was better qualified for the task. The trustees from first to last had met with nothing but aspersions, which he took that opportunity of denouncing as factious and unfounded.

Dr. Lushington, notwithstanding the warmth of the rt. hon. gent. persisted in his opinion with regard to the conduct of the trustees. He was surprised at this zeal in justifying the noble duke. It would look as if the petition had been got up in consequence of what took place a few nights ago, with a view of enabling the rt. hon. gent. to deliver this extraordinary defence. The petition emanated from a part of that army which had called upon its Commander in chief to make the representation which the petitioners now ventured to condemn. What was the information upon which these petitioners proceeded in reprobating their Commander in chief? Did they know any thing of the difficulties which impeded the adjustment and distribution of the prize-money? If they did, how came it that they had not imparted information so desirable for the case? He repeated what he had said with respect to the conduct of the trustees, and added that if they did not alter their determination, and communicate with the army agent and solicitor, great injustice would be done to the whole body of the captors.

Sir H. Hardinge complained of the misstatements against the Duke of Wellington. Sir T. Hialop had not delivered the list of claimants till the 5th of June. So far the delay was attributable to Sir T. Hialop. The Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot had laboured indefatigably in the business. He was sorry that he was not in the house on a previous evening, when the learned civilian took occasion to stigmatize as "insolent," a written answer given by the Duke of Wellington. It was easy for gentlemen to utter expressions with respect to others who were of too high dignity to notice them, which they would not venture to use to the members of this house, or at any rate could not use them without incurring a sharp reply. He did not wish to curtail the liberty of speech which any member might think proper to claim; but it was difficult for a friend of that noble person to listen to such language without retorting his own words upon the member who ventured to use it.

On a call to order by Lord Folkestone,

Mr. Caning said, that the situation of his gallant friend was particularly hard. He had risen to defend a noble friend from an attack which had been made in his absence, on the presentation of a petition of which no regular notice had been given, and he was met by the forms of the house. Had his gallant friend possessed a little more of parliamentary tactics, he might have effected all that he wanted without interruption. He might have said, "I have read somewhere that expressions were used by somebody towards the Duke of Wellington," and he might have gone on to make his comments at pleasure.

Sir H. Hardinge continued. As the practice of the house allowed the calumnies to go abroad in the newspapers, he ought to have an opportunity of answering them. The imputation of Mr. Arbuthnot's intending to appoint his son, who was called a minor, as his agent, was false and calumnious. Mr. Arbuthnot's youngest son was 26 years of age. He had taken the opinion of the law officers upon the right of appointing his son, and he was informed that there would be nothing illegal in it. Such a system of clamour and calumny excited against men engaged in an arduous business, was highly to be deprecated.

Mr. Hume was surprised at the extraordinary vehemence of the gallant officer and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. With regard to the petition he had presented on a former evening, it was not delivered without notice, as the Secy. for Foreign Affairs was pleased to assert. No notice could be given to the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer was sufficiently forewarned as being the properest person to receive that information. He wondered at the exaggerations attributed to that petition. In what part of it did the petitioners lay claim to the price of public buildings, or to the share of two millions of money? If the petition were dispassionately referred to, it would be seen that 700,000l. was the sum spoken of, as admitted to be realized. The petitioner demanded information which the trustees unwarrantably refused.

Sir H. Hardinge said, that the Duke of Wellington never had refused information; on the contrary, he had informed Sir Thomas Hlop that he or any of his staff might inspect the papers at the office; but he would not let them be shown to agents and attorneys. With regard to the expressions he had attributed to the learned civilian, he observed, that, whilst the house allowed its discussions to be circulated, no fault should be found with the reporters, who only printed the words, as they had not been retracted by the member to whom they were imputed.

The Speaker here interposed.—The gallant member, he said, was proceeding in a disorderly course. It was contrary to order to refer to expressions used in a former debate; but to refer to representations of a former debate, which could not be circulated without the intervention of practices in themselves disorderly, was still less to be tolerated. No member would be allowed to comment on expressions used in a previous debate; leaving to the party accused the onus of exculpating himself from such expressions.

Sir H. Hardinge admitted that he might have been out of order; but intimated some expectation that the learned gent. would qualify or retract some parts of his former speech.

Mr. Brougham complained of the gallant member's conduct, in demanding a retraction of those expressions, without condescending to inquire of his learned friend whether the expressions had been used by him or not. Good God! Was he or any man to come down and let out his fury on any gentleman who might be suspected of speaking disrespectfully of the Duke of Wellington, because he was a friend of that nobleman, without one preliminary inquiry, and in a way which must of necessity preclude the chance of explanation? What man of spirit would stoop to explain imputations, even if they were wrong, under those circumstances? Suppose he had a similar grudge against the gallant officer, or any other gentleman, and were to begin his expostulation thus—"You infamous fellow, you have said that which is calumnious of my friend," (symptoms of dissent from Sir H. Hardinge and the Chancellor of the Exchequer). He did not mean to say that the gallant officer had used those expressions; he was only putting a case to show that in asking for explanation, there was a way of doing it which might lead to explanation; there was another way which totally precluded it. He must tell the gallant officer that neither the high station of the Duke of Wellington, nor the vehemence used in defending him by any member in that house, could ever deter either himself or others from expressing their opinions frankly upon his public conduct. The Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot might be very amiable characters in private; but they were in this case public men, clothed with a public trust, in which public money was concerned; and as honest stewards to the public, he and every one in that house was bound to scrutinize their conduct. He proceeded to express his opinion upon certain parts of that conduct. He had been consulted professionally on the part of those who were interested in the booty. He had advised the claimants that the appointment of young Arbuthnot as agent would have been illegal; and that by the provisions of the Prize Act, a penalty of 500l. would have been incurred by every single transaction of his in that appointment. And then, what followed? The trustees, who evinced a profound ignorance of the law, proposed to shew certain documents to Col. Wood, who alone could act, without becoming liable to the penalties, on condition that he did not show them to the lawyers! And the ground of this prohibition was still more offensive—"because there was too great a disposition in certain quarters to entertain law proceedings." Now their love for litigation was a vulgar, gross, and every-day charge against lawyers (hear, hear, and laughter from the ministerial benches)—and the rt. hon. gent., perhaps, in this particular, wished to be counted among the gross and vulgar crowd out of doors. Such a charge was utterly groundless. Four out of every five opinions given by lawyers were against the case submitted to them. He himself frequently told clients that they had no case, to keep them out of court, though in principle they might have a very good case, but not one which, in the present state of our courts, would repay the expense and trouble of a suit. But now who were the seven lawyers who had been thus attacked? He admitted, that for himself and his learned friend near him (Dr. Lushington), nothing could be said: they were lawyers without redemption. But Dr. Jenner was joined with them in their opinion—a man as little of a Whig as any gentleman opposite—a very worthy lawyer, with an excellent Tory spirit. Next was Sir W. Adams, a King's counsel—a man of no politics at all, and a friend to the Duke of Wellington; and Mr. Heald, who of all men in the profession could least be suspected of such practices. Then who else was there? Oh! what if a judge were among them? What if Lord Wellington, as a Cabinet minister, had since joined in recommending this person to the Crown as a fit associate among the twelve judges of the land. Mr. Gazelee had joined them in their opinion. Then there was Mr. William Harrison, the known familiar of the Treasury. Really, people who live in glass houses should beware of throwing stones. This very nobleman, who seemed so very touchy, and who had been so touchily defended by the gallant officer, did not scruple to make this attack upon the profession and characters of so many respectable lawyers. In allusion to a certain pamphlet which had been published on this affair, and which the gallant officer had qualified as infamous and libellous, he observed that his opinion of the pamphlet was somewhat different; but if libel it were, the courts of law were open to the noble duke, as well as to any other British subject. In proceeding at law, the noble duke would have the benefit of the talents of the Attorney-General, to whom of course would be opposed some learned friends of his, the case would be submitted to the decision of twelve honest men, and would by them be much more satisfactorily decided than by coming down to that house and speaking big words, which proved nothing either way.

Mr. Peel thought that his gallant friend was mistaken, in the first instance, in attributing the language alluded to to the learned gent.; but he thought he had heard that learned gent. use very extraordinary language. His gallant friend's declaration, that he was not aware of Col. Lushington's intention to present a petition this evening, must establish, to every body's satisfaction, that whatever his gallant friend had said, was said without premeditation. If, moreover, he had uttered any thing that could be deemed offensive, the Speaker would have interposed to order; but this he had only done when his gallant friend referred to what had passed on a former debate. He concluded by repeating the eulogies on Mr. Arbuthnot and the Duke of Wellington.

Mr. Canning had been endeavouring to recollect as distinctly as possible the expressions which had fallen from the learned gent. on a former night, and had been this evening commented on by his gallant friend. He could not recollect with certainty what the learned gent. said: but in regard to the application which had been made by his gallant friend of the word "insult" or "insolence," it appeared to him, that the word, if used, was meant to apply not to any individual, but to that letter of which so much had been said, and that passage in it wherein it now appeared that a clerical error had been committed. It was printed "the said William Harrison," instead of "the said Mr. William Harrison;" but in the original manuscript letter, it seemed, the word "Mr." was inserted. Whilst he agreed that it was no part of the learned member's duty to deny a charge preferred on the authority of a newspaper, he hoped the learned gent. would not feel the same objection to stating whether he (Mr. Canning) was right in his impression of what had been said on the occasion alluded to?

Dr. Lushington said, that after what had fallen from the rt. hon. gent. he felt justified in stating what he would sooner have parted with his life than have stated in answer to the wanton and unguarded attack of the hon. member for Durham (hear, hear). That hon. member had commented on his conduct while he held in his hands the original copy of the letter which carried on its face the explanation of his (Dr. L.'s) expressions. He should have betrayed his duty as a member of parliament—he should have been destitute of the courage of a man—he should have been utterly unworthy to sit in that house, if he had condescended to an explanation so demanded (hear, hear). Irritated for a moment he certainly might have been; intimidated he never could be (hear, hear). Now, as to what the rt. hon. gent. had said in describing his language on a former night, to the best of his recollection he had stated it accurately, except as to one word. The word "insolence" had never passed his lips; he should have considered it, under any circumstances, as an improper term. But, knowing that the paper was signed by Mr. Harrison, a learned and eminent counsel, the law adviser of the Treasury, and the brother of a Secretary of a Board at which Mr. Arbuthnot sat, he might possibly have characterized the letter as an insulting letter (hear). The house could not call upon him to say more, than that he had been mistaken upon a matter about which any individual would have been mistaken who had not seen the original manuscript (hear, hear).

Sir Henry Hardinge begged to repeat, that the particular word which he complained of he thought to be an improper one; and if it had been employed, as he conceived it had been by the learned gent. he still thought it very improper (hear).

Sir R. Fergusson could not allow this conversation to close without observing that his gallant friend (Sir H. Hardinge) had expressed himself in a tone of warmth not very usual, and, as he thought, a little beyond the forms of that house. The cause of the error had been satisfactorily explained, and he hoped his gallant friend would say he was sorry for his warmth (hear, hear). He assured his gallant friend that he would be the last man to advise him to do any thing which would be discreditable to him either as a soldier or as a member of that house, but he declared upon his honour that were the gallant officer his own brother, he would recommend him to pursue a similar course (loud cries of hear, hear).

Sir H. Hardinge said, that if any expression used by him was offensive or unparliamentary, he was ready to explain in the fullest manner. He admitted that his manner was vehement, but he declared with his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel) that he was not conscious of having used, or intended any expression offensive to the hon. and learned gent. (hear, hear). He could not at the same time admit, that the use of the name "Wm. Harrison," instead of the name "Mr. Wm. Harrison," was sufficient to justify either the word "insolence" or "insolent."

The Speaker said, that he rose with the purpose of bearing his testimony that nothing unparliamentary had fallen from the gallant officer. Had his impression been different, he should have been unpardonable for neglecting to interrupt. The gallant officer just expressed his willingness to retract any thing unparliamentary that might have fallen from him; and by so doing he had done himself the highest honour, and no more than justice to the house.

TUESDAY, JULY 5.—Mr. Abercrombie rose to present a petition from a very gallant and distinguished officer, Sir Evan John Murray M'Gregor, Bart., one of the captors entitled in distribution to the Deccan prize money. The petitioner was one of His Majesty's aides-de-camp, and Deputy Adjutant-General of the King's troops in the East Indies; and in that capacity attached to the army commanded by Sir T. Hislop. He was also a member of a prize committee assembled at the head-quarters of that Lieut. General in the field, and of another prize committee subsequently appointed at Madras; and in consequence of these circumstances he had been enabled to assist in the preparation of the statements of the army of the Deccan. The same facts, combined with that of his having been agent under a power of attorney for Sir T. Hislop, while Sir Thomas was absent on the continent, had necessarily occasioned frequent intercourse between himself and the counsel and agents for the Deccan army. The petitioner referred to the following passage in the petition presented by Col. Lushington, on Friday, July 1:—"That upon the wisdom and justice of the trustees, the petitioners chiefly rely for the recovery of all that can be obtained of this booty, for its continued preservation from needless and expensive litigation, and for the earliest practicable distribution of the prize, according to the usages of the service, and of the conditions of His Majesty's grant." Sir Evan M'Gregor, in reference to this passage, prayed "that the said petitioners may be required to state the grounds upon which their apprehensions, touching needless and expensive litigation, are founded, and to whom they are applicable; and that if it shall turn out that they are intended to animadvert on the conduct of the counsel, law and prize agents for the army of the Deccan, he was ready to verify the allegations of this his petition at the bar of the house." Now it was to be observed, that in the petition of the four officers, there was a distinct insinuation of a general desire on the part of the agents, or of the attorney and the other legal persons employed on behalf of the claimants, to raise up unnecessary litigation in this business (hear, hear). In making that imputation, the parties had named no individual: let them only fix upon the name of an individual and he would doubtless be ready, when called upon, to meet their charge. The four officers came forward to vindicate the Duke of Wellington from the blame which he was thought to have incurred in this affair, as if that could be done by preferring unfounded charges against others. As men of honour, they are bound to speak out, and name the parties they referred to. Believing this to be the petition of an honest and conscientious man, acting merely on the desire to make good the motives of his own conduct and that of the legal advisers of the captors generally, he moved to bring up the petition.

Col. Lushington, on behalf of the four gallant gentlemen, the petitioners on a former evening, disclaimed any imputation on their part, upon the professional gentleman who had been alluded to. The object of those petitioners was simply to express their confidence in the management of the Duke of Wellington.

Sir H. Hardinge thought it competent to the gallant officers, whose petition was presented on a former evening, to express themselves in the way they had done. As to the disposition to go to law, imputed to some of the parties, he thought it might easily be traced in these proceedings. Some of them had desired powers of attorney to be sent over for the receipt of prize; others had gone so far as to claim that the value of a palace which the Deccan army had destroyed should be included in the prize-fund, and others had even gone the length of proposing that a claim for compensation should be reserved, in the year 1832, at the expiration of the Company's charter, for the territories of a Rajah whom they had captured and dispossessed. There seemed to be an extraordinary sensitiveness on the part of the learned gent. (Mr. Brougham), to any imputation on the lawyers. He must, however, take leave to say, that in this instance the gentlemen of the long robe had already had quite enough of this plunder (hear, hear, and laughter). Their bills amounted to 14,000*l.* or upwards (hear, hear), whilst the expenses of the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot, for two years hard work as trustees, had not exceeded 150*l.* (hear). He thought that such proceedings proved the disposition to go to law, which had been suggested. Whilst other papers were demanded, he should like to see the law-bills printed; he should like to see how much Mr. Harrison and the other lawyers had shared of the Deccan booty. He then went into a defence of the trustees, observing that whenever the Duke had conversed with Sir T. Hinlop, or any other gentleman, on this business, the matter of such conversations had always found its way into the newspapers, and that in a most garbled way; so that at last his Grace had declined any personal communication with Sir Thomas. He fully acquitted Sir T. Hinlop of any participation in these proceedings; but he thought the Duke of Wellington had acted rightly, especially as he had said to all the officers, at the same time, "Come as often as you please—turn over every account—examine as much as you please; but I will not, after what has happened, hold any further personal communications on this subject." As to the pamphlets which had been published on this subject, the duke despised them as much as any man; but he was not the less determined, that if any part of the case were printed, that all should be printed together.

Mr. Brougham could assure the gallant officer that he did not mean to vindicate the law, or the lawyers, from the gallant officer's attacks. Bad people there undoubtedly were, and he was sorry for it, in every profession—some, he feared, who plundered in black coats as others did in red, (hear). The gallant officer seemed, however, to be under misapprehension as to the nature of the charge against the Duke of Wellington, which was, in fact, a charge of gross ignorance as to the law of prize, as applicable to the case of the claimants. It could not be supposed that any other objection had entered into the minds of the lawyers, who represented the petitioning claimants. As to the passage complained of in the petition of the four officers, it evidently alluded to those lawyers. Now, what was the fact? The estimated expense of these proceedings—for not a bill had been yet delivered—was, it was true, 14,000*l.*; but let it not be forgotten that the professional agents employed, had recovered upwards of 300,000*l.*, leaving a balance of at least 286,000*l.* on the account (hear, hear). This was certainly expensive litigation: but let it be observed, that the Marquis of Hastings's army, and another force, were claimants for the same booty; and these the Deccan army's counsel had beaten out of the field by a judgment of the Privy Council. He was often in courts of law himself, but it was as an advocate; if he should ever have the misfortune of standing there as a client (a laugh), he should like exceedingly well, whether plaintiff or defendant, to obtain for such a rate of expense as large a return. With the exception of the petitioners, all the parties acquiesced in the arrangements which had been entered into on behalf of the Deccan army. Who were the petitioners? Were they a large and important body? No,—they consisted of only four officers. One of them, Col. Noble, had been for the three last weeks in the Highlands of Scotland. That gentleman, therefore, must have authorized his name to be placed to the petition by letter, or else he must have given his consent to that proceeding before he left town four weeks ago. If the petition had been prepared for three weeks, he could not understand why it had not been presented before. Had the gallant officer who presented it been beating up for recruits? If so, he condoled with him on the scanty supply which the Deccan army had furnished (a laugh). He (Mr. Brougham) wished all the papers to be produced; he knew who would then make the worst figure, and he was quite sure it would not be Mr. Atcheson, and the rest of the lawyers and agents.

Col. Lushington avowed that he had signed Col. Noble's name to the petition, but he felt fully authorized to do so, having conversed with his gallant friend before he left town, and ascertained his sentiments on the subject.

Mr. Brougham was surprised that any person, in consequence of some conversation which he had had with another, should imagine that he possessed a carte blanche, to sign the name of that other to a petition, containing charges against individuals. He thought such a practice inconsistent with the privilege of the house.

Mr. Canning agreed, that it was carrying informality too far to sign a person's name to a petition merely on the warrant of opinions expressed in general conversation. He went on to observe that there were two modes of settling a dispute, one, by an unexpensive arbitration, and the other by process of law. He thought the former mode the best (hear). He thought it hard that a person could not express that opinion without its being said of him that he brought forward charges against individuals connected with the legal profession. He knew no reason why the gentlemen of that profession should feel sore because it was supposed that they liked employment. If it were said that physicians liked to get patients, clergymen the cure of souls, a lawyer clients—was this to be considered as scandalum magnatum against those professions? He remembered that not long since a member of that house stated that he settled in half an hour a difference which had been the subject of litigation for many years. Such a story in the present temper of the learned gent. might be construed into an attack on lawyers generally. It was too much to expect that he should not express his opinion in favour of arbitration against litigation, because there happened to be more than the usual proportion of lawyers on the opposite benches. Indeed he never recollected an opposition so entirely composed of lawyers (a laugh). It was the disposition of every profession to get business, and if that were the case at present with respect to the bar, it was the first time that honourable and magnificent profession had appeared in so disinterested a light.

Mr. Abercrombie said, he objected to the petition presented on a former evening, not because it attacked the legal profession generally, but because it advanced specific charges against individuals.

Mr. Brougham said, that the gallant officer might speak as long as he liked in defence of the Duke of Wellington, and use as many hard words as he pleased, but it would do no good. The question should be decided not on the unsworn statements of the gallant officer, but on the sworn evidence of competent witnesses.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Interest on Loans in India.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 17.—The Marquis of Hastings rose to introduce a bill to explain the 36th clause of the 13th Geo. III., which limited the rate of interest on loans made in India to 12 per cent. His bill was rendered necessary by the construction lately put upon this clause by the law officers of the Crown, in contradiction of the system which had been acted on for half a century in India. According to this opinion the clause in question extended to the whole of India—even to the dominions of independent princes, over whom the East India Company exercised no control. The preamble of the act showed the real meaning of the clause. It was made penal to take a higher rate than 12 per cent., because, under the plea of interest, presents had sometimes been corruptly taken; but the framers of the bill never dreamed of restraining British subjects from taking any rate of interest in the dominions of an independent prince. If this could be supposed, the greatest confusion would ensue: for how could acts done in foreign independent states be made cognizable in his Majesty's courts in India? The act, on this construction, imposed a penalty which the Courts had no means of inflicting. He then proceeded to show that the construction of the law-officers of the Crown was inconsistent with subsequent regulations of the Supreme Government of India. These regulations which were registered in the Supreme Court of Justice, and were annually laid before parliament, had the force of law. By one of them, promulgated in 1793, the rate of interest was advanced from 25 to 37 per cent. Another, in 1803, extended it to 40. These regulations, together with an uninterrupted practice of half a century, clearly showed the opinion of the Directors and the Indian Government, as to the limits imposed as the rate of interest by the provisions of the act. On these grounds he submitted a bill to amend and explain the 13th Geo. III. He should, hereafter, move that the opinion of the judges be taken to ascertain whether this bill effectually explained the meaning of the clause of the act relative to the rate of interest.

The bill was read a first time.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.—The Marquis of Hastings moved the second reading of his bill. He proceeded to recapitulate the substance of his former speech, observing that the judges and several noble lords were now in the house, who were absent on the last occasion.—To obviate all uncertainty, he proposed, in the present bill, to declare, in express terms, that the clause in the 13th Geo. III. did not extend to persons within the territories of independent sovereigns. In the greater part of all former statutes the words "East Indies" were exclusively applied to the possessions of the Company. And as to the 37th Geo. III. referred to in the papers on the table, that statute only prohibited the lending money to the native princes, with the sanction of the governor-general. This sanction would not have been reserved, if the possible necessity of supplying the native sovereigns with loans had not been contemplated by the legislature; and the act would have been nugatory, if the interest on such loans had been restricted to 12 per cent.—a rate at which no lenders would be found. He then moved the second reading, and put a question to the judges, whether the bill introduced did truly set forth the intent and meaning of the clause in the 13th Geo. III.

The bill was read a second time, after which the judges withdrew, and the house adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Lord Chief Justice Best delivered the opinion of the judges in favour of the bill. The act for restricting the rate of interest to 12 per cent. was a penal statute, and therefore to be construed strictly. By its literal interpretation it was only to be enforced within the possessions of the Company. It could not regulate the transactions of borrowers or lenders in the dominions of the native princes. Such borrowers must apply for protection to their own Government, and not to that of the Company. Besides, by the act, the offence of usury was to be punished where it was committed—but what jurisdiction had we in the dominions of the native princes? In this construction of the law they were supported by two decisions of the Supreme Court of Bengal.

The bill was ordered for committal to-morrow.

FINANCE AND TRADE.

The Budget.

COMMONS, MONDAY, FEB. 28.—The house resolved itself into a committee of ways and means.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: Although he could not forbear to congratulate the house upon the auspicious circumstances under which they were called upon to review the state of the finances, he could truly say that he did not do so for the mere purpose of making a flourish, nor with any desire to induce the country to indulge in an unreasonable exultation as to the present, or an extravagant anticipation as to the future. But although he had no such object in view, and although there might be in this country, and unquestionably were in other countries, persons who, either jealous of the eminence of our station, or ignorant of the causes which had placed us there, might represent our present prosperity as the forerunner of our ruin, and might wish to represent us as having merely hastened

Excelsæ turris tabulata, unde altior emet

Causæ, et impulsæ præcepit immane ruinæ;” he nevertheless was of opinion, that if upon a fair review of our situation there should appear to be nothing hollow in its foundation, artificial in its superstructure, or flimsy in its general result, they might safely venture to contemplate with instructive admiration the harmony of its proportions and the solidity of its basis. He said, with instructive admiration, because he was satisfied that no one could calmly and philosophically consider it, without seeing portrayed before him in the most legible characters, the course of policy which it was our duty to pursue. If we wished to consolidate our own resources, and to promote the general happiness of mankind. Under these impressions then, and wishing gentlemen to keep these considerations in view in applying themselves to the present business, he should proceed to the details of the question before the house. In doing this, he should first bring under the notice of the committee a comparison of the actual revenue of the last year, with the estimate of it which he laid before the house at the commencement of the last session. He assumed at that time, that at the expiration of 1824 there would be a clear surplus of about 1,050,000*l.*; and upon that assumption, and carrying its views forward to the end of the year 1827, the house proceeded to make a reduction in our taxes to the amount of no less than 1,260,000*l.*, of which sum he calculated that the revenue would in that year lose about one half, or 630,000*l.*; so that if, at the end of the year, the surplus had been 420,000*l.*, his estimate would have been realised, and no expectation disappointed. It was, however, with no ordinary satisfaction that he had to state, that notwithstanding the reduction then made, and notwithstanding that a more immediate effect was given to that reduction, and greater loss consequently sustained than had originally been contemplated, the actual surplus of the year was 1,437,744*l.*—greatly exceeding not only what would have been sufficient to realise his estimate, but exceeding even that surplus which he had thought himself authorized to expect, independent of any subsequent diminution of the taxes (hear, hear).—He would now advert to some details of the case, and make some observations upon the different branches of the revenue in which this increase had taken place. And first as to the customs. The receipt under this head, he had estimated at 11,550,000*l.*, and having afterwards repealed customs duties to the amount of at least 900,000*l.*, of which he anticipated that 450,000*l.* would be lost to the revenue in 1824, it followed that his calculations would have been verified if the actual receipt had been 11,100,000*l.*: in addition, however, to the loss sustained by the immediate effect of reduced duty, the net receipt of the customs was still further lowered by the payment of no less than 480,000*l.* upon the stock in hand of silk, in order to give more immediate efficacy to the change of duty and system in regard to that article: and yet, in spite of these two circumstances, it appeared that the net produce of the customs for 1824 was no less than 11,337,000*l.* Now to what was this increase to be ascribed? The proximate cause was, doubtless, the increased capacity of the people of this country to consume the produce of other countries, aided and invigorated by the reciprocal facility which our consumption of foreign articles gave to other nations in the extended use of the products of our own industry. But it might be said that this increase was accidental; that it had arisen out of some special circumstances of the time, or from some peculiarity in our situation. Surely that was not the case. Was it not occasioned, on the contrary, by something the very reverse of what was ephemeral and peculiar, by something inherent in the nature and connected with the very essence of human society? The demonstrated tendency of population to increase would alone be sufficient, in a great measure, to account for it: but independent of that cause, there was a principle in the constitution of social man which led nations to open their arms to each other, and to establish new and closer connexions by ministering to mutual convenience; a principle which created new wants, stimulated new desires, sought for new enjoyments, and, by the beneficence of providence, contributed to the general happiness of mankind. This principle might, it was true, be impeded by war and its calamities; it might be diverted by accident from its natural channel; it might be counteracted (as we well knew in this country) by the improvidence of mistaken legislation; but it was always alive, always in motion, and had a perpetual tendency to go forward; and when they reflected upon the facility which was given to its operation by the recent discoveries of modern science, and by the magical energies of the steam-engine, who could doubt that its expansion was progressive, and its effect permanent? It appeared to him, therefore, that it might safely be asserted, that the increase in this branch of the revenue was not the result of accident, or of a temporary combination of fortunate circumstances, and that he was not too sanguine when he took the produce of last year as the solid basis upon which he calculated the state of that branch of the revenue for years to come.—The next item of revenue was the excise, which was peculiarly important, both from its amount, and from its immediate connexion with the comforts of the people. In this branch, not only had the produce of last year surpassed that of the former, which itself exceeded the average of the three preceding years, but it had gone very far beyond what he had ventured to anticipate. The produce which he had anticipated was 25,625,000*l.*; the actual result was 26,768,000*l.* being an excess of 1,143,000*l.* This must be matter of sincere gratification to every one who felt an interest in the well being of his fellow-subjects; since he could state, that of almost every article contributing to the excise, there had been such an increased consumption, as to indicate, in the most unequivocal manner, the increasing ease, comfort, and happiness of the people. This would be shewn by a reference to a paper which he held in his hand, and which exhibited an increase upon the following articles, which he would read to the committee; viz.:—An increase upon auctions of 12 per cent.; strong beer, 15; table beer, 20; bricks, 40; tiles, 15; tallow candles, 9½; wax candles, 8; coffee, 2½; cocoa nuts, 6½; glass, 20; cyder and perry, 12; leather (tanned), 10; leather skins, 15; licences, 7; malt, 3; paper (1 and 2 class) 12½; paper (mill board), 15; pepper, 10; printed goods (calicoes) 24; stained paper, 20; hard soap, 7½; soft soap, 12½; British spirits, 66; foreign spirits, 25; stone bottles, 15; sweets, &c., 45; tea, 1½; tobacco and snuff, 3½; wine, 5; wrought plate, 15 per cent. He now came to the stamps. He estimated last year that they would produce 6,800,000*l.*; and he afterwards proposed a reduction of law stamps, which, at the rate of 200,000*l.* per ann., and commencing Oct. 10th, 1824, would have brought the receipt down to 6,750,000*l.*—½ only of the reduced duty being lost in that year. The real produce of the year had been 7,244,000*l.*, so that he had the satisfaction of knowing that we had obtained the benefit of cheap justice without making the sacrifice which we were prepared to encounter. The Post-office he took at 1,460,000*l.*; it brought 1,520,000*l.*; that increase being the natural consequence of increasing activity in the general business of the country. Upon the whole, he might say, that although there might have been some who feared at the time that he was risking too much, all must now admit that he kept within moderate bounds, and that he might safely venture to adopt the same principle in framing his present estimates.—He had now to state to the committee, his calculations for the present year, and the grounds on which they were formed. He assumed the produce of 1825, including every thing, at 56,445,370*l.* The expenditure would be 56,001,842*l.* including 5,486,654*l.* as sinking fund, which would give a clear surplus of 443,528*l.* He would proceed to examine the details. The Customs for 1825, he took at 11,300,000*l.*, and he would explain why he assumed an excess above the actual net produce of last year. Taking the last year's receipt as the basis of the present, he might add to it 50,000*l.*, which would be saved by the progressive diminution of certain bounties upon fish and linen; he might add also, 460,000*l.* being the amount of the repayment of the stock in hand of silk, which was merely a casual loss. These sums, then, would stand as follows:

Receipts of 1825 .....	£11,327,000
Diminution of bounties .....	50,000
Stock of silk in hand .....	460,000

From this, however, he must deduct 410,000*l.* for the full operation of the reduction of duties last year, which would leave the produce at 11,427,000*l.*; but as he was anxious to keep within the mark, he would only estimate it at 11,350,000*l.*, retaining elbow room to the amount of 77,000*l.*—The estimate for the Excise he stated at 26,400,000*l.*; the produce of last year was 26,768,000*l.*, from which must be deducted 200,000*l.*, on account of the entire cessation of the salt duty, and 37,000*l.* on account of the further effect of last year's diminution of the duty on rum. The Stamps would, in all probability, produce 7,100,000*l.*, after allowing for a diminution of 150,000*l.* on account of the further effect of the repeal of the law stamp duty. The assessed and land taxes would not be less than 4,875,000*l.*, nor the Post-office than 1,500,000*l.*, being 20,000*l.* less than last year. The miscellaneous, including 100,000*l.* due under treaty from the Dutch Government, would be 750,000*l.*; and lastly, there would be received from the trustees of half pay and pensions, 4,470,370*l.* The whole, therefore, would stand as follows:—

Customs .....	£11,350,000
Excise .....	26,400,000
Stamps .....	7,100,000
Taxes .....	4,875,000
Post-office .....	1,500,000
Miscellaneous .....	750,000
Trustees of Half Pay .....	4,470,370

£56,445,370

Turning now to the expenditure of 1825, it would be found to amount to 56,001,842*l.* Of this, the first items constituted the permanent charge upon the consolidated fund; and he should here explain that the increase of the sinking fund beyond last year arose in great measure from the course adopted respecting the dissentient holders of 4 per cents. The stock standing in their names amounted to about 6,000,000*l.*; and as they were to be paid off by an issue of exchequer bills, which were to be subsequently discharged out of the sinking fund, the amount of their stock was transferred, at an interest of 3½ per cent., from their names to those of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, and the interest of the stock so transferred, became an addition to the sinking fund. The other items of expenditure arose from the annual supplies voted by parliament, and the two together would stand thus:—

Interest of Debt .....	£27,233,670
Ditto of Exchequer Bills .....	40,000
Civil List, &c. ....	2,060,000
Half Pay Annuity .....	2,900,000
Sinking Fund .....	5,486,654

£37,610,324

SUPPLY.

Interest of Exchequer Bills £	£80,090
Army .....	7,911,751
Navy .....	5,983,126
Ordnance .....	1,376,641
Miscellaneous .....	2,300,000

Total Expenditure..... £56,001,842

It was unnecessary to trouble the committee with any detailed examination of this expenditure, further than to say, that a portion of the increased charge of the army arose from the expense which would be incurred this year by training the English and Scotch militia, and that the miscellaneous charge was increased by the necessity of paying no less than £50,000l. to the United States of America for certain negroes who left their masters and attached themselves to our forces during the late war. By the treaty of Ghent we were bound to pay for such negroes, and the amount to which he had referred was the result of a reference, under the provisions of that treaty, to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia. Deducting, then, the total charge of 56,001,842l. from the total revenue of 56,445,370l., the net surplus would be, as before stated, 443,528l.; and if, following the course which was pursued last year, we cast our eyes forward to 1826 and 1827, a surplus might be expected of 864,676l. for 1826, and of 1,254,676l. for 1827. The latter surplus would derive its increase beyond the year immediately preceding it, from a diminution which he proposed to effect in the bounty upon the exportation of refined sugar. By the present law, the duty upon raw sugar varied according to its price; when the average price was below 47s. the duty was 27s. per cwt., and the duty was liable to a graduated scale of increase according as the average price might reach certain specified amounts. This was a very faulty system, first, because the additional duty (which was necessarily presumed to be paid by the consumer) attached when the price of the article was already high, and secondly, because the drawback upon the exportation of refined sugar was calculated upon the supposition that the duty upon the muscovado was invariably paid at the higher rate. Now, as he was willing to forego the contingent advantage of the ascending scale, and thought it desirable to fix the duty permanently at 27s., it seemed to follow as an obvious consequence, that the drawback should be modified accordingly; and this change of system would save to the revenue 3s. per cwt. in the drawback, and might be taken as a total saving of about 300,000l.: in the estimate, therefore, of the Customs for 1827, the first year in which the modification would be in operation, he assumed an addition to that amount. He need not press upon the committee the propriety of taking this course: the 3s. in question being a positive bounty, and not a mere drawback of duty actually paid, it clearly became the interest of foreign governments to impose an additional duty upon our refined sugar, equivalent to that bounty, and thus to put that revenue into their own pockets at our expense. At the same time he should be prepared to recommend to the committee a reduction of duty upon West India produce of different kinds to the full amount of the charge which would be favoured by this change of system. It thus appeared that the surplus of the years ending with 1827 would be as follows:—

Surplus of 1824 .....	£1,437,744
1825 .....	443,528
1826 .....	864,676
1827 .....	1,254,676
Total .....	£4,000,624

When he last year presented to the house a calculation of surplus founded upon the same principle, he asked, "What we were to do with it?" He repeated that question now, and he answered it as he did then, "We may do with it a great deal of good; and it is our duty to do it." He should submit a series of propositions to the house, which, he was satisfied, would be found eminently calculated to promote the general interests of the community, if those interests were considered in their more extended sense, as combining enlightened principles of policy with positive relief from fiscal pressure. He had three main objects in view:—1st. Increased facility of consumption at home, in conjunction with increased extension of commerce abroad; 2nd. A combination of the first principle with the restriction of smuggling; and 3rd. Some alleviation of the pressure of direct taxation. He mentioned direct taxation last, because he was convinced that the advantages which the country would derive from a steady attention to the two preceding objects, were ten thousand times greater than those which would result from giving a decided preference to the latter. He was well aware to what he exposed himself in making this statement; he had been repeatedly told that evening, that if he wished to acquire popularity, either for himself or the Government, the best way to obtain it would be to reduce the assessed taxes. But, although it would be folly to despise popularity, he would not seek it by consulting particular interests at the expense of the general good; and he was sure he should not deserve it if, for its sake, he could persuade himself to abandon clear, fixed, and important principles, which were useless if confined to theory, but eminently beneficial if reduced to practice. First, then, as to the extension of our intercourse with foreign nations. The house, he was happy to say, had gone along with him in promoting this great object, and he trusted that the country was by this time convinced of the good sense which dictated the policy of getting rid both of positive prohibitions and of prohibitory duties. Much had already been done upon this subject, but much remained to be done; and it was the intention of his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) to take an early opportunity of submitting to the house a plan for reducing, within moderate and reasonable bounds, all the remaining prohibitory duties, and thus to strike as it were from our recollection all those errors and prejudices which had so long shackled the energies of our own commerce, and restricted the productive industry of the world. It would not be necessary for him now to go into detail upon this subject; but there was one particular article which was so important, and which had been so frequently alluded to in the present session, that he could not avoid to mention it. He alluded to foreign iron. The demand for iron in this country had risen of late to such a wonderful degree, that the produce of our own mines was unequal to meet it at any reasonable price; and this demand had not, he believed, been produced by any sudden or occasional cause; but it was the result of the increasing prosperity of the world in general, which brought within the reach of increasing numbers, articles of iron manufacture which were essential to the convenience and the business of all classes of society. But such was the present high price of iron; that he was credibly informed, that orders of this description intended for Birmingham and Sheffield, had been transferred to cheaper markets on the continent, in the hopes that lowness of price might compensate for inferiority of workmanship. He would meet, therefore, the narrow and short-sighted policy, which would say "Let us use no iron but our own," by saying to the manufacturer, "Use all the iron you can get." With a view to give effect to this proposition, he would recommend that the present duty of 6l. 10s. per ton should be reduced to 1l. 10s.; and he was confident that whilst this measure would render essential service to all those employed in this description of manufacture, it would be found equally beneficial to those who produced the iron itself, and who were much too enlightened not to acquiesce in the policy which dictated the proposed reduction. As far as the revenue was concerned, he did not conceive that it would incur any loss, as the very high rate of the present duty operated in a great measure as a prohibition; but he thought it necessary to state in this place, that it was not proposed that the reduction should immediately apply to all countries from whence iron might be brought. One of the objects which the British Government had in view in diminishing duties upon foreign produce was, to set an example to other governments. There were some states which had manifested an unequivocal disposition to adopt a similar policy; but others did not as yet appear to have emancipated themselves from their former system; in truth, they might be said to be still heaping restriction upon restriction. He did not wonder at this, because he could not forget how long we were ourselves before we saw the error of our ways, and shook off our ancient trammels; but he thought, at the same time, that however anxious we might be to give to all countries the benefit of our example and our practice, we were not bound to do so indiscriminately, or to abstain from making distinctions in favour of those nations whose views and principles were conformable to our own. He did not, however, believe that there would long exist any ground for the practical application of this distinction, because he was willing to persuade himself, that what was sound in principle and beneficial in its result would sooner or later become the rule in the intercourse between nations, particularly when the whole world would see that what we professed to aim at in one year was not overturned by a contradictory practice in the next. He should now proceed to state the reduction which he proposed upon various other articles of foreign produce, the duties upon which, although not avowedly or really prohibitory, were nevertheless so high as to impede the consumption, and to press with considerable severity upon those who used them. The first of these articles was hemp. This, it was true, was not perhaps an item of very material importance in the general consumption of the country; but it affected very seriously one of the most valuable interests of the country—he meant our mercantile marine, an interest closely connected with the well-being of the country; whatever contributed to the maintenance of that great fulcrum of our strength, deserved the favourable consideration of the house. With this view, therefore, he should propose the reduction of half the present duty upon hemp, at a loss to the revenue of about 100,000l.—The next item to which he would call the attention of the Committee was coffee, a matter of no small consequence in reference to our West Indian colonies. At present the duties upon coffee were as follow:—West India, 1s. per lb.; East India, 1s. 6d.; Foreign 2s. 6d. He did not mean to say that these rates of duty were very high, or that they pressed with severity upon the great mass of consumers in this country: it was nevertheless true that the consumption of coffee, particularly since the imposition of the last duty in 1819, had by no means kept pace with the increased population and ease of the country; from which it might reasonably be inferred that the high rate of duty had contributed not a little to curtail it. It was besides a matter of great importance to give every facility to the cultivation, in the West Indies, of every species of tropical produce as well as sugar; and, as it was well known, that the labour of cultivating coffee was much less severe than what was necessary for the production of sugar, he flattered himself that the increased consumption of coffee which he anticipated from this reduction, would in that respect be of much utility in that part of his Majesty's dominions. He proposed to extend this reduction to cocoa, and taking both articles together, the revenue would probably be diminished to the amount of 150,000l.—He came now to a matter which, in reference to the principle which he had just laid down, as to the effect of the high duty upon coffee in curtailing its consumption, had long occupied his attention, and had upon various occasions, during the last two years, been under the notice of the house. He alluded to the article of wine; and when upon former occasions he had been asked whether the Government contemplated any change respecting it, although he did not then feel himself enabled to take that subject in hand, he never argued against the principle of reduction, and could not shut his ears to the notorious fact, that the consumption of wine in the United Kingdom had not only not increased, but had in truth greatly fallen off. He might perhaps be told, that wine was a mere luxury, that the duties upon it fell exclusively upon those who were best able to pay them, and that the poorer classes of the community would derive no benefit from their diminution. He could not admit that these were conclusive objections; in some sense, it was true, wine might be considered as a luxury; but it should not be forgotten that it had medicinal virtues, and that in many diseases to which the poor were peculiarly liable, wine was recommended as essential to recovery; and surely as regarded the middle classes of society, it never could be maintained, that it was a matter of indifference to them whether wine were highly taxed or not, unless it were argued that there was no motive for facilitating to those classes the enjoyment of any thing beyond the bare necessities and comforts of life. Although, therefore, the more wealthy part of the community might derive the most immediate and extensive benefit from the proposed reduction, he hoped it would not be supposed that he was looking to their advantage alone, or that he founded his proposition upon any desire to relieve them at the expense of others. The truth therefore being, that since the duty upon wine had been so high, the consumption had fallen off, and that the consequent means of other nations, producers of wine, to extend their commercial transactions with us, had been proportionably diminished, it would seem to follow as a necessary consequence, that an augmentation in the use of wine would give a new stimulus to many branches of trade. In the years 1801, 1802, and 1803, the duty on wine in Great Britain was as follows:—

French	1801	—	8s.	9d.	per gallon.
	1802	—	8	10
	1803	—	8	10

French	1801	—	6s.	5d.
	1802	—	6	6
	1803	—	6	6

The average consumption was:—

French wine	874,000 gallons.
Other wine	7,396,000

Now the present duty was 11s. 5½d. per gallon on French wine, and 7s. 7d. on other wine, and the consumption of 1824, after the lapse of more than twenty years, notwithstanding the great increase of our population and of our general opulence, had been so far from keeping pace with that increase, that it did not exceed 234,264 gallons of French wine, and 4,847, 976 gallons of other wine. Now, it was possible a reduction to the scale of 1801 might be sufficient to bring back the consumption to the rate of that period; but as it would be highly imprudent to reduce the duty at all, unless it were done effectually, he had thought it better to descend at once to 6s. on French and 4s. on other wine—a reduction of nearly half of the present amount, being at the rate of 1s. 3d. per bottle upon French wine, and 1s. within a fraction, upon all other foreign wine. In Ireland he could not venture to calculate upon an increase of consumption to the same amount, because he could not venture to reduce the duty to what it was in that part of the United Kingdom in the years before alluded to. But if the consumption of wine in Ireland amounted to two-thirds of the average of those years, and equalled that average in England and Scotland, the loss to the revenue under this head might be taken at £30,000!—The division of the subject to which he had now arrived, was one of peculiar importance. It referred not only to the principle of giving relief to the consumer, but to one of a higher order, and which was essentially connected with the morals and happiness of the people; he meant the prevention of smuggling. Smuggling he conceived to be one of the greatest domestic evils that could afflict a country. Its active instruments haunted us wherever we went; they hovered round our coast, they penetrated our harbours, they traversed the interior; they invaded the splendid palace of the noble, and the humble cottage of the poor: they offered their temptations in every quarter, and he feared that all classes of society yielded to the seduction. Surely this was an evil of tremendous magnitude; confounding all notions of right and wrong, and sapping with incessant and increasing power the very foundations upon which obedience to the law was built, it brought the law itself into disrepute, and the violation of it into universal credit. The progress of this mischief had been endeavoured to be checked by the most rigorous measures; they had surrounded the coast with ships and guards as with a wall of brass; they had imposed penalty upon penalty, and inflicted punishment upon punishment, but all in vain. Why? Because the cause of the evil was the law, and the alteration of the law had not yet been tried. When he proposed to make a great change in the distillery law of Ireland and Scotland, there were not wanting persons who exclaimed, "What! reduce the duty of spirits? Make all the people drunk? For God's sake abstain from so fatal a measure." The measure was nevertheless taken; and so far from any evil having resulted from the step, tranquillity, order, and harmony, had superseded the disturbances, the confusion, and the ill-blood which arose from illicit distillation. Why, then, should the system of which experience had proved the advantage not be tried in England? He did not mean to say, that they should proceed with precipitation and rashness, or that all could be done at once; on the contrary, when he had been pressed upon this subject upon former occasions, he had always said, "Do not push me too hard; do not ride a willing horse to death." But he would unhesitatingly apply this principle to the Distillery Law of England, which in truth required revision, not merely on its own account, but also on account of the degree to which it was affected by the change which had taken place in the other portions of the United Kingdom; because, although the reduction of duty upon spirits in Ireland and Scotland had undoubtedly been attended with the most beneficial results, it had nevertheless produced indirectly a corresponding evil in England. The illicit distiller had been driven out of the north of Scotland; but with what, he feared, he was about to call characteristic sagacity, he had established himself in the south, and carried on from thence no inconsiderable traffic in smuggled whisky across the border. He did not mean to say, that this sort of smuggling affected the revenue in any very serious degree, but in point of morality it had all those prejudicial and dangerous qualities which he had ascribed to an evasion of revenue laws. They must, therefore, deal with it immediately, if they wished to complete the improvement in this branch of the fiscal economy; and he proposed, in the first instance, to equalize the system under which the Distillery might be carried on throughout the United Kingdom, by which means numberless restrictions would be removed from the trade, and the intercourse between different parts of the country indiscriminately opened. As the law stood, the distiller must begin by making a raw spirit, which he could not sell for consumption in that form, but which he must consign to the rectifier, in whose hands it underwent a fresh distillation; and being mixed with various compounds, was then distributed to the consumers under the denomination of gin; whiskey, which was the pure extract from grain, unrectified and uncompounded, could not be sold for consumption. Now, he did not mean to say that the people of this country would necessarily like whiskey better than gin; but he did mean to say, that it was but reasonable that they should be at liberty to drink it if they choose. The hon. member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hume) admitted last year, that amongst various offences of the same kind to which he pleaded guilty, he had constantly in his house an ample supply of genuine smuggled Scotch whiskey. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) congratulated him, therefore, especially upon the change proposed; for, hereafter he would be enabled to indulge in this favourite beverage, without being exposed to those unpleasant liabilities which doubtless had given him many a qualm, by mixing his chisley with the vapid drawback of an impending penalty. But this change of system would not be sufficient to effect the object which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had in view: it must be accompanied with a considerable reduction of the duty upon spirits. At the same time, he did not think it would be expedient—at least in the first instance—to reduce the rate so low as that which was charged in Ireland and Scotland; the cases were very dissimilar, and we had not here the same difficulties to contend with, that existed in those parts of the United Kingdom. There the mischief arose from the extensive manufacture of illicit spirits in the remote districts of the country; here such a course would be much less practicable. Although, therefore, it was absolutely necessary in Ireland and Scotland to bring down the duty from 5s. 6d. to 2s., in order, by an effectual blow, to extinguish the tremendous evil which was producing such dreadful consequences, we were not obliged to go so far in respect to England. Upon this principle, then, he proposed that the duty upon British spirits, which was now 10s. 6d., should hereafter be 5s. per gallon, upon all spirits made exclusively from malt, and 6s. upon all made from mixture of malt and raw grain. He foresaw one objection to his proposition; it was, that, in consequence of the cheapening of spirits, an impulse would be given to the habit of drunkenness. He should not discuss that subject now; but were there more foundation for such a fear than he believed to exist, he must observe that we had but a choice of difficulties; that smuggling was an evil of immense magnitude, the cause of excessive and varied immorality, and the parent of innumerable crimes; and that some such measure as he had suggested was the only mode of effectually putting it down.—In addition to this change in the duty upon British spirits, he proposed also a reduction upon rum and other colonial spirits from their present rate of 10s. 6d. per gallon to 8s. It was but just to retain this difference of 2s. between British and colonial spirits, because the manufacturer of the latter was not liable to that increased charge upon his raw material, which affected barley and malt from the restrictive operation of the corn laws. An equality of duty, therefore, would act with great injustice both upon the grower of English barley and the maker of English spirits. The distiller from sugar, however, in the colonies, would, under the new system, have the advantage of bringing the raw spirit which he extracted from his sugar, into consumption here, either by selling it in its raw state or by having it converted into gin through the medium of the rectifier and compounder. He was not prepared at present to admit rum itself to be converted into gin. Hereafter it might be expedient to permit it: but as it would be dangerous to the revenue if too many transformations of this article were allowed at once, he was desirous of waiting till he could see how the new system would work, and how far its extension could be safely carried. Without troubling the committee with lengthened details, he thought he might state the annual loss to the revenue upon the heads to which he had just adverted, at 750,000l. It would greatly exceed that sum, unless he counted upon the success of the plan in the diminution of smuggling and the consequent displacement of illicit whiskey, brandy, and gin.—There was another article, small indeed in its amount, and local in its consumption, but which in his view was of great importance; he meant cider. When he stated that in those parts of the country where cider was manufactured, that the law was in a state of perpetual violation, that the gaols were filled with those whom the Excise had felt it to be their duty to prosecute, that a very large proportion of the prisoners were females, and that the consequences were seriously prejudicial to the morals of very many country villages in those districts, it would be granted this matter was more than of mere local importance. Reducing, then, the duty upon cider from 30s. to 10s., the revenue would lose about 20,000l. per annum; and six counties would be relieved from the enormous evils arising from smuggling. Hitherto he had confined himself to the subject of indirect taxation; and after the many petitions which had been presented to the house, and which had been strenuously supported by various gentlemen, upon the subject of the assessed taxes, he felt it necessary to state why he conceived that those petitioners ought not to complain if he had taken a course different from that which they desired. Surely he might say, without disregard of their wishes, that their interests were wrapped up in the interests of the community at large, and that a great grievance could not be removed from society, with conferring a positive, although perhaps an indirect, advantage upon each separate class. Amongst the various objections to the Assessed Taxes, none seemed more worthy of consideration than the petty annoyances which attended the collection of them; and he was anxious to remove, as far as possible, all those that might be said to press upon sore places. Some of these related to points in which evasion was easy, the correction of evasion embarrassing, and its punishment more vexatious than effectual. Such were the first objects of his attention. The first item was the tax on four wheel carriages, drawn by one poney. It produced but 867l. a year, and might as well be repealed altogether. The next was a tax very seldom paid; he meant that upon occasional waiters; he proposed to knock that off altogether, at a loss to the revenue of 1343l. Coach-makers' licences, amounting to 354l.; and the tax upon carriages sold by commission, which, as they also paid the auction duty, was a very unreasonable tax, and amounted only to 3391l. would be repealed: as would the duty on mules, employed in some of the mining districts of the country in carrying ore. There was also a tax upon horses which pressed with considerable severity upon the small farmer; he meant in cases where he was in the habit of occasionally letting out his team for various purposes of business: at many a slack period of the year this was a great advantage to him, but was now clogged with a tax because such horses were not considered as being strictly agricultural horses, and consequently not entitled to exemption from duty; this exemption he proposed to grant them, giving up thereby not more than 4000l. He saw no reason for retaining another small tax applicable to farmers, namely, that upon husbandry labourers who might occasionally have the charge of a horse; they were not, in fact, male servants in the taxable sense of the word, as they neither performed the ordinary duties of domestic servants, nor wore a livery; but they were liable to a duty which produced about 2000*l*. The next item was that of taxed carts, which brought in about 19,000*l*. The entire removal of this would be a great relief to many persons, and its exaction caused more surcharges and trouble than almost any tax of the same description. He now came to houses and windows. As the law stood, if a person quitted a house after the commencement of the year, he still remained charged for the whole year; and the alteration which he proposed to make (at a loss of 5000*l*.) was, that he should be chargeable hereafter for that part of the year only, during which he should have occupied the house. A sum of 4000*l*. per annum was also received upon houses occupied throughout the year by one person, solely for the purpose of taking care of the house; this he proposed to repeal; and he would deal in the same way with another item of 1000*l*. per annum, arising from farm houses, out of lease, but occupied by a labourer: such farm houses were already exempt, provided that part of the house occupied by the labourer was entirely separated from the rest of the building: but as this condition was very onerous and inconvenient, by compelling the landlord to incur the expense of making the partition when his farm was out of lease, and of pulling it down again the moment he got a tenant, he proposed to remove it. In dairy farms also, no more than one window was allowed to be exempt for the dairy and cheese room, which compelled the farmer to use the same place for both purposes: but by giving up 1000*l*. a-year, he could allow one window to be exempt in each such room.—The next point was one of more extensive importance: and he trusted that much satisfaction might be given respecting it. The number of houses now charged with the House Tax was 527,649; the tax was assessed according to the assumed rent-value of the house; and 1*s*. 6*d*. in the pound was the assessment upon all houses rated under 10*l*. This class of houses he proposed to exempt altogether from this impost; and by thus sacrificing about 90,000*l*. of annual revenue, no less than 171,705 houses would hereafter be entirely free from any charge upon this head. Windows constituted the next and the last item upon his list. He could not pretend to offer any thing there in the way of relief to the wealthy, or even to the middle classes of society; but he could give it effectually to those who were poorer, and upon whom the window tax pressed with by far the greatest severity. There were in all 973,867 persons assessed to it; and it was charged at an increasing rate, according to the number of windows. A large proportion of these contributors occupied houses having no more than seven windows; and if by sacrificing about 145,000*l*. those contributors were relieved from the window tax, 635,936 persons would be set free at once from the tax.

—The result of the whole was thus:—

Reduction upon Hemp. ....	£100,000
Ditto Coffee. ....	150,000
Ditto Wine. ....	230,000
Ditto British Spirit } and Rum. }	750,000
Ditto Cider. ....	20,000
Ditto Assessed Taxes. ....	276,000

Of this he calculated we might lose, during the present year, about 650,000*l*.; so that it was clear that the total surplus of this and the two ensuing years, which he had already stated at upwards of 4,000,000*l*. would be amply sufficient to meet the presumed reductions.—Thus then he proposed to give additional facilities to foreign commerce and internal consumption; thus he struck a blow at that giant the smuggler; thus he exempted from the weight of direct taxation those who were the least able to bear it: and with these propositions in his hand, he should not fear to go into any assembly of his countrymen at any time and in any place, and to claim, not be hoped with overweening confidence or arrogant presumption, but with an honest consciousness of having endeavoured to do the state some service—respectfully and firmly to claim their approbation and support (loud cheering).*

Mr. Maberly hoped that the committee would not, by admitting the propriety of many of the general principles upon which the rt. hon. gent. had founded his able statement, be considered as pledging themselves to his details, and particularly where his practice was at variance with the system which he advocated. He begged also not to be considered as admitting that the rt. hon. gent.'s disposal of the surplus revenue was the best which could be assigned for it. The increase of revenue he had always anticipated as the natural consequence of the introduction of the sound commercial principles which his Majesty's Government had lately acted upon; and which, by giving fairer play to the industry of the people, had produced as a necessary consequence, an augmentation of the national revenue. He should reserve his further observations until the resolutions were printed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer requested *hon. gent.*s to bear in mind, that the resolutions could not be printed until after the report was brought up. All he proposed to urge in the committee that night, were the resolutions relating to wine, coffee, hemp, and such part of the assessed taxes as he had referred to: this arrangement would facilitate the progress of the necessary bills respecting these articles.

Mr. Bright complained in strong terms of the comparative inattention afforded to the West India interests, and the necessity of some further time for consideration, before the committee decided upon the rt. hon. gent.'s statement. Parliament had seriously interfered with the value of West India property and interests, without giving the owners any thing like a fair equivalent. By the proposed reduction of bounties upon sugar, the great refining trade would be lost; and by the reduction of the duty upon home made spirits, the consumption of rum would be lessened in the British market. It was last year affected considerably by the introduction of Irish and Scotch whiskey, and some hopes were held out, that in the present year the West India interests would be better considered; and yet what was now proposed?—merely to reduce the rum-duty 2*s*. a gallon, while, at the same time, the reduction in home spirits was to be 5*s*. a gallon. When they wanted to repress the smuggling trade, why not begin upon tea and tobacco, notoriously the two great articles of contraband consumption? If they reduced the tax upon tobacco one half, the revenue would not suffer, and smuggling would be diminished by two-thirds of its present extent. It was said, that in the coffee reduction there was a concession of 150,000*l.* to the colonial interests. He admitted the importance of this reduction to the negro population, but denied its being a proper equivalent for the injuries which had been generally inflicted on the West India trade.

Mr. Hobhouse merely rose to touch upon one or two points. In the first place, he thought it would have been better to have equalized the wine duties, instead of fixing them in the proportion proposed; and in the second, he was quite sure the country would not be satisfied with the inadequate reduction of the assessed taxes. The effect of that upon windows now proposed would be to induce people to deform their small houses to bring the number of windows within the rt. hon. gent.'s plan; and by restricting the circulation of air, to impair the health of their families.

Mr. Hart Davis complained strongly that the tobacco duties were not reduced; they now amounted to 1,200 per cent. upon the original value of the article. He had expected a reduction of one half at least of these duties. Notwithstanding the very great export from America, and extensive consumption in Ireland, the revenue in this article was not improved, which could only be attributed to the increase of smuggling.

Mr. Alderman Thompson was surprised that the tobacco and brandy duties were not further reduced, for the better prevention of smuggling. He was satisfied with the reduction of duties on hemp and iron: though he did not anticipate so great a reduction in the duty of the latter, yet he, who was largely interested in that trade, was not afraid of foreign competition (hear, hear). He was a ready advocate of liberal commercial principles (hear, hear).

Mr. Hume concurred in the opinion that they would never make an impression upon the smuggling traffic, and reduce the expense of the preventive service, until they diminished the tobacco and brandy duties. As to the general commercial principles upon which the rt. hon. gent. had acted, he gave him the fullest credit for their utility and liberality, and only wished them to be carried further. He must also say, that the promise or expectation held out to the West India interests had not been fairly redeemed. It was a breach of faith to the colonies not to put them upon a comparative footing with the general home trade.

Mr. Huskisson was glad to hear his hon. friend (Mr. Alderman Thompson) say, in allusion to the iron trade, that he had no fear of the foreign competitor. The duties on iron were certainly not necessary for the British miner, and they tended to keep up a great fluctuation in the market-price. With respect to the West India interests, it was impossible to retain the sugar bounties, which had no other operation than to enable the foreign consumer to purchase it at a cheaper rate, without benefitting the colonies. The reduction on the coffee duties would, he had no doubt, be found very beneficial. He remembered that when he had been the means of reducing the coffee duty from 2*s.* 4*d.* a pound to 4*d.* only, the larger consumption immediately augmented the previous amount of revenue (hear, hear). This was not only an advantage to the country, but also to the West India interests, who must, besides, sensibly feel the reduction in rum from 10*s.* 6*d.* to 8*s.* the gallon. In answer to the observation with respect to the duties on tobacco, however he might be disposed to coincide, he must remind hon. members of the caution given his rt. hon. friend—not to ride a willing horse to death. Did the committee consider what would be the effect of reducing, as had been proposed, the duties on coals, half the duty on malt, and two-thirds of the duty on tobacco—the last of which amounted to three millions of itself? Must not the country feel deep alarm at a sudden reduction of the revenue to that amount? He concurred in the propriety of reducing the tobacco duties, so that the revenue might be benefited by the increased consumption to the amount which would be lost by lessening the duties. But hon. gents. should remember, that the country only possessed a given power of consumption; and nothing could be so visionary as to suppose that Government might with safety at once, remit all the duties upon every article which had a tendency to encourage smuggling or to check consumption.

Mr. Ellis applauded the candor and good spirit of the rt. hon. gent. in carrying forward his improvements. He could not but find some fault, however, with the neglect of the West India interests in the reduction of the 2*s.* on rum at the time of reducing 5*s.* on British spirits. He disapproved of the restrictive system; he would let in the sugars of the Mauritius as freely as those of Jamaica. The monopoly could never save the British colonist from a competition in the general continental market, so long as the British West India islands produced an ounce beyond our own consumption; and that competition must determine the price of his commodity. He would open the British market to the sugars of all nations. He asserted it without dread of contradiction, that the British refiner could not succeed like the refiners of Hamburg and other places, because they could not, like the latter, mingle the rich Havannah sugars with the poorer articles from our own colonies. He recommended a more vigorous reform in the Government charges and burthen on ships, and articles of ship-building, trading to our ports, both here and in the colonies.

Mr. Whitmore wished to see the duty on East-India sugar placed on an equality with other sugar. He was sure we must look to the East Indies for a great extension of our commerce, and that it was impossible this measure, which was one of justice, could long be delayed. He wished, before the duty on wines had been so much reduced, that it had been equalized on all wines. There was a system of monopoly existing in Portugal, which would completely deceive the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was a more absurd monopoly of Port wine than any other monopoly he knew of. This was equally injurious to England and Portugal, and he hoped some endeavours would be made to get rid of it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to give a reason why he did not conceive rum entitled to an equal reduction with British spirits. The price of grain, from the natural operation of the corn laws, put the distiller under a necessity of paying a price for his malt beyond that which he would have to pay if there were no such restrictions. In rum, the first material was not subject to that specific charge. The prime cost of the malt spirit was so much more than rum, that the latter article could more easily bear 8s. per gallon than the former could 5s. He professed himself, however, to be in no wise wedded to his own opinion, nor did he offer these propositions as if they could admit of no qualification. On the contrary, he courted the animadversions of hon. members on the introduction of the resolutions which it would be his duty to submit to the house.

The house then agreed to several resolutions in conformity with the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Assessed Taxes.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.—On the presentation of a petition from Southwark, praying for the repeal of the taxes on houses and windows,

Mr. Brougham said, that he thought it would be much better at once to remove the Assessed Taxes than to take away those which pressed indirectly upon the public; but this was objected to, because it would have the effect of diminishing the patronage of Government. It was time that the people should be relieved from the visits of the tax-gatherer—a sort of personage whose presence was always productive of vexation and annoyance. Of what use was it to take off a portion of the tax on any article when the reduction was met by a nearly correspondent rise on the part of the vendor? On the morning following the night on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had announced his intention of taking off 20l. per hogshead from the duties on French claret, he happened to be at Guildhall, and before twelve o'clock on that day he heard that the honest class of his Majesty's subjects who were employed in selling wine to the rest of his Majesty's subjects, had raised the price of the same wine 10l. per hogshead. He hoped that the Legislature would be induced, therefore, to pause before they carried into effect the reduction which had been proposed, and which was beneficial only to wine-sellers; and substitute, instead of it, some relief which would be universally felt.

Mr. Maberly rose to bring forward a motion for the repeal of the Assessed Taxes. To judge by the state of the house, (which was remarkably thin at that moment), a stranger, he said, would almost imagine that some subject of very slight interest was to be discussed; of this, however, he was certain, that any person who would go from house to house throughout the country, would find nine voices out of every ten in favour of the proposal which he was bringing forward. Concurring with the principles laid down by the hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subjects of foreign policy and free trade, still he was far from satisfied with the relief which the present plan of that rt. hon. gent. afforded. With respect, for example, to the article of hemp: there was a reduction on that commodity, but not a sufficient one. By bringing the raw article to England at a low price, our own artisans would derive a profit from the manufacture of it; but the duty, which had been 30, still remained at 15 per cent. Again, for the reduction upon coffee—the article was ill-selected. There were a hundred petitions upon the table to repeal the duty on twenty other commodities, and not one to repeal the duty on coffee. The next item was wine—here was a reduction, but not of the kind which the country wanted. An attempt had been made to call wine an article of necessity. Something or other had been hinted about “the sick.” He left that argument to those who thought they could make any thing of it; he considered wine to be merely an article of luxury, and an article the repeal of duty on which would not benefit the labouring classes a farthing. While necessities were out of men's reach, it was not a time to repeal a tax upon superfluities. The rt. hon. gent. talked of the benefits of foreign trade; an increased consumption at home causing fresh demands abroad for our own produce; but did he really think—for the question of increased consumption came to that—that, because he had reduced the duty on wine one half, every family in England, where they had drunk one bottle, would now drink two? British spirits formed another item among the reductions; and then there came the plea of smuggling. But the present measure, at best, was but doing things by halves; for the reduction was not sufficient to prevent smuggling; if any thing could be done, it must be by an equalization of duties throughout the United Kingdom. But his main objection to the measure was, there were commodities out of number, a reduction of the duties upon which would have gone as far to diminish smuggling as this reduction upon spirits; and yet the rt. hon. gent. elected to cheapen that particular article the use of which tended pre-eminently to demoralize and destroy our population. If this were getting rid of smuggling, which he denied, it was certainly meeting one evil by the introduction of another. In the repeal of the duty on cider, he concurred; in many counties that would be a convenience to the lower classes. Upon iron, as upon hemp, he did not think that the reduction had gone far enough; and he repeated that a reduction on tea, tobacco, soap, candles, silk, and a great variety of other articles, would have been more useful than the reductions which had been granted upon wine and British spirits. But he now came to the assessed taxes, which formed the main object of his motion; and he had no hesitation in saying that, with what had been done upon the subject, the country was entirely dissatisfied. The main desire was to get rid of the house and window taxes: for the rest of the duties, he was chiefly anxious about them, inasmuch as an entire repeal, by getting rid of the commission-ship, would save the country just 300,000l. a-year. On the propriety of repealing direct taxes in preference to indirect ones, there could not be a question; the rt. hon. gent. in his speech on the budget two years since, had admitted it. By getting rid of the assessed taxes, we got rid of all the machinery connected with them—of all that system of visitation and vexation which people thought more of than of the money which they paid, and, for the means of doing it, the rt. hon. gent.—apart from all surplus—had a fund instantly at command for it, the sinking-fund. He was scarcely less anxious to get rid of the sinking-fund than for the repeal of the assessed taxes, so completely did he regard it as a delusion. With all our sinking-fund, 5,000,000l. a-year, the national debt was greater now than it had been in the year 1815. With the assistance of that most incomprehensible measure, the half-pay consolidation scheme, we had increased our debt, since 1816, by 12,000,000l. The late Mr. Ricardo had said truly that he would trust no government with a sinking-fund—that it would always be seized by the minister whenever he wanted it; in fact, it had been so; it had been seized by the rt. hon. gent. He did not mean to deny that the charge upon our debt had been diminished. Though its nominal amount was greater, the reduction of the four and five per cents had lessened the cost to the country. But how had this saving been effected—by the operation of the sinking-fund?—Not a jot. It was the consequence of that general prosperity in the country which had resulted from a decreased taxation. He took the same view with the rt. hon. gent. with regard to the principle of trade; but he thought a repeal of the assessed taxes would give greater satisfaction at present than any other measure. With regard to the house and window tax, he could hear of but one expression among all ranks—that they ought at once to be got rid of. The hon. member, after observing that his estimates were formed upon the produce of the various duties for the last year, stated that the total amount to which the repeal he proposed would go, was about 3,970,000l. He sat down by saying—"That the house and window taxes—the tax on servants and carriages—the tax on horses, dogs, hair-powder, game, and horse-dealers' licences, and armorial bearings—should be repealed."

Mr. Laycester seconded the resolution. Let these taxes be taken off, and the revenue would lose nothing, for the country would be richer, and the consumption on all hands would be greater. Gentlemen would keep more horses, more servants, and contribute to the support of the state full as effectually as they did at present. Under the existing system, the land was overshadowed with tax-gatherers, a venal phalanx, always ready to rise at the beck of any minister who thought proper to command them. The whole process attendant upon surcharge was vexatious and unsatisfactory in the highest degree; and the trouble of appeal was such as to render that remedy entirely unavailable.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he would make a few observations in support of the course which he lately thought it necessary to adopt. First, then, the hon. member complained of the 15 per cent. duty remaining on hemp; but he could assure him, that those interested in the article felt the reduction given, a very considerable boon. It would be remembered, too, that though this remaining duty at the present low price of hemp, amounted to 15 per cent. it would fall to a lower rate, if, as was very probable, the commodity itself should rise in value. The next item complained of was the reduction upon coffee: in which, it was said, the charge was unimportant. He could only reply, that it was an article in very general use, and one which would be more generally in use if the duty upon it were lighter. For some years past, its consumption had been decreasing, which was a certain sign that the duty was higher than it could bear; and upon the propriety of encouraging in our West India possessions, the growth of all produce which could be raised with little slave labour, he apprehended that, on neither side of the house there could be any doubt. With respect to the article of wine, he still contended that that was not a mere article of luxury; and even if it were, he saw no reason why it should not be placed within the reach of the middle classes of society. The hon. member complained of the reduction of the duty on British spirits. But he forgot that it was impossible, after reducing the duties (to prevent smuggling) in Ireland and Scotland, that the tax could be left at 2s. a gallon in Scotland, and 10s. 6d. in England; and, for the complaint that this measure did not complete the purpose—that, as there was still a duty, smuggling might still exist—that argument was perfectly true; but every thing could not be done at once. The hon. member had rather that the duties had been taken off tea, or off tobacco, than off spirits; but even that project would not be found entirely free from objection. The reduction of duty on spirits had cost the revenue 750,000l. Now, the duty on tobacco afforded 3,000,000l.; and to have reduced it less than 50 per cent. would have been of no use to the consumer. Then say that, allowing for increased consumption, the loss of duty instead of 50 per cent. would have come to 25, still the cost of that reduction would be 750,000l.; which, added to the reduction given on spirits, the whole disposable sum of 1,500,000l. was at an end. Again, for the article of tea—certainly the duty was heavy enough on that commodity—it was one hundred per cent. and it produced 3,000,000l. But if the duty on tea were reduced, it must be reduced to a great extent—perhaps not less than three-fourths. Here then would be a loss, at first sight, of 2,250,000l.; but suppose the eventual loss only to reach 1,000,000l., where were the funds from which these enormous deficiencies could be made up? Now the house would remember that, with reference to the assessed taxes, something had been done already. Within the last four years assessed taxes had been repealed to the amount of three millions and a half—that was, one half of them had been taken off. Out of ten millions in taxes reduced, three millions and a half had been reduced in assessed taxes: this was at least such a reasonable proportion as showed no inclination to neglect the subject. But the hon. member's plan was—"Get rid of the sinking fund, and you may repeal all the assessed taxes that remain." The hon. member was mistaken; either he was wrong in one of his statements, or even the giving up of the sinking fund would not enable Government to meet his views. For, according to the hon. member's account of the sinking fund itself, it was not a fund of 5,000,000l., but one only of 3,000,000l. Now, if the hon. member was right here, even the application of the sinking fund would not be sufficient for his purposes. It would be ridiculous to leave the finances of the country in that state, so that it would become a matter of doubt, whether there should be a million of surplus, or a million of deficit. The late Mr. Ricardo, and other members, had admitted the expediency of retaining a surplus; but the motion of the hon. member would destroy all surplus. As to the observation of the hon. member, that his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) propositions respecting the reduction of duties had created universal disappointment in the country, he would only observe, that any such feeling had not been expressed to him, nor did he believe that it existed in the country. He rather thought, that if the opinions of the public could be known on this point, it would be found that the course which he had pointed out was considered as most consistent with a fair, just, and enlightened regard to the interests of the country (hear, hear).

Mr. Calcraft fully approved of the proposed reduction of the wine duty, and he had no doubt the right hon. gent.'s health would be drunk on that occasion, at many a convivial board. But he thought the reduction would not be effectual if he did not go a step farther. By the treaty with Portugal, in 1810, it was agreed that every encouragement should be given to English companies dealing in the wines of that country, but the fact was, that since then a Portuguese company was established, which, by its dictum, decreed that so many thousand pipes of wine and no more, should be annually imported into England, so that they effected a complete monopoly. It was something similar with respect to the importation of claret. That trade was in very few hands, and the price was regulated by the quantity which they pleased to import. He trusted that his Majesty's ministers would interfere in some effectual way to prevent this monopoly, otherwise their proposed reductions would not be found of much advantage to the country. He stated in conclusion, that he would give his support to the two first propositions of his hon. friend for the repeal of the house and window tax.

Mr. Alderman Wood contended that the partial repeal of taxes, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed would not give any effectual relief, and he was sure that it was not so considered by the great body of the people. He had had petitions, very numerous signed, to present, praying for the repeal of the whole of the assessed taxes.

Mr. Huskisson said, that the Opposition had always contended that direct taxation was less mischievous than indirect taxation. Now, the income tax upon principle, would have been unquestionably, he (Mr. Huskisson) agreed with those hon. gents., the least objectionable of any direct taxes, had it not been for the inquisitorial mode of collection that was unfortunately connected with it. The window-tax, being freed from that objection, was now the least objectionable, as he thought, of all direct taxes.—When his rt. hon. friend first proposed to reduce the tax on wine, he proposed that a proportionable allowance should be made to the wine merchant on their stocks in hand.—Now he (Mr. Huskisson) had heard with considerable indignation (hear, hear), that they had somehow or other managed, within these few days, to double their stocks, and to raise the price in a ratio about equal to the amount of the reduction of duty (hear, hear). If the fact were really so, it might be very proper for the house to consider whether the intended reduction of the duty on their stocks in hand should go into the tills and pockets of those conscientious gentlemen, or into the coffers of the Exchequer (hear, hear). When they should have got rid of their stocks on hand, it might be proper to consider whether the suggested relief should or should not be afforded them in any shape. The difference to the revenue on the remission of the duty in question, would have been somewhere about 300,000*l*. To revert the question before the house, and supposing for a moment the whole of the assessed taxes were reduced, their amount would be expended by those who formerly paid them, in the increased consumption of various articles, which gentlemen would then, doubtless, indulge in. Then, whenever a war might happen, (distant as he hoped the day would be,) it would surely be a serious inconvenience to have the whole of the 7,000,000*l*. which those taxes yielded, at once re-imposed: for it should be observed that they had been imposed, not at once, but gradually, and by small degrees. To those reasons, too, he must add the authority of our ancestors; seeing that the window-tax was one of the most ancient taxes ever imposed in this country. At the present moment, notwithstanding the immense increase of the population in the intervening period, its produce did not much exceed the amount it yielded before the commencement of the last war; and therefore it could not be presumed to be quite so burdensome as it had been represented to be.

Mr. T. Wilson could not repress his astonishment at the language which had been held by the rt. hon. gent. From that rt. hon. gent., the avowed friend of free trade, and the advocate of that cause against all monopolies, he had never expected to hear such manifest contradiction and inconsistency, as he had this night been guilty of, in his remarks on the recent rise in the price of wines. The fact was, that it was the severe weight of the tax which pressed on that article, that had kept people back, upon small stocks, from purchasing: but on the first prospect of a reduction of the duties, they very naturally came forward, in order to replenish their cellars. The consequence was, that for the moment the demand exceeded the supply, and hence the price was excessive (hear, hear). Were the wine-merchants to be spoken of as if this effect had been caused by them? Or could they make the rt. hon. gent. himself, for example, buy, if he did not like to do so (hear, hear)? Of all other persons in the world, he should least have expected these remarks from the right hon. gent. With regard to the question before the house, he expressed his satisfaction with what had been done, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Huskisson said, that the treaty by which the duty on Portuguese wine was regulated was not that of 1810; but the Methuen treaty, which stipulated that the wines of Portugal should be admitted into this country on the payment of one-third of whatever duty should be payable on the wines of France. In return for this arrangement, Portugal consented to receive, which she had not done before, the productions of our woollen trade. This treaty with our ancient ally bore date in the year 1703. By it it was agreed also, that either party to the contract, at the expiration of every period of fifteen years might give notice of a revision to the other. The treaty of 1810 had been executed with a view of this kind; and at the end of 1825, therefore, it would be competent for either party to propose the introduction of such changes as its own interests, consistently with the spirit of the Methuen treaty, might seem to require. Hon. gents. had with justice complained of the manner in which the wine trade was carried on in Portugal by a chartered company, created by the crown of Portugal; not, however, recently, but at least 60 years ago. Its establishment, 60 years since, arose out of the mal-administration of the wine trade by the English factory, at that time settled at Lisbon. At the close of the present year, however, he should be very glad to receive any suggestions with a view to the improvement of our wine trade with Portugal.—As to what had been called his monstrous proposition about the wine merchants, he thought he had been misunderstood. When Lord Bexley was Chancellor of the Exchequer, a reduction of the duty on malt was proposed by the ministers; and it was intimated that a remission of duty would be allowed on the stock in hand; whereupon a great brewer (Mr. Calvert) in that house said that the public would not benefit by the reduction of duty, for that brewers would put the difference into their own pockets. He (Mr. Huskisson) then called on the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to allow any such remission in the teeth of such a declaration; when the brewers thought fit to retract, and the public had the benefit of the reduced duty (hear, hear). What, therefore, he had done by malt, he would certainly do by wine (a laugh).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that there was an article in the treaty of 1810, which went, in its terms, to preclude Portugal from creating or sanctioning any monopoly that should be prejudicial to the interests of the British trade. At that time, the Oporto wine company did not exert its privileges in any such manner, or to such an extent, as to interfere with the British trade. In course of time, however, it undoubtedly did so; and that fact became the subject of complaint on the part of the British Government, to the Government of Portugal. The Government of Portugal, thinking, probably, that they derived some advantage from such a company, always denied the construction which England put upon the treaty; and long and unsatisfactory discussions were engaged in by both parties on that question. In 1820, a new minister was sent by Portugal to this country, charged to negotiate a revision of the terms of this contract. To say the truth, he seemed to know very little about his business (a laugh), and was soon after recalled. At the end of the present year, although nothing definitive had yet been settled, England and Portugal would certainly be in a condition to enter on the proposed revision.

Mr. Majoribanks thought that the gentlemen engaged in the wine trade would act, not only unjustly, but inconsistently with their own interests, if they did not reduce the prices of all their wines after a ratio at least equal to the reduction of duties upon them.

Mr. C. Calvert said, that when the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson) had alluded to an expression of his on the subject of the malt duty, he had not been correct in his statement. His statement really was, that the brewers could not take off one halfpenny per pot on the beer, as that would amount to a reduction of 2s. in the same quantity in which the Government had only effected a reduction of eight shillings. He wished this to be distinctly understood, as he thought the cry for reduction, against the brewers and wine merchants, was urged without reference to any of the circumstances of the case. He could tell the rt. hon. gent. that the brewers did not care for him at all (laughter); and they would only be governed in the selling price of their article by the price of the raw material of which it was composed, and the cost of production.

The house then divided.—For the motion, 64; Against it, 111; Majority, 47.

Window Tax.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.—Mr. Hobhouse said, that notwithstanding the general approbation of the plans of Government, an universal dissatisfaction prevailed that more had not been done in the removal of direct taxation. Of this description of taxes none were more unpopular than the tax of which he was about to move for the repeal. In Ireland, where it had been removed by a less yielding Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was called the fever tax; and in England he was prepared to show that its moral and physical effects were most burdensome and disastrous. He was not exaggerating when he said that a gentleman received from the tax-gatherer the paper of assessment with the same dread that a Pacha received the firman of the Sultan. One of the greatest objections to these taxes was, that it made the Government hateful to the people, by bringing them in perpetual contact with the collectors. They also were the cause of much subterfuge and fraud. The rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson) in a letter to his constituents, stated amongst his reasons for not voting for the repeal of the window tax, that the tax was not inquisitorial. He (Mr. Hobhouse) thought it was peculiarly so. The inspector was authorized to enter houses twice a year, which created a constant dread in the minds of the inhabitants. The repeal of the duty on wine and spirits would not afford so much relief to the people as the repeal of the window tax. No benefit had resulted to the poorer classes from the repeal of the window duties on houses having not more than seven windows, because the tax was paid, not by the tenants, but by the landlords; so that when the tax was repealed, it only went into the landlords' pocket, for the rent remained the same. Another of the arguments of the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson) in favour of the window tax was, that it had the merit of antiquity. This argument was not well grounded. The window tax was a substitute for the hearth tax, which was one of the evils complained of at the revolution, and was enacted in the 13th and 14th of Charles II. In 1784 Mr. Pitt raised the window tax, and the people were then told that if they did not consent to that, they must have a higher tax on tea. In 1797 the watch and clock makers were calling for relief, and were told that they could not obtain it unless the window tax were augmented. So odious was this tax to the people of England, that ministers never attempted to augment it, except on some pretence of this kind. The window tax operated unfairly to some trades which required more light than others. The effect of this tax was to prevent even rich men from having a sufficient number of windows. At least he could find no other reason for the absence of windows in some of our most leading streets. In Piccadilly there was a house belonging to a very rich individual in which scarcely one window was to be seen. When he had on former occasions moved for the repeal of this tax, he had always been told by gents. on the other side, that they had voted for the estimates for the year, and could not therefore support a motion which would prevent those estimates from being carried into effect. On the present occasion, therefore, he would confine his motion to calling upon the house to pledge themselves to repeal the tax in the next year. The people of England had a right to be relieved, in the tenth year of peace, from this intolerable burden. He concluded by moving, "That it is the opinion of this house that the numerous petitions of the people for the repeal of the window tax are highly deserving the attention of this house; and that, therefore, from and after the 5th of April, 1826, the said tax ought to be immediately and totally repealed" (hear, hear).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the hon. mover had laid much stress on the petitions which had been presented to the house. Now, in point of fact, they were doing justice to the people by not listening to complaints which it was impossible to remedy. The reduction of the tax upon houses not having more than seven windows would relieve 2,000 persons in Westminster. The hon. member said that the tax on this description of houses was not paid by the tenant, but by the landlord. But Government could not help that; it had done all in its power to relieve the tenant, and could not be answerable for the exactions of landlords. He could not concur with the hon. member in lamenting the paucity of windows in the buildings of London; on the contrary, he thought that if the houses of London were chargeable with any deformity, it was that of having too many windows. In conclusion, he contended, that the parliament would best promote the interests of the country by pursuing the course of a reduction of indirect taxation. For these reasons he should oppose the motion.

Mr. Maberly stated, that ministers set their own individual opinions in opposition to the sentiments of the whole country.

Sir F. Burdett said there was no tax which was attended with more ill consequences, or more unequal in its pressure. In its collection no regard was paid to the means of those on whom it was imposed. He would prefer having the window-tax incorporated with the house-tax, by which one set of collectors would be got rid of. Under the present system the privacy of people's houses was continually invaded.

The house then divided—For the motion 77—Against it 114—Majority 37.

Spirit Duties.

FRIDAY, APRIL 22.—The house having resolved itself into a committee on the Spirit Duties bill,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had already explained to the house the grounds upon which he thought it expedient to assimilate the distillery laws of England with those of Scotland and Ireland. He would state generally the sort of regulations which he proposed to adopt for this branch of the trade and manufacture of the country. In the first place, it was necessary to impose certain restrictions on the persons carrying on this trade: he should be glad if this had not been necessary, but the large amount of the duties rendered it impossible to waive them. In Ireland and in Scotland, no person was allowed to carry on the trade of a distiller without the certificate of a justice of the peace. This regulation, which the peculiar circumstances of Scotland and Ireland rendered necessary, he did not propose to adopt in England. The qualification which he should suggest instead was, that persons carrying on the trade of distillers, should inhabit and pay the rates of houses of the rent of 20l. per annum. This would facilitate the collection of the duty, while, if persons who could distill in a tin kettle were permitted to do so, the excise would be cheated at every turn. The next regulation was, that all persons licensed to carry on the trade of distillers, should be resident within a quarter of a mile of a town in which there should be 500 inhabited houses, in order to secure a sufficient number of excise officers for the preservation of this branch of the revenue. With respect to the size of the stills, it had been found necessary in Ireland and in Scotland, where smuggling was extensively carried on, to use stills of very small dimensions. In England there was not the same necessity, and it was therefore his intention to reduce the size of stills from 3,000 gallons the present rate, to 400, the dimensions of which they had been formerly. He would now state to the committee the alterations which he intended to propose respecting the duties. The existing duty was 10s. 6d. per gallon at 7 per cent. above proof. It would, he thought, be a great improvement to adopt the rule observed in Ireland and Scotland—namely, to fix the duty according to the proof strength of the spirit, and that duty he proposed should be 5s. 10d. per gallon. He would shortly explain why he had fixed on that particular sum, which might otherwise appear somewhat singular. The first idea was to fix a duty of 6s. upon spirit distilled from malt, and 6s. on that distilled from grain; but, on looking into the details of the subject, he found that it would be difficult to make a distinction between the two kinds of spirit. He was therefore determined to make the duty uniform, without reference to its being distilled from malt or grain. It would be in the recollection of the house, that a bill had passed last session for regulating weights and measures, which was to take effect next year. According to that bill, the standard by which measures were to be hereafter regulated was the imperial gallon, which differed from the ordinary wine measure on which the duty on spirits was at present taken. The imperial gallon might be represented by six, whilst the common wine gallon might be represented by five. If he had fixed the duty on the common wine gallon at 6s., the relation which it would have borne to the imperial gallon, would have been inconvenient, as it would have left an indescribable fraction of a farthing unaccounted for. The duty of 5s. 10d. on the common wine measure, however, corresponded exactly with the duty of 7s. on the imperial gallon; and thus any intricate calculation would be avoided in the settlement of questions which might arise between the excise-officer and the dealer. He concluded by moving several resolutions to the effect of what he had stated.

Mr. W. Smith disapproved of the proposed reduction of the duty on spirits, on the ground that it would tend to deteriorate the health and morals of the people. It was proved by the evidence given before the police committee in 1817, that there was scarcely one instance of desperate murder or burglary which occurred in the metropolis, that was not attributable to the influence of ardent spirits. Was it possible then, that a measure could be considered beneficial, the object of which was to reduce the price of spirits nearly one-half, and consequently to bring them more within the reach of the poorer classes. It was said that the reduction of the price of spirits would not increase their consumption. He was at a loss to reconcile that assertion with the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a former evening, when he proposed a reduction of the wine duties. The rt. hon. gent. then said, that a reduction of duty would cause an increased consumption. That he believed would be the effect of the reduction of the spirit duties; for he could not believe that the poor would be better able to resist temptation than the rich. Scotland was often referred to as affording a proof that the cheapness of spirits did not lead to drunkenness amongst the poorer classes. He admitted that the Scotch were sober people, but much of their sobriety was attributable to their poverty. There was an old story of Dr. Johnson and Solan geese. The Doctor was told by some person that Solan geese might be bought for two-pence a-piece in Scotland.—“Aye,” observed the Doctor, “but where are they to get the two-pence?” Whatever might be the result of the rt. hon. gent.’s propositions, he (Mr. S.) should rest satisfied with having delivered his soul on the subject.

Mr. Hume could not agree with the hon. member (Mr. W. Smith) in the view which he took of the consequences which would result from a reduction of the duty on spirits. The excessive use of spirits was generally the result rather than the cause of poverty and distress. In France and Holland, where spirits were very cheap, drunkenness was almost unknown. The same might be said of the United States of America.—The resolutions were agreed to.

Beer Duties.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.—Mr. Maberly rose to submit a proposition for the repeal of the duties on beer. If ever there were a statute passed that was partial in its operation—that was contrary to justice—it was that which imposed the existing duties on beer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the rt. hon. President of the Board of Trade, declared that they wished to adopt a system of liberal policy in every respect; and after the liberal opinions he had heard them express on different occasions in that house, he had a right, he thought, to feel sure that he should have their votes this night. There was but one difficulty which stood in the way of his motion—there was but one argument which those gentls. could advance against it—namely, the loss which the revenue would sustain. The principle they must give up, unless they turned round on the arguments they had used themselves.—At present, there was a tax on malt of 20*s.* per quarter: but the house would recollect that the effects of that tax were very different on those who brewed their own beer, from the effect of the beer duties on those who purchased that beverage from the brewer. The rich man could brew his own beer; but the poor man, who had neither premises, capital, skill, nor time, could not. The beer duty was, in fact, a tax on the poor, from which the wealthy was exempted. The rich man paid 20*s.* per quarter for his malt. That was the only tax levied on him. But the poor man had to meet a double duty—20*s.* malt duty, and 3*s.* beer duty; making a total of 5*s.* To the rich man beer was a mere luxury; to the poor it was one of the indispensable necessities of life. The poor man required something more than the bread and cheese by which he supported his existence. He required some liquor, and none was better for the purposes of nourishment and refreshment than beer. The effect of spirits upon the lower classes of the community was known to be most injurious and demoralizing. Upon this statement then, he asked whether the house would any longer continue a tax so partial in its operation, and which weighed so heavily upon the poorer classes? It had been said that the poor man might brew his own beer, and thus exempt himself from this tax; he could do no such thing. To brew required time, which he could not give; it required money, which he did not possess; and conveniences, which he could not command. It was probably the inhabitant of a garret, and his daily earnings only enabled him to provide for his daily necessities. Where, then, and how was he to brew? He had in reality no option, no means of avoiding the payment of this unjust and burdensome duty.—There was, however, a means by which the weight might be removed; and this was, by placing the duty on malt instead of on beer. The expense of collecting the duty on malt was now 300,000*l.* per annum. If the alteration he recommended should be adopted, this sum would be saved to the country; because, although the duty on one was 20*s.* and the other 3*s.* the expense of collecting would be the same.—But if the principle of the tax were right, why was it not followed up in other instances? Why were not tea, candies, soap, leather, glass, wine, and tobacco, all taxed in the same manner? Would the rt. hon. gent. dare to put in a schedule to any bill, such items as that the poor man should pay 6*d.* a gallon duty on his beer, while the rich man paid only 2*d.*? And yet this was the actual operation of the present law. It had been urged by way of excuse for this tax, that it prevented the mixing of noxious ingredients in beer; but if this were really the reason, why was it not applied to wine and tea,—or why were not the consumers left to the exercise of their own judgment and taste in that as in other things? The system as it existed encouraged a monopoly, if not to the brewer, at least to the retailer, by means of the licences. All the reasonable good that could be expected to result to the police of the country, would be from having public-houses placed under a proper surveillance, and this might be effected by allowing officers to visit the houses in which beer was retailed, to prevent their being made the resort of improper persons. If this were admitted, the house could not refuse to come to the decision that the sale of beer ought to be as free as that of any other commodity. But it would be said, perhaps, that to take off this tax might interfere with what the rt. hon. gent. called a sinking fund, but what he (Mr. M.) denied to be any such thing; because that only could be called a sinking fund which was an actual surplus in the revenue. He contended that the debt was now 12 millions more than it had been in 1816, and that this was occasioned by the “deadweight act.” If he had not already pointed out the injustice of the tax on beer, he would refer to the reduction which had been made in the duty on spirits, and which, as they were less necessary, ought to have been postponed in the course of relief to beer. He knew the rt. hon. gent. would say that his object in this had been to put a stop to smuggling; but in this he had not succeeded, because the motive still remained strong enough to induce the practice. Looking at the subject then

In this point of view alone, the people had a right to ask for a reduction. It would not, perhaps, be readily believed, but the fact was so, that the rt. hon. gent. and his colleagues, in their chambers in the Treasury, fixed the price of table beer. They might with as good reason fix the price of bread, as interfere with any other article not less necessary, nor of less common consumption. He hoped, if he were defeated, that he might at least convince the house of the injustice of this burdensome tax, and that some other more fortunate person would propose a measure which, if it did not do away with it altogether, would divide its weight equally between the rich and the poor. He then moved, "that from and after the 5th day of January, 1826, all the duties on beer should cease" (hear, hear).

Mr. Brougham, after repeating some of Mr. Maberly's objections, said that the beer tax was so barbarous that it could not be equalled by any in the world, excepting the Spanish al cavala. It was wholly impracticable for a person desirous to trade in beer by retail to do so unless he made friends with the brewers, who had influence with those worthy persons the magistrates, by whom, in various parts of the country, the regulations were formed relative to licences. He knew he spoke this in the hearing of many worthy friends of his who belonged to that class by whom beer was prepared for the use of His Majesty's subjects, and he knew that they had certain prejudices on this subject; but if the duty were taken off, he believed those prejudices would be in a great measure removed, and that they would consent to the freeing of the retail trade in beer from the present restrictions. To the persons interested in malting, this would be a decided advantage, because it would encourage the growth of grain upon middling land, which was at present used for grazing, and would thus materially benefit the open and barley countries. Another advantage attendant upon throwing the trade open, would be found in providing the poor man with a cheap and wholesome beverage, which he might procure without the inconvenience of sending his daughters or other females of his family to the public-house, to encounter all the inconveniences which at present could not be avoided. Gin would be in a great measure dispensed with; and the more the beer shops could brought into competition with the gin shops the better. He thought too that the duty on beer was peculiarly burdensome and unjust upon the poor, at this time, when the duty on wine had been reduced. He said nothing with respect to that upon spirits—God forbid that he should! He would rather even that the duty should be kept up unnecessarily high upon them—he would rather even that the natural liberty of the people should be in such a degree infringed upon, than that any facility should be afforded to the consumption of spirits, always, however, regulating the duty, so as to prevent the encouragement of private distillation, which of the two evils was the greater. He was sure that by encouraging the consumption of beer, the gap which the loss of the duty might occasion in the Exchequer would very soon be filled up. Whatever might be the fate of this motion, he trusted that his hon. friend would bear his ill-success with patience; from others he might learn fortune; but from his example, and from that school of disappointment in which they both had been exercised, he might be taught not to relax his labour and perseverance in a cause which was worthy of them.

(Disce, puer, virtutem ex me, verumque laborem: Fortunam ex aliis).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer:—As to the total repeal of the duty without any substitute, he did not feel called upon to argue that question, because the hon. gent. himself did not seem to think it practicable to take off the three millions produced by the tax. A few weeks ago the hon. gent. proposed the reduction of the window-tax. The same arguments which had been used against that measure applied to the present motion, and he did not think the house would choose to listen to a repetition of them. He was aware that in so immense a system of revenue as ours, there might be very sound objections brought against many branches of it, perhaps against all; but beyond this general fact the argument could not be urged. The petitioners probably believed that the imposition of the beer duty on malt would materially reduce the price of beer; but he should be able, he thought, to satisfy the house, that this was not the case. The beer duty produced at present to 3,000,000*l.* per annum, and 80 million bushels of malt were charged with malt duty. To raise this tax by the substitution proposed, it would be necessary to lay an additional tax of two shillings per bushel on malt; which would raise the price of beer 10*s.* per barrel of 36 gallons, or about 1*d.* per quart. If, therefore, he admitted that the objections of the hon. gent. were valid against the inequality of the present duty, still the burden would rest as it did now, upon the consumer, who, although he would have the satisfaction of knowing that his neighbour paid more, would himself pay nothing less. But he could not admit that this tax was paid by the poor classes of the community exclusively or chiefly. In this town a great portion of the consumers of beer were not of this description, and in the country a great number of families were in the practice of brewing their own beer. Upon them this substitution would fall very heavily. The hon. gent. had assumed, too, in his calculation that the beer consumed by the rich and the poor was of the same strength—that it took in all cases only one quarter of malt to make three barrels and a half of beer. On the contrary, the beer of the rich man, whether he drank it himself or not, was much stronger than that brewed for ordinary consumption. In this point of view, therefore, the calculation of the hon. gent. as to the inequality was erroneous. The learned gent. (Mr. Brougham) had said it would be highly desirable to give greater facility to the retail trade. He agreed with him. It was that opinion that induced him to bring in a bill to accomplish that purpose, and which he had got the house to agree to, but with no small difficulty. If he might advise the learned gent. to learn fortunam ex aliis, although he would not venture to add virtutem ex me, the learned gent. certainly might learn the verum laborem. Although he could not pledge himself to any measure on the subject, he should be very glad if the state of the finances would allow him to take off the duty altogether; but he could not conceive that the proposed substitution would be in any respect desirable. The learned gent. had said, that he wished the reduction of the duty on spirits had been postponed to that on beer. If by a wish he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could have managed the matter, it would have been done; but he was obliged, in dealing with the spirits, to provide against any diminution of the revenue, and to do it, in fact, when he could. The object in reducing the duty on wine had been not so much to relieve any particular class of the people as on a principle of commercial policy to bring back the consumption to that point from which, in consequence of the intercourse with the continent, and from other causes, it had fallen off. All he could say on the subject before the house was, that it would give him great satisfaction if he were able to reduce the duty on beer. If his expectations should be realized, he would take the first opportunity of dealing with the subject, but he must not hold out expectations of the fulfilment of which he was not certain. With respect to the hon. gent.'s opinion respecting the collection, if the hon. gent. were more deeply initiated into the mode of collecting the malt duty, he would know there was none in which more frequent attempts at evasion (many of them successful) were made. Frequent prosecutions were the consequence; and if a double duty were imposed, a double temptation would be the consequence. For these reasons he could not consent to the reduction of 3,000,000*l.* of taxes, nor at present to any other modification of the duty.

Mr. J. Smith thought, as regarded the question of the sinking-fund, that any deficiency occasioned by taking off the beer tax might be made up by the imposition of some other. He would not at all object to putting the whole duty upon malt, which was proposed to be reduced on the manufactured article; but he certainly did feel that after so much had been done for the advantage of the higher classes in the course of the present session, something ought to be thought of before it concluded, for the benefit of the lower.

Mr. Maberly, in reply, regretted to see the benches on his side the house so thinly attended. He hoped, if his motion were thrown out, (as it stood, perhaps, in a fair way to be), that it would not be long before the table of the house would be covered with petitions for a reform in the constitution of that house.

Soap and Tallow Candle Duties.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.—Mr. Sykes rose to move for a reduction of the duty on soap and tallow candles. In so doing, it was ~~not~~ his intention to disturb the financial arrangements of the year, but merely to call upon the house to give a pledge that it would take the subject into its consideration at an early period of the ensuing session. As yet nothing had been done for the relief of the poorer classes, and he could not think of returning into the country without being able to tell his constituents that he had at least made the attempt to reduce those burdens, which pressed with peculiar severity on such of them as were least able to bear the pressure. The principle of repealing such duties had already been recognized by the reduction in the duties upon salt and leather; he trusted that the hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer would have no objection to carry it further, and to apply it to the taxes upon soap and candles. He contended that these taxes were objectionable, because they raised the price to the consumer by much more than the sum which they carried into the Exchequer; because they created great irritation to the manufacturer, besides the expense attending their collection; and likewise because they gave rise to a system of contraband dealing pregnant with much evil to the community. With respect to soap, the duty on the raw material was 100 per cent., and when it was cleansed, it was charged with an additional duty of 20 per cent. more. Could the house, then, be surprised, that in a manufacture so easy as that of soap, there was a multitude of contraband dealers? During the war, every smuggler in soap made 35 per cent. on every pound of soap he manufactured; at present, he understood, his profit was still greater, and fell little short of 100 per cent. He contended, that by the artifices of the smuggler, the Government was defrauded of the duty of one million pounds of soap a-year. Taking the annual returns of the duties on this article for the last three years, he found that the return of the last year, as compared with that of the preceding one, showed a decrease of 3,260*l.* He next read a statement to show that, making all allowances, there would still remain in the article of tallow 40,000 tons upon which no return of duty had been made. The duty on soap was 3*d.* per lb., and on candles 1*d.*; so that it was probable the greater share of the deficit occurred in the former article. He meant to propose the repeal of the whole of the tax on soft soap, and one-half of the duty upon hard. This would at once knock the smuggler on the head, and nothing else would. With respect to the duties upon candles, every argument which had been used as to soap applied equally to them, with this additional reason—that their manufacture afforded a greater facility for evading the revenue. Besides this, the poor man had to pay 10 per cent. more for his taxable commodity than the rich man; for there was exactly that difference between the amount of duty on the dipped and the mould candles. But he did not mean, even with all these reasons for the repeal, or at least for the reduction of these duties, to call for the alteration of this system at once: all he meant to propose was, that the house should pledge itself to reduce them early next session. It was the custom of Andrew Marvell, who once represented the town which he (Mr. Sykes) had now the honour of representing, to write every night to his constituents what he had attempted to effect for their interests in Parliament. He could not boast of such industry; but he liked, at all events, to communicate with them once a-year, and he hoped to bear good tidings to them on this occasion—not that he expected, or looked for, the old rewards which they used in former times to bestow, for he found entries of “a fitch of bacon sent to Andrew Marvell,” and other presents of a like nature. Though these good old times were passed away, still he thought the people of England would always be found grateful to Parliament for a close attention to their interests. He concluded by moving, that “it will be expedient early next session, or as soon as the financial situation of the country shall admit, to reduce the duties upon soap and candles.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer contended that, having repealed taxes to the amount of one million and a half during the session, it was impossible to proceed further at present. The hon. gent. had shewn no reason for reducing these duties in preference to those upon which reductions had been made, and he must, therefore, resist the motion.—Negatived without a division.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25.—The house having resolved itself into a Committee to consider of the Consolidated Custom Duties,

Mr. Huskisson said, that in requesting the attention of the committee, whilst he stated (in continuation of the subject which he had the honour to open on Monday last*) the alterations which he proposed to recommend in the duties levied upon the importation of materials employed in some of our principal manufactures, and also in the prohibitory duties now imposed upon the manufactured productions of other countries, he need scarcely bespeak the disposition of the committee to countenance the principle of these proposals, so far as they should be found not inconsistent with the protection of our own industry. He felt the more assured of this general disposition of the committee, not only as it was manifested on the former evening, but also from the experience which the house and the country had of the benefits to be derived from the removal of vexatious restraints and interference, in the concerns of internal industry, or foreign commerce. He thought he was not too bold in stating, that, in every instance, as far as he and his right hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had hitherto gone, not only had the fears and forebodings of the particular interests by which they were opposed proved to be unfounded, but the expectations of their most sanguine supporters had been more than realized. In these advantages, therefore, the opponents of the measures by which they were produced, must, on the one hand, find a matter of consolation, that their admonitions did not persuade—that their arguments did not convince—that their predictions did not intimidate; and, on the other hand, past success was, to the supporters of these measures, a source of encouragement to follow up the same path, as likely to lead us still further in the career of public prosperity.—Last year, in the system of our Silk Trade, one great alteration was the substitution of an ad valorem duty of 30*l.* per cent. instead of an absolute prohibition of all articles manufactured of silk. A doubt was suggested at the time, and in that doubt he had participated, whether 30*l.* per cent. was not too high a duty;—not too high, indeed, according to the apprehensions of the British manufacturer—for he stated it would be quite inadequate to his protection; but whether its amount would not still leave some latitude to the smuggler. This latter ground of doubt still remained—the former was already pretty well removed. If alarm now existed any where, and he knew it did exist, it was transferred to the other side of the Channel, and was to be found only among the manufacturers of France, in consequence of the great progress and improvement, since made in this country, in every branch of the silk trade. Having thus ruled that 30*l.* per cent. was the highest duty which could be maintained for the protection of a manufacture, in every part of which we were most behind foreign countries—the only extensive manufacture, which, on the score of general inferiority, stood in need of special protection,—surely it was time to inquire in what degree our other great manufactures were protected, and to consider if there were no inconvenience or injury caused to ourselves, no suspicion and odium excited in foreign countries, by duties which were either absolutely prohibitory, or, if the articles to which they attached admitted of being smuggled, which had no other effect than to throw the business of importing them into the hands of the smuggler. To bring this subject more particularly before the house, he would begin with our greatest manufacture, that of Cotton. In this manufacture, we were superior to all other countries; and by the cheapness and quality of our goods, we undersold our competitors in all the markets of the world, which were open alike to us and to them. He did not except the market of the East Indies, the first seat of the manufacture, of which it might be said to be the staple, where the raw material was grown, where labour was cheaper than in any other country, and from which England and Europe were, for a long time, supplied with cotton goods. Now, however, large quantities of British cottons were sold in India, at prices lower than they could be produced by the native manufacturers. If any possible doubt could remain, that this manufacture had nothing to apprehend from competition any where, and, least of all, from a competition in our own home market, it must vanish when he stated, that the official value of cotton goods, exported last year, amounted to the astonishing sum of 30,795,000*l.*: and yet such had been the extravagant sphere of a jealous monopoly, and the influence of old prejudices, that in our book of rates, the duties stood at this moment, as follows:—On certain descriptions of cotton goods, 7*½l.* on others 6*½l.* 10*s.*, and, on a third class 30*l.* per cent. These absurd duties, attached alike upon the productions of our own subjects in the East Indies, as upon those of foreign countries; whilst our manufactures were admitted, almost duty free, into all the territories of the East India Company. Instead of this scale, he proposed to admit all foreign articles, manufactured wholly of cotton, whether from the East Indies or elsewhere, at one uniform duty of 10*l.* per cent., which, he conceived, was sufficient to countervail the small duty levied upon the importation of the raw material into this country, and the duty upon any other articles used in the manufacture. Any protection, beyond this, he held to be not only unnecessary, but mischievous.—From cotton, he proceeded to Woollens, one of our oldest manufactures, and one which had been most nursed and dandled by the legislature. Some detailed and authentic history of the paternal and zealous solicitude with which our ancestors interposed to protect the woollen manufacture,—should such a history ever be written,—would alone preserve future generations from incredulity, in respect to the extent to which legislative interference was once carried in this branch of internal industry. Within his own time, regulating acts, dealing with every minute process of the manufacture, had been repealed by the score; as had also heaps of other laws, equally wise, prescribing the mode of clipping wool, its package, the time to be allowed, and the forms to be observed, in removing it from one place to another;—laws, the violation of which, in some instances, amounted to felony, but which no longer disgraced the statute-book. He would state, from official documents, what had been the relative progress of our cotton and woollen manufactures since 1765, being a period of sixty years:—

The quantity of cotton wool imported into Great Britain, in the year ended Jan. 5, 1765, was about . . . . .	3,360,000 lb.
The value of cotton goods exported . . . . .	200,000 l.
The quantity of cotton wool exported in the year ended Jan. 5, 1825, was . . . . .	147,174,000 lb.
The value of cotton goods exported . . . . .	30,725,000 l.
The quantity of lamb and sheep's wool imported in the year 1765, was . . . . .	1,926,000 lb.
The value of woollen goods exported . . . . .	5,159,900 l.
The quantity of lamb and sheep's wool imported in the year 1825, was . . . . .	23,858,000 lb.
The value of woollen goods exported . . . . .	6,926,000 l.
And he would just add, that—
The quantity of raw silk imported in 1765, was . . . . .	418,000 lb.
And in 1825 . . . . .	3,047,000 lb.

In submitting these satisfactory statements, he could not refrain from calling the attention of the committee to one observation. It must, he thought, be admitted, that, in 1765, the whole quantity of sheeps' wool grown in this country could not be nearly so great as at present, when, owing to the improvements in husbandry, and particularly in the art of raising winter food for the flocks, the number of sheep must be greatly increased; and yet, the quantity of wool imported in that year, was not one-twelfth of the quantity imported in 1825. Out of this aggregate supply from home growth and foreign import, the whole wants of our own population was supplied in 1765, leaving to the amount of 5,159,000 l. of manufactured woollens for exportation. In 1825, out of the aggregate of the home growth, and of an import of wool so greatly exceeding that of 1765, the whole manufactured export is 6,926,000 l., being an increase over that of 1764, of only 1,765,000 l. Now, he would ask, how often, in these sixty years, had the increase of consumption in cotton and silk clothing been contemplated with alarm and jealousy, by the wool grower, and the woollen manufacturer; by the descendants of those who passed laws (repealed only within these last ten years) compelling us to be buried in woollens?—And yet what was our consumption of cotton, that other great article of clothing?—In 1765, next to nothing. And what is it now?—Greater probably than the whole amount of our woollens, to say nothing of the consumption of silk, which had also increased eight-fold. Could any statement shew more decidedly the wonderful increase in the power of consumption by this country? Could any thing more forcibly illustrate that general position to which he had already adverted, and which could not be too strongly impressed on those who legislated for the interests of commerce and industry,—that the means which led to increased consumption, and which were the foundation, as that consumption was the proof, of our prosperity, would be most effectually promoted by an unrestrained competition, not only between the capital and industry of different classes in the same country, but also by extending that competition, as much as possible, to all other countries?—The present rates of duty on foreign woollens varied from 50 l. to 67 l. 10 s. per cent. He was satisfied that 15 l. per cent. would answer every purpose of reasonable and fair protection; and this was the reduction which he intended to submit to the committee.—The next great branch of manufacture was that of Linens; which also had been the object of more nursing and interference than were good for its healthy and vigorous growth. The present duties, which were very complicated, fluctuated from 40 l. to 180 l. per cent. and he proposed to simplify and reduce them, by putting them all at 25 l. per cent.—In like manner the duties on Paper, which were now altogether prohibitory, he proposed to reduce, so that they should not exceed double the amount of the excise duty payable upon that article manufactured in this country. This reduction would extend to printed books, which now paid, if in any way bound, 6 l. 10 s. and, if unbound, 5 l. the cwt. The amount of these duties was sufficient, as he had been assured, to lead to the smuggling of books printed abroad; and he was sure that, for the character of this country—for the interest of science and literature, the importation of foreign works, which did not interfere with any copyright in England, ought not to be discouraged. He should, therefore, propose to lower these duties, regard being had to copyrights, which might require specific provisions, to 5 l. 10 s. and 3 l. respectively.—Upon Glass, the present duty, which was 80 l. he proposed to lower to 30 l. per cent.; and, instead of the heavy duty, so justly complained of, upon common Glass Bottles, amounting to 10 s. 2 d. a-dozen, and which, now that wine was reduced in price, amounted, in many cases, to more than half its value, he intended to recommend a duty of 3 s. only.—Upon all descriptions of Foreign Earthenware, an article with which we supplied so many other countries, the present duty was 75 l. per cent.; the effect of which was, that ornamented porcelain was abundantly smuggled from the continent. He proposed to reduce the duty on earthenware and plain porcelain goods to 15 l., and upon porcelain, gilt or ornamented, to 30 l. per cent.; which was quite as much as could be demanded, without throwing this branch of import into the hands of the smuggler.—To foreign Gloves, another manufacture now altogether prohibited, but which were to be bought in every shop, he applied the same observation, and the same measure of duty, 30 l. per cent.—He now came to the Metallic substances. The amount of the reduction which he proposed upon Iron, from 6 l. 10 s. to 1 l. 10 s. a ton, had already been stated by his rt. hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer)*. It afforded him great satisfaction, on that occasion, to hear the liberal sentiments avowed by a worthy Alderman (Thompson) extensively concerned in the iron works of this country. His unqualified approbation of this important change, he had flattered himself, would have been echoed by all the other iron masters: but in this expectation he had been disappointed. Deputations from the mining districts had since been at the Board of Trade. He had heard their representations, but had not been convinced by them. Like other deputations he had received, whose interests in manufacture or trade are affected, or likely, in their apprehensions, to be affected, by the changes, those from the mining districts were great advocates for free trade generally, and forward in their approbation of the principles on which the government was acting; but each had some reason to assign, quite conclusive, no doubt, in themselves, why their peculiar calling should be made an exception. All these special reasons had only satisfied him (Mr. H.) that the general rule of free competition was the best for all trades, as it was certainly the best for the public; though he could quite understand, that a privilege or monopoly given to any one branch, whilst it was denied to all others, might be an advantage to that particular trade. But was it fit, that in an article like iron, of universal use in all our manufactures—in all the arts and conveniences of life—in agriculture—in houses—in ships—we should now be suffering from a scarcity of that metal? Had not the price of British iron, of late, been almost doubled, and had not all the iron masters demands for iron beyond what they could supply? Was there no risk or danger to our hardware manufacturers at Birmingham and Sheffield, from this state of things? Could they execute the orders which they received from abroad, if iron continued at its present price, or were to rise still higher? How many thousand workmen would be thrown out of employ, if this branch of trade were lost to this country—if it were to be transferred, for instance, to Germany, the Netherlands, or other parts of the Continent? He had been assured, upon authority not likely to have mislead him, that very extensive orders, which had lately been received at Birmingham from the United States, and other parts, had been refused, because the great rise in the price of iron did not admit of the articles being made within the limits specified in those orders. And what was the consequence? They were transferred to the Continent; and the share of this country in their execution, was confined to making the models and drawings, which were prepared here, for the guidance of the foreign artificers. It was therefore, of the greatest importance, that the duties on foreign iron should be reduced, in reference, not only to the interests of the consumer in this country, but also to the well-being of those numerous classes employed in all the manufactures of this metal for foreign countries. The necessity of this reduction became the more urgent, from the fact, that, at this time, the whole produce of the British mines was not adequate to supply the present demand. But quite independent of this evil, which might be temporary, it appeared to him, that it would be of great advantage to the manufactures of this country to be able to procure foreign iron, particularly that of Sweden, on easy terms. Swedish iron was known to be superior to our own; its admixture with British iron would improve the quality of our manufactures; they would be held in higher estimation, and not only be able to command a more decided preference in foreign markets, but become more valuable for all the purposes to which iron was applied in our domestic consumption. Take, for instance, the important article of iron cables, now so generally used by our shipping; it would not be denied that, by a due proportion of Swedish iron in their composition, their strength and tenacity would be improved. Here, then, an important advantage to our naval interests, connected too with the safety of every ship using iron cables, was directly counteracted by the present high duties on foreign iron. The result of its more free admission, he was persuaded, would be, not only to check those extreme fluctuations, which, of late years, had occurred in the price of iron—at one time so low as to be ruinous to the producer, at another so high, as to be greatly distressing to all the other interests of the country,—but also, by the improvements to which it would lead, to extend the use and consumption of manufactured iron (the bulk of which would always be our own) both at home and abroad. This increased demand, joined to a more steady price, would, ere long, more than compensate to the British iron masters the temporary inconvenience, if any, which some of them apprehended from the extent to which it was proposed to carry the reduction of this duty.—The next metal upon which he had to propose a reduction was Copper. The duty, which in 1790 did not exceed 10*l.*; now amounted to 54*l.* per ton. This high duty was not less injurious to the manufacturer than the high duty on iron. Now if the price of our copper manufacture, were to exceed that of the like articles of foreign manufacture, in any thing like a proportion to this enormous duty, it was evident, that, even assuming some superiority in the skill of our workmen, we must ultimately be driven from the markets of other countries. The quantity of copper produced by the English mines amounted to about 10,000 tons annually, of which something less than one half sufficed for the home consumption. This being the proportion, did not the owners of copper mines see that if, by the high price at which the manufacturer bought copper, he should lose his hold upon the foreign market, they must be injured by the effects of their own monopoly? The annual supply required would then be diminished to less than 5,000 tons; and they would, therefore, run the risk of losing more by the continuance of the present high duties, than by the repeal of them. These prohibitory duties had already, in his judgment, been attended with serious injury. They had prevented copper, not only in an unmanufactured, but in an imperfectly smelted state, from coming into this country. This metal existed in great abundance, not only in several parts of Europe, but also in some of the new States of America. It would have been sent here, as it used to be, in an imperfect state, in payment for British manufactures. Here it would have undergone the process of purifying, of rolling, or of being otherwise prepared for consumption, by the means of our superior machinery, had it not been kept away by impolitic restrictions. They operated as a bounty upon the transfer of our capital to other countries, and as a premium to encourage the inhabitants of those countries to do for themselves that which, greatly to our own advantage, we should otherwise have continued to do for them. At the same time he was aware that considerable capitals had been invested in our copper mines, under the encouragement given by the present monopoly, and how difficult it was to do all that the public interest would require, without injury to those particular interests. This, in almost every instance, was the most arduous part of the task which a sense of public duty had imposed upon him. In the present case, however, he believed that he might safely propose to reduce the duty on copper from 54*l.* to 27*l.* a ton; without committing himself, not to recommend, at a future period, even a further reduction, if it should appear that the present limit were not sufficient to enable our manufacturers to preserve their foreign market, and that at a lower rate of duty, no great or sudden check would be given to the British mines. There was another metallic substance, in some degree connected with the copper manufacture, the duty upon which ought to be considerably lowered; he meant zinc, commonly known in trade under the name of spelter. This semi-metal entered, in the proportion of about one-third, into the composition of brass. The selling price of spelter, on the Continent, was about 20*l.* a ton, here about 45*l.* and the duty is 28*l.* Now, with a duty upon copper of 54*l.* a ton, and upon spelter of 28*l.* what chance could we have of maintaining a footing in the foreign market for any description of brass wares? None:—and accordingly he was assured that, at that moment, our briskest demand in this trade was in the preparation of moulds and patterns for the foreign manufacturer. Upon spelter, he should propose to reduce the duty full one half. He ought to go still lower, and perhaps he should after making further inquiry, in some future stage; for he was convinced that the mines of this country could not successfully compete with those of Silesia, in which spelter was principally produced. Upon tin, the present duty was excessive. It was an article of which we had more the command, and was of less extensive consumption. He proposed, however, to reduce the duty more than one half—from 8*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* to 2*l.* 10*s.* the cwt. The duty on lead was now 20*l.* per cent. ad valorem; this he proposed to lower to 15*l.* which he hoped would be sufficient to admit of a foreign import, and to check the present exorbitant price of that metal. There were several other enumerated articles in the book of rates, upon which he proposed to reduce the duties upon the same principle. Perhaps, however, he ought to state that although every thing which could, by any accident, be considered as an object of jealousy to any of our manufactures, was enumerated by name in the book of rates, there were other things not directly connected with trade or merchandize, but with art, science, and literature, and deriving their value solely from such connexion, which, whenever they were brought into this country, cost the person who imported them 50*l.* per cent. on their estimated value, under a sweeping clause, at the end of that book, which provided, that upon all goods, wares, and merchandize, being, either in part or wholly manufactured, and not enumerated, a duty of 50*l.* per cent. should be payable, and a duty of 20*l.* per cent. upon all non-enumerated goods, not being either in part or wholly manufactured. Now this duty of 50*l.* per cent., of little value to the Exchequer, and attaching principally upon such objects as he had adverted to, ought undoubtedly to be reduced. The instances, in which this high duty attached on articles of curiosity and interest, were not very numerous; they were sometimes ludicrous, perhaps, but not very creditable to the good taste and character of this country. One instance, which he recollected to have heard, he would mention. A gentleman imported a mummy from Egypt (a laugh). The officers of the customs were not a little puzzled by this non-enumerated article. These remains of mortality, muscles and sinews, pickled and preserved three thousand years ago, could not be deemed a raw material; and therefore, upon deliberation, it was determined to tax them as a manufactured article (a laugh). The importer, anxious that his mummy should not be seized, stated its value at 400*l.* That declaration cost him 200*l.* being at the rate of 50*l.* per cent. on the manufactured merchandize which he was about to import. He proposed to reduce the duty on manufactured articles, not enumerated, from 50*l.* to 20*l.* and on articles unmanufactured, from 20*l.* to 10*l.* per cent. The result of the alterations, which he had stated to the committee, would be this;—that upon foreign manufactured articles generally, where the duty was imposed to protect our own manufactures, and not for the purpose of collecting revenue, that duty would, in no instance, exceed 30*l.* per cent. If the article were not manufactured much cheaper or much better abroad than at home, such a duty was ample for protection. If it were manufactured so much cheaper, or so much better abroad, as to render 30*l.* per cent. insufficient, his answer was first,—that a greater protection was only a premium to the smuggler; and, secondly, that there was no wisdom in attempting to bolster up a competition, which this degree of protection would not sustain. Let the state have the tax, which was now the reward of the smuggler, and let the consumer have the better and cheaper article, without the painful consciousness that he was consulting his own convenience at the expense of daily violating the laws of his country. When his rt. hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was labouring to put an end, as fast as he could, to the evils of smuggling, by lowering the duties, increased during the pressure of the war, and for the purposes of revenue, upon articles of consumption, the last thing, which they ought to countenance, was the continuance of high duties, not for the benefit of the Exchequer, but for the supposed protection of certain branches of manufacture. Was the illicit importation of foreign spirits to be checked merely to give fresh life to the smuggling of cambrics and lace from Flanders, or of gloves and porcelain from France? He could not think that gentlemen were aware to what an extent all the moral evils of smuggling were encouraged by the prohibition of these comparatively petty articles. Let any one go down to Brighton, and wander along the coast from thence to Hastings; he would undertake to say, that he should most easily find, at every place he came to, persons who would engage to deliver to him, within ten days or a fortnight, any prohibited article of manufacture, which he could name, and almost in any quantity, upon an advance of 30*l.* per cent. beyond the prime cost at Paris. What was the consequence of such a system? A number of families, that would otherwise be valuable and industrious members of society existed, and trained up their children in a state of perpetual warfare with the law, till they insensibly acquired the habits and feelings of outlaws, standing rather in the relation of pirates, than of fellow-subjects, to the rest of the community. And was this abominable system to be tolerated, not from any overruling necessity of upholding the revenue, nay, possibly, to its injury, but merely because, in a few secondary branches of manufacture, we did not possess the same natural advantages, or the same degree of skill, as our neighbours? If cambrics were made better at Valenciennes, was that a sufficient reason for imposing a prohibitory duty on all linens; a duty from which the revenue got next to nothing, whilst the country was full of the proscribed article? If certain descriptions of paper for engraving were made more perfect in France, were we always to be condemned to the use of an inferior and dearer article of home manufacture? The time had been, when it was found a sufficient reason for imposing a prohibitory duty upon a foreign article, that it was better than we could make at home; but he trusted when such calls were made upon this house hereafter, their first answer at least would be, "Let us see what can be done by competition—first try to imitate, and bye and bye, perhaps, you will surpass your foreign rival." Prohibitions in fact, were a premium upon mediocrity. They destroyed the best incentive to excellence, invention, and improvement. They condemned the community to suffer, both in price and quality, all the evils of monopoly, except in as far as a remedy could be found in the baneful arts of the smuggler. They had also another of the great evils of monopoly, that of exposing the consumer, as well as the dealer, to rapid and inconvenient fluctuations in price. With the knowledge of this fact, that we furnished, in a proportion far exceeding the supply from any other country, the general markets of the world, with all the leading articles of manufacture, upon which he has now proposed greatly to lower the duties, he owned that he was not afraid of this country being overwhelmed with foreign goods. Some would come in, which were now excluded; he should be glad of it. Their admission would be beneficial to the general interests of the country. That it could not be extensively injurious to any of those interests, might be inferred, not only from arguments, but from actual experience. In 1786, we entered into a commercial treaty with France. Under the stipulations of that treaty, the cottons and woollens of France were admitted into this country, upon a duty of 12*l.* per cent.: he now proposed for the latter 15*l.*—Hardware, cutlery, turnery, &c. upon a duty of 10*l.*: he now proposed 30*l.* per cent. Pottery, and glass, &c. under a duty of 12*l.*: he now proposed 15*l.* upon the former, and 30*l.* upon the latter. What was the result of this treaty? We sent goods of various descriptions to the French market, and England was supplied with other goods of French production; but no injury accrued, no check was given to any particular branch of our staple manufactures, in consequence of this interchange. One advantage arising from it was to create a spirit of emulation, an instance of which occurred in the woollen trade. Soon after the opening of the intercourse between the two countries, French cloths of a fine quality were imported in considerable quantity. They were preferred to our own. No fashionable man was to be seen without a coat of French cloth. What followed? In less than two years, the cloth of our own manufactures became equal to that imported from France; the one could not be distinguished from the other; and coats of French cloth were still the fashion, whilst the cloth of which they were made was manufactured in this country. In like manner, we should now, in all probability, import some printed cottons from Alsace and Switzerland, of richer and brighter colours than our own; some fancy muslins from India; some silk stuffs, some porcelain from France—objects for which curiosity or fashion may create a demand in this metropolis; but they would not interfere with those articles of more wide and universal consumption, which our own manufactures supplied cheaper and better; whilst they would excite the ingenuity of our artists and workmen, to attempt improvements, which might enable them to enter the lists with the foreigner, in those very articles in which he had now an acknowledged superiority. It certainly might be objected, that a great change had taken place, in the situation of the British manufacturers, since the French treaty of 1786, that we had been engaged in a long and expensive war, and that we had now to support the weight of a great many new and heavy taxes. But other countries had not been exempted from the calamities of war; their taxes, too, had been increased; their burthens made to press more heavily. What was still more mischievous, in most of those countries, their commercial and manufacturing establishments had felt more directly the ravages and interruption of war; many of them had been violently swept away; whilst the capitals which they had called forth, if not confiscated, had been impaired or diminished, by the exactions of military power. In this country no such calamity had been experienced. The trading capital of England had remained entire; even during the war, it continued constantly increasing; and in respect to the comparative cheapness of labour in foreign countries, although by no means an immaterial part of the present consideration, it was not alone sufficient, as experience had shewn, to make the balance preponderate in their favour. Since the invention of the steam engine, coupled with the application of so many other discoveries, both in mechanical and chemical science, to all the arts of life, the mere estimate of manual labour was lost sight of, in comparison with that of the creative powers of mind. It was the union of those powers, and of the great capitals which called them into action, which distinguished British industry, and had placed it in the commanding situation which it now holds in the world. To these advantages were joined that energy and continuity of enterprise, that perseverance and steadiness of exertion, which, even by our rivals, were admitted to belong to the English character. It was upon these qualities, and these advantages, much more than upon any system of bounties and protecting duties, that he relied with confidence, for the maintenance and improvement of the station which we now occupied among the trading communities of the world. He expected a further objection—indeed he had already been told, in the correspondence which he had felt it right to hold with some of our most intelligent and accomplished merchants and manufacturers on this subject—that in 1786, we had insured from France, by treaty, a reciprocity of commercial advantages; but that, at present, we had made no such arrangement. This objection, in our respect, deserved consideration. He meant in its relation to the foreign market—with regard to the danger of our being undernourished in our own market, it did not hold at all. Now, in respect to our deferring any improvement in our own commercial system, until we could persuade foreign states to view it as a concession to them, which we were ready to make in return for similar concessions on their part, he could not discover much wisdom in such a line of policy. Let his rt. hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) continue his good practice of coming down to this house, session after session, to accumulate fresh proofs, that the removal of restrictive impositions and excessive duties was not diminution, but, frequently, increase of revenue:—Let foreign countries see him, year after year, largely remitting public burthens, and, at the same time, exhibiting a prosperous Exchequer, still flowing to the same perennial level; and he had no doubt, when the Governments of the Continent should have contemplated, for a few years longer, the happy consequences of the system in which we were now proceeding, that their eyes would be opened. They would then believe—although at present they did not—that we were sincere and consistent in our principles; and, for their own advantage, they would then, imitate us in our present course, as they had of late been adopting our cast-off system of restrictions and prohibitions. That they had hitherto suspected our sincerity, and looked upon our professions as lures to ensnare them, was not very surprising, when they compared those professions with that code of prohibition, which he was now endeavouring to pare down to a scale of moderate duties. Having now stated the alterations which he intended to propose, with regard to the protecting and prohibitory duties, he had only to add that, with a view to give the British manufacturer every fair advantage in the competition with which he had to contend in the foreign market, it was desirable to consider how far this object could be promoted, by a reduction of some of the duties now levied upon the raw materials, which he was obliged to use in his manufacture. During the exigencies of the late war, duties were laid or increased, upon various articles used in dyeing. The revenue derived from these duties was not considerable: but, in proportion to the amount of the charge, must be the increased price of the manufactured commodity. Be that charge, upon our woollen cloths, for instance, only 1 or 2 per cent., even this small addition in the present open competition of the foreign market, might turn the scale against us, and ought therefore to be withdrawn. On most of the articles in question, he should propose a large reduction in the existing rate of duty. They were so numerous that he should not weary the patience of the Committee, by mentioning them specifically. To one or two articles, however, not included under the class of dyeing drugs, he must beg leave shortly to refer. Olive oil was very much used in the manufacture of the finer woollen cloths. The duty upon it was somewhat more than doubled during the war. He proposed to reduce it to a rate rather below that of 1790; from 15*l.* 13*s.* the present duty, to 7*l.* a ton. There was another species of oil, extracted from rape seed, largely used in the preparation of coarse woollens, upon which he also proposed to give relief. The Committee might perhaps recollect, that a few years ago, when the panic of agricultural distress was in full force—when fears were openly expressed in that house, that England must cease to grow corn, it was suggested, that the raising of rape seed might become a profitable substitute; and, upon this suggestion, a duty, almost prohibitory, was laid on foreign seed, which till then had been imported free from any charge. This measure, of which the benefit, if beneficial at all, was confined to a very few districts of the kingdom, had certainly contributed nothing to the revival of our agriculture, but it had in various ways, been attended with detriment to our manufactures. It had greatly injured the manufacture of rape oil and rape cake in this country, and increased the price of the former to the woollen trade. The cake, indeed, being wanted for agricultural purposes, was allowed to come in from abroad nearly duty free; so that, in this instance, and to this extent, our recent policy had been to prohibit the raw material, and to encourage its importation in a manufactured state. He proposed to revert to our ancient policy in respect to this article; and, after giving a certain time to the dealers to get rid of their stock in hand, to allow the free importation of rape seed, upon a duty which would be merely nominal.—The only other article, which he thought it necessary to mention, was wool. The duty was now one penny a pound upon all foreign wool. It had been stated to him, that even this rate of duty pressed severely upon the manufacturers of coarse woollens, in which we had most to fear from foreign competition, and that considerable relief would be afforded by reducing it to one half, upon all wool, not exceeding the value of one shilling a pound. He therefore proposed to make this alteration, by which, he was assured, the quantity of coarse wool imported into this country, to be mixed in the manufacture with our own long wool, was likely to be greatly increased. All these reductions he considered to be right and proper in principle; but, as measures calculated to afford encouragement and assistance to our manufacturers, he was particularly anxious to propose them at the same time, when he was bringing forward other measures, not unlikely, till better understood, to excite alarm in particular quarters. He now came to the last of the three heads, into which he had divided the subject, to be submitted to the committee—the means of affording some further encouragement to the shipping and navigation of the empire. There was already a bill on the table which would contribute very essentially to the relief of that important interest. He meant the bill which repealed all the quarantine duties. They operated as a very considerable burthen, unfairly placed on the particular ships and goods which were compelled to perform quarantine. This was a precaution adopted, not for the special advantage of those engaged in any particular trade, on the contrary, to them the detention and loss of time were great inconveniences, however unavoidable—but for the general protection and safety of the community. The committee of foreign trade was, therefore, perfectly justified in recommending that the expense of quarantine should be borne by the country at large, and not by any particular class in it; and a bill has been brought in accordingly by his rt. hon. friend, the Vice President of the Board of Trade. Another measure of substantial relief was, the abolition of fees upon shipping and trade in our colonies. Besides the vexation and liability to abuse, inseparable from the present system, he knew that, in many instances, the fees alone, upon a ship and cargo, amounted to much more than all the public duties collected upon the same.* The next measure, which he had to propose, was the repeal of the stamp duty now payable upon the transfer of a whole ship, or of any share in a ship, from one person to another. A ship, he believed, was the only chattel upon which a duty of this sort attached, as often as it changed hands. He could trace no reason for this anomaly, except one, which ought rather to be a plea for exemption. From motives of state policy, the owner, or part owner of any ship, was compelled to register his interest or share therein. From this registry the ship-owner derived no advantage—on the contrary, however improved the forms and regulations now observed, it was at best to him troublesome, and more or less obnoxious to litigation. By consolidating and amending the registry laws, he had done every thing in his power to mitigate those inconveniences, but still every transfer must be registered. Now, to take advantage of a law, which compelled the names of all owners to be registered, in order to attach a heavy stamp duty on every transfer that might be made in the owner-ship, was an unnecessary aggravation of a necessary inconvenience, and in itself a great injustice. He should, therefore, submit a resolution for abolishing the whole of this transfer duty upon shipping, by which he should at once, relieve the owners of this description of property from a partial tax, and from some degree of annoyance. There was also another stamp duty, in respect to which he was anxious to afford relief. He meant the duty on Debentures for the payment of Drawbacks, and on Bonds, given by merchants, for the due delivery of the goods which they had declared for exportation. He proposed this relief, partly, upon the same principle as that which he had stated in respect to the transfer of ships. These bonds were not entered into for the benefit of the merchant, but for the security of the revenue; besides, from their being ad valorem stamps, they frequently led to great abuses and perjury. He proposed to reduce these stamps to a fixed duty of only 5s. upon each instrument.—As connected with the same subject—the relief of our commerce and shipping from direct pecuniary charges—he begged leave now to call the attention of the committee to the change which he proposed in the system of our consular establishments in foreign ports. These establishments were regulated by no fixed principle, in respect to the mode of remunerating the individuals employed in this branch of the public service. In one port, the consul received a salary; in another he was paid exclusively by fees; in a third, he received both a salary and fees. The consuls at Havre and Marseilles had no salaries. The consul at Bordeaux had a salary, and was allowed fees. The consul at Antwerp had a salary. The consul at Rotterdam had none. The consul at Stettin had a salary. The consul at Dantzic, none. At Madeira, the consul had a salary; at the Azores, none. The scale of fees, the principle upon which they were levied, the authority of enforcing their payment, and the mode of levying them, appeared to be quite as various and unsettled as the mode of remuneration. In some ports, the fees attached upon the vessel; in others, upon the merchandize. In some ports, vessels payed all alike, without regard to their tonnage; in others, the fees were rated in proportion to the size of the vessel. In some ports, again, the fees were an ad valorem charge upon the cargo; in others, so much per ton upon the freight, without regard to its value. Now, not only all this discrepancy in the details of the same establishment could not be right, and would require revision; but he thought that the whole principle of providing for our consuls, by authorizing them to levy a tax upon the shipping and commerce of the country, was wrong. In the first place, the foreign trade of the country was one of its great public interests, and as much entitled to be protected at the public expense, as far as it wanted protection in foreign countries, as any other great interest. In the next place, in the performance of many of the duties for which consuls were appointed, the ship-owner and merchant had no direct or exclusive interest. The navigation laws, the quarantine laws, instead of being advantageous, were inconveniently restrictive to trade; yet to these it was the peculiar duty of the consuls to attend. They had other essential duties to discharge, in which the merchant and the ship-owner had no interest, distinct from that of the whole community. It, therefore, appeared to him, that it would be just as reasonable to tax English travellers, in foreign countries, for the support of our political missions, by which they were protected, as to tax the shipping or the trade, for the payment of our consular establishments. His object was, to grant to all our consuls fixed and moderate salaries, to be paid out of the public purse; such salaries to vary, of course, according to the importance and responsibility of the station, to the country in which the consul resided, and to other circumstances, which must, from time to time, come under the consideration of the Government. In the civil list, which was granted for the life of the Sovereign, a sum of 40,000*l.* was allotted for the payment of consular expenses. A considerable part of this sum was required for the salaries of certain officers, designated as consuls, but who were, at the same time, diplomatic agents: he meant our residents at Algiers, and the other courts on the coast of Africa, in the Mediterranean. As the remainder of this sum would fall far short of what would be necessary for the payment of the whole consular charge, he proposed that the difference should be voted annually by the house, upon estimates to be laid before it by the proper department. If this change should be approved of by the house, the effect would be the abolition, generally, of all the present fees payable to our consuls, either upon ships or goods, in foreign ports. Certain small fees would still remain for personal acts that a consul might be called upon to perform, such as notarial instruments, and other documents to which his attestation or signature might be required. Those fees would be specified in the bill, and would be reduced to the most moderate amount. In regard to another expense, provided for, in certain ports, by a tax upon shipping—he meant the maintenance of a place of worship, the payment of a chaplain, and other charges of that description, he trusted, that the British merchants and inhabitants residing at, or resorting to, those ports, would find no difficulty in raising, by a small voluntary rate among themselves, a sufficient sum for those purposes. But, as an encouragement to them to provide the means of performing the important duties of religion, he should propose, in the bill, to give a power to the Government, to advance a sum equal to the amount of any subscription which might be so raised, either for erecting a place of worship, providing a burial ground, or allotting a suitable salary to a chaplain, in any foreign port, where a British consul might reside.—Having now stated the outlines of the plan, which he had to propose, for the improvement of our consular system, it only remained for him to mention one other subject, in immediate connexion with it, and certainly of great importance to a very valuable branch of our foreign trade—he meant, our trade to those countries, known under the name of the Levant. This trade was placed under the direction of a chartered company, so far back as the reign of James I. Great privileges were conferred upon that company; and they had also important duties to perform. Among their privileges, they were allowed to appoint all the consuls to the Levant, and to levy considerable duties on all British ships resorting to those countries, for the maintenance of those consuls, and the other expenses of their establishment. They also obtained, partly by acts of parliament, and partly by treaty and concession from the Porte, the right of exercising, by their agents and consuls, a very extensive jurisdiction over all British subjects in the Turkish dominions. These powers and trusts had been exercised, by the servants of the company, for two centuries, often under very difficult circumstances; and generally speaking, with great correctness, fidelity, and discretion. In the present state, however, of a great part of the countries in which these consuls resided, and looking, moreover, to our relations with Turkey, as well as with other powers, to the delicate and important questions of international law, which must constantly arise out of the intercourse of commerce with a country in a state of civil war,—questions involving discussions, not only with the contending parties in that country, but with other trading and neutral powers,—it was impossible not to feel that, upon political considerations alone, it was highly expedient that the public servants of this country, in Turkey, should hold their appointments from the Crown. It was to the Crown that foreign powers would naturally look for the regulating and controlling the conduct of those officers, in the exercise of their authority; and it was certainly most fit, not only on this account, but for the due maintenance of that authority, that they should be named, not by a trading company, however respectable, but, like other consuls, directly by the Crown, advised, as it must be, in their selection, by its responsible servants. If this change, in the mode of appointing the consuls in the Levant, be called for upon political grounds, it would be highly absurd not to take advantage of the occasion to bring them, in all other respects, under the regulations of the new consular establishment. It became the more important not to neglect this opportunity of affording relief to the Levant trade, as the dues, which the company was authorised to levy, were very considerable, amounting to a tax not much short of two per cent. upon the whole of that trade; a charge quite sufficient, in these times, to divert a considerable part of it from the shipping of this country to that of other states. It was due to the noble Lord (Grenville) at the head of the Levant Company, to state, that, as soon as this subject was brought under his consideration, he manifested the greatest readiness to assist the views of Government in respect to the proposed changes. Nothing less was to be expected from this distinguished individual, who, in his dignified retirement, still interested himself, with the feelings of a statesman, and the wisdom of a philosopher, in the progress of those sound commercial principles, which, in their application, had already conferred so much benefit upon this country. The noble Lord called together the Company over which he presided, and proposed to them a voluntary surrender of the charter which they had enjoyed for two hundred years. In the most praiseworthy manner, the company acquiesced in the suggestion. His Majesty would be advised to accept the surrender so tendered; but it could not be carried into effect without an act of parliament. Among other requisite arrangements to be provided for by the bill, would be the transfer of a fund which the company had accumulated out of their revenue, and the abolition of the taxes by which that revenue was produced.—He had now travelled over the wide field of the alterations, which he undertook to submit to the committee, in the commercial concerns of this country. He wished that his statement, to many members of the house comparatively uninteresting, had been more perspicuous, for the sake of those who had paid attention to this subject. He was desirous to bring it under consideration, before the recess, in order that the details might be dispassionately and generally considered by the several interests, throughout the country, which were likely to be affected by the measures now proposed. They were open to alterations, and to amendment. He should be happy to pay every attention, in his power, to whatever suggestions might be transmitted to him, from any quarter, for that purpose. All he asked now of the committee was, to take under their protection, the comprehensive principle of the system which he had ventured to recommend, and that, so far, they would look upon it as a state measure, connected with the public prosperity. If, to this extent, it should receive their steady countenance and support, the session would not close without their having proved to this, as well as to other countries, that they had not lost sight of the recommendation from the throne—to remove as much, and as fast as possible, all unnecessary restrictions upon trade (hear, hear). He concluded by moving a resolution, “That it was the opinion of the committee, that all duties upon the several articles hereafter to be named, should cease and determine, and others be substituted in their room.”

Mr. Alderman Thompson complained that in consequence of his avowal in that house, that the British iron trade was in no danger from foreign competition, it had been insinuated that he had some sort of understanding upon the subject with the rt. hon. gent. Now to this he would reply, that he had, neither directly nor indirectly, communicated with him upon the subject, until he had heard his public statement in that house (hear, hear, from Mr. Huskisson). He hoped that he was not ignorant of his own private affairs, or of his public duty; and on the question of the iron trade, he was prepared to repeat, that he did not think foreign competition (although he admitted its tendency to lower the price) would reduce the value of the article below a fair remunerating price.

Sir H. Vivian admitted the value of many of the new commercial principles upon which government were about to act, although he could not concur in all the details of their operation: for instance, he must protest against the proposed alteration of the foreign copper duties, which, if carried into effect, would ruin the mining trade of Cornwall. There was a capital engaged in the copper mines of above 2,440,000*l.*, which gave employment to from 70,000 to 100,000 people. It was, he thought, capable of demonstration, that if they let in the foreign copper from South America, for instance, upon this trade, the British mines must be ruined, from the greater expence incurred by them in working the material.

Sir M. W. Ridley, though he agreed with the main principles propounded by the rt. hon. gent. did not approve of all his details. With respect to the alteration of the duty on foreign bottles, he ought to recollect the peculiar disadvantages under which the British trader in the article laboured from the injurious competition which that trader had of late years endured, from the new calling that had sprung up of dealing in second-hand bottles (a laugh). But if, in addition to this inconvenience, the foreign bottles were to be sent into the second-hand market, then the British manufacturer would be entirely outdone. The article of kelp entered considerably into the manufacture of glass, and the duty was so high upon it at present, that the bottle manufacturers were obliged to make use of Scotch kelp, which was of a very inferior quality. This called for the rt. hon. gent.'s attention.

Mr. Baring expressed his satisfaction at the adoption of the leading principles of that commercial system which government now professed to support. He was aware that such great changes could not be effected without materially affecting existing private interests; but this must always occur when they were returning to sound principles. A peculiar service, as it was called, to one interest, led to the same benefit to another, until the whole system became at length artificial and injurious to the community; and what he most approved in the rt. hon. gent.'s proposed alterations was, that they went upon general principles, without regarding private interests. Those would of course oppose whatever they thought interfered with their own particular views: for instance, they had already heard claims put in for specific exemption on the part of several manufactures. A gallant officer (Sir H. Vivian) had touched upon the copper trade as being unfairly affected in comparison with others. Upon this allusion, all he (Mr. B.) should at present say was, that so far from thinking copper had been unfairly pressed upon, and particularly in comparison with iron, he thought that the Cornish miners had been knocking at the door of the Treasury, and had succeeded in securing for themselves an unequal advantage (a laugh).

Mr. Littleton expressed the greatest apprehension for the potteries of Staffordshire, if the rt. hon. gent.'s plan were carried into effect. He entreated the rt. hon. gent. to allow the hardware trade a hearing before he passed his bills through the house. He had also to complain, in the strongest manner, in behalf of the manufacturers of earthenware. It was well known that the manufacturers had lately made great improvements in the article of ornamental china, which, he feared, would not be able to endure competition with the French upon the suggested plan.

Mr. Gapps dreaded the effect of lowering the duties on woollen goods from 50 to 15 per cent. The British fabrics, burdened with heavier charges in every way, could not compete with the foreign articles; and at 15 per cent., large quantities of woollen goods, especially coarse woollens, must find their way to British consumers. He wished that the rt. hon. gent. would begin with lowering them 30 per cent. in the first instance.

Sir E. Fergusson agreed in the propriety of doing away the prohibitory duties: but the proceeding should be of a cautious nature. Every thing should be done to sink the charges of the raw material. How else could British linens, for example, compete with those of Germany, and the new manufactures at New Orleans, both of which must produce them cheaper? He strongly pressed upon the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the necessity of reducing the duties on hemp and flax, and allowing hemp to be mingled with the poorer flax, to make bagging for bringing home cotton.

Mr. H. Parnell thought, that at 35 per cent. duty, Irish linens would be able to compete with foreign, especially if Irish agricultural produce were admitted free into the English market.

Mr. Huskisson rose to correct an error which had arisen on the subject of copyright. No one could bring in copies printed abroad without being subject to an action for damages upon every copy of a copyright publication. It was true that the works of the "Great Unknown" were printed and sold in every city of Germany and France. He had seen them at Frankfurt in every bookseller's shop. But there could be no danger from this circumstance to the property of a copyright. With respect to other books, it was not for the interest of literature, or for the advantage of genius, that books should be kept out of the English market, because they could be printed cheaper abroad. All that could be asked would be an equivalent for the superior charges to which the British trade was subjected by the tax on the materials.—With respect to the duty on copper, concerning which some apprehension had been expressed, as if he threatened to return to the same subject next year, he had been mistaken. His meaning was, that if the price of copper should be kept up by the 5*th* duty, and the market continue closed against foreign copper, that then the duty must be lowered still further, until the foreign copper could enter the English market; and he was convinced that this would prove beneficial to the mining interests of Cornwall.

Mr. W. Beane thought that the manufacturers of iron of the first quality might be injured by this change of duty; but it would have the effect of improving the manufacture of iron of the lower quality. Although this alteration as in other cases, might be productive of some partial loss to individuals, yet to the public it would produce an enormous advantage.

Mr. J. Bennett trusted there would be no objection on the part of Government to repeal the existing duties on the export of wool (bear); and he hoped, also, that the duties on the export of yarn would be lowered. At present, the export of yarn was very considerable, but that of wool was but trifling. He thought, also, that with a proper regard for the landed interest, the duty on imported corn might be safely lowered to precisely the ratio of difference between the expense of cultivation in this country and abroad; but it should not exceed that ratio.

Mr. Hume asked if it were the intention of Government to adopt any alteration in the timber duties? The rt. hon. gent. had stated his intention to alter the duty on imported Canadian corn—a change which he (Mr. Hume) highly approved of; and since these facilities had been given to the trade with that province, he thought the present time would be a very proper one for the reduction of the duties imposed for the protection of the Canadas on foreign timber (bear, hear).—He would take this opportunity to say, that highly beneficial as the discussion of that night must be, and important and valuable as the alterations of duty were that had been already proposed, all that had been done on this occasion would be as nothing to the people of England, compared with a careful and proper revision of the corn laws. He hoped, therefore, that his Majesty's government would forthwith take into their consideration the important benefit to be derived by the public from a change of system in this particular. As to the amount of the duty to be settled, provided only the legislature would establish sound principle on this important question, he cared not whether it were a duty of 10s. of 15s. or of 20s. per quarter. Being once in the right path, they would soon come to the proper scale of duty.

Mr. Huskisson reminded the house that he had not said one word to-night on the subject to which the hon. gent. (Mr. Hume) had just alluded; and he did not intend to do so (bear, hear). As to what had been said by the hon. member (Mr. Bennett), he thought there would be no objection to some such arrangement about the duty on wool as the hon. gent. proposed. As to altering the duty on yarn, however, he should feel considerable difficulty; for yarns, under the present duty, went out of the country to a large amount. As to the iron trade, which another member had spoken about, the fact was, that the present duty on old iron was 17s. 6d. per ton. This sort of iron was that which in the trade was known by the designation of scrap iron, and the duty in question he should propose to reduce to 12s. 6d. a ton. If he were to make too great a difference between the duties on the two sorts of iron, there would be an endeavour to bring all the species under the operation of the duty affecting this inferior description. With regard to the timber-trade, the hon. gent. (Mr. Hume) must recollect that Canadian timber, considering that it grew in one of our own colonies, and was therefore transported in our own ships, was a valuable trade to Great Britain: and as a further argument why the existing duties should not be further reduced, he would observe, that there was no trade which, by reason of increased demand, had lately attained a more improved and prosperous condition than the trade in Baltic timber.

The house then resumed, &c.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.—The house having resolved itself into a committee on the Consolidated Custom Duties bill,

Mr. Huskisson begged to remind the committee of his motion on the 25th of March last, tending to effect important changes in our system of duties and customs, and applying, not only to the manufactures of this country, but to manufactured articles imported from foreign states. In effecting such extensive alterations in a system which had existed so many years, he had felt desirous of availing himself of all the light and experience that could aid him in so arduous an undertaking; and he had accordingly invited the suggestions of all practical and intelligent men who might be willing to afford him the benefit of their counsel and information. That invitation was very generally accepted, and no person, he believed, who had filled his situation, had ever been engaged in a more extensive correspondence than himself, had received more numerous deputations, or had been a party at more conferences than he had received and met at the Board of Trade since those alterations were first announced in parliament (a laugh). The committee would not be surprised to hear this, because it must be evident that many individuals, and many separate interests, would be seriously affected, or would consider themselves to be so at any rate, by the operation of such changes. Having now, therefore, heard, as he might assume, all that could be said upon the subject of those alterations by all parties interested in their operation; he now came to indicate to the committee how far he had subsequently modified those resolutions which he had introduced on the former evening. The alterations he had propounded to the committee in the beginning of the session were founded upon the best information he could obtain, and the most mature deliberation he could bestow upon the subject; and in the most extensive branches of our foreign manufactures and commerce he had been able, upon the result of all the increased knowledge that he had arrived at in respect of them, since he first proposed the alterations of duties in question, to adhere to his original resolutions. In the great article of all, for example,—foreign manufactured cotton goods,—he did not mean to propose any alteration, but should reduce the old duty to an ad valorem one of 10 per cent. He proposed also to adhere to the duty of 15 per cent. on woollens; and the proposed duties upon all metallic substances would remain unaltered, excepting in the article of lead. After much inquiry concerning the variable price of that metal, which was so essential in many branches of domestic improvement in this country—as in building, for example—he should propose a further reduction of the duty than that he had already submitted. In the extensive article of earthenware, he proposed to retain the duties on the footing already recommended. But in the duties upon some other branches of our manufactures, he had deemed it necessary—but not without considerable regret—to introduce some modifications. There were some branches of our linen-manufactures on which he had originally proposed an ad valorem duty of

25 per cent.; but upon which, after having since heard the representations of all the parties who had been examined before the Board of Trade upon the subject, he was now disposed to think it might be expedient to change that duty. There were several circumstances connected with this particular manufacture that were necessary to be taken into consideration—such as that in Ireland it was conducted by manual labour alone, he might say, without the intervention of any machinery. In respect of linens, therefore, it might be described as a competition between labour and labour that must subsist between those which were made at home and those which were manufactured abroad. But again, with regard to Ireland, the interests of which every hon. gent. must look to with peculiar anxiety and favour, it was to be observed that a great change was effecting in her linen manufacture, for machinery was now rapidly introducing itself into that branch of her trade, and a great proportion of capital was coming gradually into circulation in that country; and had the foreign manufacture been admitted at the lower duty which he had originally proposed, it was feared that many impediments might have opposed themselves to the progress of the improving commerce; the consequence of which would probably have been that, losing its present advantages, the Irish linen trade might never have been able to meet its foreign competitors; that this manufacture would not only not have arrived upon any favourable terms in other markets, but might have been lost to Ireland altogether—(hear, hear). It seemed to him, therefore, that by the adoption of a scale of duties on linens, to be lowered in the course of eight years from their present amount to the point he had formerly fixed, the committee, without discouraging the capital now engaged in that branch of our national industry, might enable the home manufacture to rival, in a short period, the foreign, in the foreign market. He had thought proper to suggest a further alteration of duty on glass. That article was subject to a heavy excise. He should propose a similar alteration in the duty on paper. That manufacture was also subject to excise duties. There were some circumstances that operated materially on the manufacture and price of foreign paper, the most important of which was, that in some cases the exportation of the raw material to this country was virtually prohibited. For example, the exportation of rags was entirely prohibited by the revenue laws of France and of the Netherlands. The consequence was, that its exportation being forbidden, those countries could manufacture paper cheaper, whilst we manufactured it, perhaps, dearer than any other people. Another article to be noticed was the importation of books. At present, no books could be imported of which there was a copyright in this country, or which had been published in Great Britain within twenty years; though individuals were not prevented from bringing them into this country, if they were not for the purpose of sale, but for private use. But he thought it would not be prejudicial to the bookselling interest, if, instead of continuing the heavy duty at present payable on imported books, 6*l.* 10*s.* per cwt. he named a lower one; and he had therefore determined to reduce it to 1*l.* This duty operated, at present, upon those books which formed the bulk of almost every library; and the reduction, therefore, might tend, perhaps, in no inconsiderable degree, to advance the cause of literature, and the diffusion of knowledge. Not to weary the committee, he would pass over altogether a great variety of articles, comprising amongst others the raw materials of several manufactures; which he had also made the subjects of similar alterations of duty. On flax and tallow he proposed to effect a still further reduction. He had proposed to lower the duties on barilla by a scale of gradual reduction; but he had since learned from the parties interested in its importation, that when about two years ago some alteration was made in those duties, it was understood that no further change would be made in them for five years after that period. He should now suggest that after the five years had elapsed the proposed system of reduced duty should be acted on. Other duties that it was highly material to the public convenience to alter, were those on timber. It had been found impossible to prevent the duties on timber from being evaded. The timber duty upon every 1,050 cubic feet was 55*s.*; and 4*l.* upon every 125 planks. Now, people had lately contrived to cut the planks of such a size and thickness, that one of them, though it could not be measured as solid timber, would afterwards yield many planks; a plank of this thickness, therefore, would only pay a duty of 16*s.* 8*d.* perhaps, which was to all intents and purposes, as to the duty, solid timber. He should therefore propose such an alteration as would bring planks of these large dimensions within the description of solid timber. Upon revising the alterations suggested in the resolutions which he had formerly submitted, he had added a great many articles. Among the important ones was a reduction on the duty of ships built in the colonies, if broken up here. By a strange oversight of the law, such ships were subject to a duty of not less than 50 per cent., if broken up in this country. This duty was the cause that a very large and unwieldy ship, that had been built at Canada, and had arrived some time since in the port of London, was not broken up here, as was intended, but sent back to Canada. That duty he proposed to reduce to 15 per cent. The duty on pepper was at present about 500 per cent. on the value—an enormous disproportion that must effect either a diminished consumption or be an incentive to smuggling. The original cost was about 5*d.* per lb. The whole consumption of the united kingdom was not more than 1,200,000 lb. a-year, which did not exceed a proportion of about an ounce and a quarter to every individual of our population. This duty he would reduce from 2*s.* 6*d.* per lb. to 1*s.* This arrangement he should hope would rather encourage the consumption of an article of East India produce. At present he would only add, that the committee was not to be considered as coming to any final adjudication on all the reductions that it was proposed to effect in our present system of duties.

Sir H. Parnell said, that he did not see the necessity of so high a rate of duty as that contained in the schedule being imposed for the protection of the cotton manufacture. While they had extensive capital, and a great variety of machinery in the manufacture, the idea of competition with this country was futile. They paid high wages, they also paid a duty on the raw material; but still, such was the perfection of our machinery, that foreign nations could not compete with us. It was a mistake to argue that high wages were always productive of high prices—a position which the late Mr. Ricardo had successfully combatted. After mentioning many other items, in which he conceived a further reduction of duty might have been effected, he observed that he was anxious to make way for the thorough reform in our commercial system which he hoped would speedily be effected, and which, he was sure, would tend greatly to the extension of our manufactures. In the rt. hon. gent's plan, however, many articles were burdened with duties which should have gone entirely free. For instance, bacon, butter, beef, and pork, were marked down at a certain rate of duty. He had hoped, as new circumstances had arisen, as new principles had been promulgated, in consequence of the labours of Mr. Ricardo and others, that this part of the subject, which was connected with a rise in the price of food, and a consequent rise in the rate of wages, would be treated in a more liberal manner. Nothing was so impolitic as to lay heavy duties on the necessities of life (hear, hear). If more of the heavier duties had been removed, there would have been no necessity for the bill which had been introduced for the prevention of smuggling. One of the clauses contained in it was as bad as the Irish insurrection act. He alluded to that which related to lurking, after sun-set, near the sea-shore. For this offence, a man might be taken into custody; than which nothing could be more oppressive. If the schedule of duties were put on a proper footing, there would be no necessity for any provision of this kind, since there would be no temptation for smuggling. He should make no further observations on the plan of the hon. gent.; but he hoped he would, as fast as possible, proceed with the repeal of those laws, which fettered the commerce of the country.

Mr. Mackery thought that the hon. bart. had not treated the plan of the right hon. gent. fairly. He had argued it on the general principle, instead of looking to the practicability of the proposed alterations. Of course the rt. hon. gent. could not immediately say what amount of relaxation should ultimately be extended to each manufacture. That would take up more than one, two, or three years. The rt. hon. gent. had submitted his plan in March last; and now, three months afterwards, having, in the meantime, given the question every consideration in his power, he stated to the house what he conceived to be at present a fair relaxation. It was entirely a question of expediency as to the time when, and the extent to which, those different duties should be reduced. The hon. bart. had objected that linen was to be protected by a duty of 25 per cent. But when he noticed this, he should have stated what the present protecting duty was. It was 100 per cent., and that was to be reduced gradually to 25 per cent. Now, in removing this protection, what course had the rt. hon. gent. taken? He saw that the manufacture involved the interests of many parties, and therefore he found it expedient to relax the protecting duty by degrees, and eight years were given for that purpose. The rt. hon. gent. had placed but a small protecting duty on the cotton manufacture, in consequence of the extensive use of machinery in that trade. That, however, was not the case with the linen trade. But it was hoped, that in 7 or 8 years, by the introduction of machinery, this fabric might be manufactured thirty or forty per cent. cheaper than at present, and therefore this course had been taken. Time ought to be given for this plan to be carried into effect, especially as the application of machinery to spinning flax must, of necessity, be much more slow than its application to the spinning of cotton. It was considered, by competent judges, that, when the plan was matured, the linen manufactured by the aid of machinery, would be 60 or 70 per cent. better than that manufactured in the ordinary way. The hon. gent. concluded by pronouncing an eulogium on the Board of Trade. The rt. hon. gent. who presided over that important department, and whose labours were gratuitous, ought, he conceived, to be liberally rewarded for the performance of his duties in that office, and not, as at present, derive his salary from another and a subordinate situation (the Treasuryship of the Navy), where his duty was scarcely more than that of a paymaster. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take the case of his rt. hon. colleague into serious consideration (hear, hear).

Mr. C. Ellison recommended a reduction of the general duty on coals, and on the exportation of coals from the port of Newcastle.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had not overlooked the subject alluded to by the hon. member for Newcastle, but the difficulties which stood in the way had prevented him from doing as much as he had contemplated. A great reduction had, however, been effected; the duty on coals carried coastwise, had been reduced to 3s. per chaldron, and to 1s. per chaldron on coals of particular dimensions. He had been told that this latter sort of coal, being unable to bear the duty, was consumed at the pits' mouth, and in fact almost wasted. He was induced to diminish the duty on this account, and because he thought it might be made very useful in manufactories, and as fuel for the poor classes of the people. He flattered himself with the hope of carrying the principle on which these alterations were made, still farther, but he could not do so until the result of the present experiment had been ascertained. He was afraid of having too many irons in the fire, lest he should not be able to get some of them out. He trusted that the day would soon arrive when no article in the schedule would stand at too high a duty for the commercial interests of the country. In the mean time he thought his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) had done as much as could be expected in one session (hear, hear).

Mr. Hume wished also, that instead of the duty on non-enumerated articles, there should be a power in the Privy Council to impose such duties as circumstances should hereafter suggest.

Mr. Huskisson would be happy to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Hume) of vesting a discretionary power in the Privy Council; but the hon. member was aware that the House of Commons was always extremely jealous of adding to the prerogatives of the Crown. When the house recollected all that he and his rt. hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had done, extending the principles of free trade within the last two sessions more than had been done for a century before, he thought they ought not to be found fault with if they had not adopted every suggestion which had been thrown out.

The report of the bill was ordered to be brought up to-morrow.

(This bill was afterwards moved in the House of Lords, by the Earl of Liverpool, but excited, in its progress, no discussion of any interest.)

Oil Trade.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.—The Hon. W. Gordon presented a petition from the owners of shipping (employed in the whale fishery) in Aberdeen. They prayed that the duties might be continued that were now levied on foreign oil imported into Great Britain. The bounties having been withdrawn from our own fishery, and the duties now in force upon the importation of foreign oil being about to be withdrawn also, it was obvious that the effect of all this upon our own oil-trade must be most injurious, although it had formerly been deemed the best policy of Government to protect it as a trade that provided the best nursery for our seamen.

Mr. Huskisson said, if he were called upon shortly to state the absurdity of the existing system on which this trade was established, so far as regarded the payment of duties, he should state it in this manner—that we imposed a duty on the importation of an article, for the production of which we allowed a bounty. Now as the bounty was withdrawn on this article, the duty ought to be remitted; or if retained, retained at the lowest rate possible. With respect to what had been said about the duty on foreign rape-seed, he could assure hon. gentlemen, that that duty never had been imposed with any reference to the whale fishery. It was imposed during the severest pressure of agricultural distress, at the suggestion of some gentlemen, who, thinking that the whole land of England was going out of cultivation, endeavoured to devise means for retaining it in culture, and proposed the cultivation of rape-seed with that view; but he did not believe that the two descriptions of oil that had been alluded to were used for the same or similar purposes.—Whale-oil was employed for the purpose of burning, &c.; rape-seed-oil, for dressing cloth. Probably, indeed, at times, the one might happen to be so dear that it might be necessary to use the other as a substitute for it; and thus it was represented as one of the grievances of the cloth trade, that whale oil had been used instead of rape, to the great disparagement of the manufacture, but in consequence of the dearness of rape-oil. However, he agreed with the hon. member for Hull, that the proposed arrangement in respect of the duty on imported foreign oil should be so managed as to bear with the least possible severity on individuals in that trade. He had imagined that by allowing till next January, he had afforded a sufficient time for this purpose; but perhaps it might be beneficial to reduce the duty in January next only one half, and the remaining half in six months afterwards.

Mr. Hume stated, that in consequence of the alarm that had been excited in this trade by the approaching remission of the duty on imported foreign oil, oil had within these few days fallen 5l. per ton. He agreed with the rt. hon. gent. who had just sat down, that nothing could be more absurd, than that a duty of this kind should ever have been imposed at all: but he recommended, under all circumstances, that the whole duty be continued until January twelvemonth, as in the mean time fresh cargoes would have been received that might be disposed of probably with advantage to the trade.

Mr. Frankland Lewis, as chairman of the committee in which this duty was originally proposed, disclaimed all concurrence in the proposition. He had been asked to bring in the bill, but had refused to do so; and was now rejoiced at the conduct he had pursued on that occasion. The petition was then read.

Exportation of Machinery.

THURSDAY, FEB. 24.—Mr. Hume moved for the re-appointment of the committee on the exportation of machinery. This was a question of great importance. The custom-house officers declared, that it was impossible to carry the law, as it now stood, into effect; they were unable to determine, in many cases, what was, and what was not, a prohibited article. Machinery was now smuggled out of the country to a very considerable amount. France encouraged this practice as far as she could; and we ourselves sustained a loss of revenue by it. Again, the grossest errors of judgment had been committed in the selection of articles to be prohibited. He was informed, that a great number of instruments forbidden to be exported, on the plea of great nicety being necessary to construct them, were, in fact, so simple, that they were made by boys only, and learners in the trade. The prohibition, as it existed, produced an immense loss to individuals. One machinist alone, Mr. Bramah, of Piccadilly, had lost 100,000l. which he might have gained, if he had been allowed to export his hydraulic presses. He had no doubt that he should adduce, in the committee, such evidence as would convince the most scrupulous minds of the propriety of repealing the present restrictions; for, however desirous he was that the measure should be carried, he would not wish it to be carried in despite of a universal prejudice.

Mr. Huskisson rose to give his support to the motion. He admitted, that where laws were in existence, which were evaded in every possible way, the propriety of their continuance might be doubtful. Satisfied as he was, that an adherence to the strict letter of the law would be injudicious, he had taken it upon himself to advise the permission to export certain articles of machinery, such as hydraulic presses, and some other machines of that description. So great was the present demand for machinery, in many branches, that the orders now in hand could not be executed for many months to come, with all hands that could be procured; and some establishments were completely at rest from a dearth of labour. He would observe in conclusion, that without pledging himself to support the whole of what the committee might recommend, he cordially concurred in its appointment; and he hoped, that the hon. mover would take an active part in endeavouring to ascertain what were, and what were not, the interests which might be affected by the bill.—Committee appointed.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.—Mr. Littleton had a petition to present, which was entitled to serious consideration, from the artisans of Nottingham, against the repeal of the laws which prohibited the exportation of machinery. The hon. member read long extracts from the petition, which, he stated, to have been drawn up by the petitioners themselves, and as affording an admirable proof of their intelligence and reasoning powers. It stated, with great circumstantiality and clearness, the history and progress of machinery in this country, and the immense advantages which its exclusive possessions conferred on this country; advantages shared by the agriculturists, as the manufacturers were thence enabled to purchase their produce at a much higher rate than they would otherwise have done. If the law which had operated hitherto with so much advantage were now to be repealed, the country would have to rue such an experiment, for it would necessarily drive artisans to accompany their machinery to foreign states, as a residence in their own country, with the necessities of life at a high price, and exposed to foreign competition, which such a measure would unavoidably increase, would become impossible. The hon. member enforced the prayer of this petition, and thought, that if any alteration of the law were intended, it ought to be left in the power of the Board of Trade to licence or prohibit the export of particular machines.

Mr. Huskisson entirely concurred in the serious nature of the subject. But the continuance of the old laws, to which the artisans attached so much importance, was inconsistent with the more liberal policy in trade which the country had recently adopted. Still, however, he would by no means recommend any serious alteration, without hearing the opinions of those practical men who ought, perhaps, to be the best judges of what seemed most likely to affect their interests in several trades. It would be well for the committee to hear all the information, which practical men were capable of affording upon the subject, and then they could enlighten each other on the general topics which such a consideration involved. He would press on the notice of the house, that they had to a great extent acted upon the principle of the free circulation of labour, and it would be difficult as well as inexpedient to make a stop in the case of machinery, particularly when the law of patents in this country so nearly resembled that in France and the Netherlands, the countries of which the artisans were most jealous. When an artisan took out a patent in England, he mostly provided himself with the same safeguard in these two states. He was disposed, considering the great alarm which pervaded the manufacturing interests on this subject, to treat the matter with as much caution as possible, and by no means to act without further and fuller inquiry. He could not, however, concur in his hon. friend's recommendation of referring the subject to the Board of Trade; that Board had already more than enough business on its hands; not to mention, that the proposed function would be one for which, as at present constituted, they were totally unfit.

Mr. Hume said, that all parties should be fully heard before the law was altered, although nothing had occurred to alter the opinion he had long formed, that these laws should be made to partake of the general improvement in the principles and policy of trade. Still he meant not to press a repeal, in the present state of alarm. When they went into the inquiry respecting the causes of the advancement of the national trade, he apprehended it would be difficult to sustain the opinion that the improvement of machinery was entitled to the exclusive place in which some artisans had placed it. It was, however, remarkable that no artisan was found to deprecate universally the export of machinery, so that steps might be taken to classify such articles for which an embargo was unnecessary. It was also desirable to ascertain how far it was in the power of the Custom-house officers to execute these prohibitory laws; for those who evaded them could transmit the machine in different parts, and from different ports, in forms very difficult of detection. For instance, steam-engines could be exported; and when these were sent out in separate parts, other machines could be with equal facility sent out with them. He wished artisans to consider how many thousands would obtain a livelihood in the manufacture of machines for exportation. The Board of Trade could now, contrary to law, give permission to export certain machines: this power should be legalized, and made more general. The committee would report in the present session, and early in the ensuing, might consider what further steps they ought to take.

Mr. Baring entirely concurred in the propriety of pausing while so much alarm existed; still he thought that nine-tenths of these machines might be exported without detriment to any British manufacture. At all events, a discretionary power might be left somewhere, to permit what ought to be exported, and what ought not. It could no where be assigned with greater advantage to the country than to the Board of Trade, the arduous duties of which were so ably and beneficially discharged at this time by the President and Vice-President.

Mr. Lawley was convinced that the manufacturing interests would approve of such a proposition, from the manner in which they always found their business had been attended to by that Board.

Mr. Phillips praised the conduct of the petitioners, and strongly recommended their opinions to the consideration of the house. He was sure it would answer every purpose, to except from the prohibition such machines as could with safety be exported.

Ordered to be printed.

Navigation Laws.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.—Upon the question of the third reading of the Consolidated Custom Duties bill,

Mr. Robertson took occasion to call the attention of the house to the great decrease of shipping in this, and its increase in other countries, in consequence of the changes in our old navigation laws. From papers which were printed and before the house, it appeared that the increase of foreign shipping engaged in the Baltic trade with us, since the removal of those restraints which formerly existed, was no less than 150,000 tons; and the decrease of British shipping trading to the ports of those vessels was 28,000 tons (hear). The major part of the foreign commerce of this country, which formerly was confined exclusively to British bottoms, was now transacted in foreign vessels (hear). That trade now employed British shipping, 660,000 tons; foreign ditto, 680,000 (hear, hear). Only twelve years ago, what would have been thought of a statement that such was the condition of our trade? How would gentlemen have been alarmed if it had been stated that our foreign commerce was carried on by vessels of other nations than our own (hear, hear)? It was true that our coasting trade was flourishing, and, including that of Ireland, employed a tonnage of near 1,000,000 tons. But the trade with the United States exhibited alarming appearances: we had only 42,000 tons employed in it, whilst the Americans had 126,000 tons. Let it be remembered that the United States possessed an equal share with ourselves of the trade with the Continent; with a large coasting trade carried on in her own vessels upon her own coasts. If the rt. hon. gent. who so warmly advocated those fatal alterations in our commercial policy had wished to devise a project the most hostile to the future welfare of our trade, he could not have hit upon a more efficient one. He had been forcibly impressed with this truth the other night, on hearing the rt. hon. gent.'s (Mr. Huskisson) speech, on the Customs' Bounties bill. It appeared from that speech, that we imported from the Baltic, flax, hemp, and timber, charged with duty: the two first our manufacturers converted into canvass and cordage. We allowed them a bounty on the exportation of that cordage and canvass to foreign ports, where they would be used for the rigging and equipment of foreign ships. Whilst the same manufactures, if employed for the use of our own shipping, were charged with a heavy duty (hear, hear). The same inconsistency was observable in respect of the timber trade. The Government had imposed a duty upon the importation of timber of which our ships were built, while in our own ports, to foreign vessels built with timber that had paid no such duties, they gave equal advantages, and placed them on an equal footing with our own; thereby putting British vessels in a worse situation than the others. Was there any possibility of our competing with them under these circumstances? The fatal effects of the new order of things might not, perhaps, be much felt for some years; but supposing this increase in foreign shipping, and decrease in our own to continue, and the trade of the United States to go on enlarging itself, what was to become of us in the event of a war? Our greatness depended on our navy; and in the decay of its strength was involved the failure of our own (hear, hear). In the same spirit the rt. hon. gent. had said on a former evening, that if our seamen chose to enter into such combinations as some of them had engaged in recently, we must employ foreigners; and that if the shipwrights persevered in similar connexions, our merchants must take up foreign shipping. How would our ancestors have spurned a proposition like this!—He sat down with seriously requesting every hon. gent. to reflect on the actual state of our naval resources (hear).

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.—Mr. Huskisson on moving the third reading of the Ships' Registry bill, said he had two clauses to propose by way of riders. It was well known that by the navigation laws, as they now stood, British ships were not allowed to repair in foreign ports, unless the master or owners declared that such repairs were absolutely necessary for the safe performance of the voyage; and then the repairs were limited to what was barely necessary for that purpose. It was also a part of these laws that no British ship should proceed on a voyage, out or home, unless three-fourths of her crew consisted of British seamen. These were regulations which he did not wish to destroy; but circumstances were now in operation, which rendered the enforcement of these provisions injurious to the commerce of the country. At this moment the merchant service, particularly in the port of London, were put to great inconvenience, by combinations among the shipwrights, not relating to wages (for with those the men were satisfied) but from an objection taken by them to particular regulations in the yards. The consequence was, that for some months past no ships were repaired in the river. He was the last man to propose any measure which might be an infringement on our navigation laws, but those laws would be injurious, if allowed to prevent the remedy of so great an evil as that to which he alluded. It was the duty of the legislature to show the workmen, who thought that they must succeed, as they had the power of refusing to work, that this evil might be remedied by allowing ships to proceed for repair to some foreign port. They imagined, that as the law now stood, they must succeed, and indeed he had heard of its being declared amongst them, that the present struggle should be a trial between capital and physical strength. He would therefore propose a clause—that for two years the King in council should have the power, on representation of the inability to obtain repairs in a British port, owing to any combinations among shipwrights, to allow British ships to be taken for repairs to a foreign port. This, he had no doubt, would teach those deluded men that they were injuring only themselves, and that no conduct of theirs could deprive the merchant service of protection. A species of combination no less injurious to our commerce prevailed among merchant-seamen, particularly in the northern ports, in Shields, Newcastle, and other places, by which vessels were prevented from going to sea from want of a sufficient number of British seamen. To remedy this, he would move another clause—giving power to the King in council, on proper representation, to allow British ships to clear out from our ports with a larger portion of their crews consisting of foreigners than was at present allowed.

Mr. Ellis concurred in the proposition, and only regretted that the principle was not carried further, by making the law general; for he could not see on what ground British merchants should be prevented from taking their ships to any port where they might get them repaired at the cheapest rate. As to the combinations among the merchant-seamen, he thought it would prove a benefit to the country; for at present many ships were principally worked by apprentices, which, in the course of a few years, would add greatly to the number of able seamen.

Mr. Robertson said, that the course now proposed would have the effect of driving our shipwrights to America, from whence we should not be able to recall them in time of need. In the same manner it would affect the seamen. It was intended to increase the competition with our seamen by enlarging the permission to employ foreign sailors in British ships. By some recent measures, the ships of all nations were permitted, in a great degree, to come into competition with our own; and these, which would have the effect of preventing the merchant from paying the sailor the wages to which he was accustomed, were to be followed up by an enactment which would drive him out of the service altogether. He would willingly enforce the combination laws, and put down all attempts to procure higher wages by such illegal means; but he could not shut his eyes to the fact, that the working classes, the mechanics and artisans, were badly treated by the legislature. There seemed a disposition in the house to grind and oppress those people (cries of no, no). He repeated the assertion. The recent measures by which the trades of the Continent were allowed to enter into competition with our own, had no other tendency. The effect of these impolitic regulations had already been felt in the diminution of the carrying trade. The tonnage of the British vessels which sailed from our ports had been considerably reduced. It was less this year by some hundred thousand tons than it had been some few years back.

Mr. Hume said that the hon. member had mistaken the principle of the proposed clauses. Their object was to put down those pernicious combinations which tended so directly to injure the commerce of the country, by taking away an undue advantage afforded, by law, to the men. Let all parties have the same protection. For his part he was only sorry that the clauses did not go farther, and allow merchants to resort to foreign ports to build ships as well as to repair them. This would effectually teach those "clubs" and "unions" that their associations would in the result be highly injurious to themselves.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that a few facts would tend more to elucidate this subject than all the wrath of the hon. member who had stated, that in consequence of certain measures, there had latterly been a decrease in the number of British ships which cleared out from our ports. Now it appeared from a statement before him, that in 1817, there cleared out from the ports of Great Britain 9,593 British ships; since which time they progressively increased, and in the year 1825, so disastrous to British commerce and shipping, the number of British ships which left our ports was 11,731. The tonnage of British ships was greater last year, than in 1818, by 296,800 tons (hear, hear). In the year ending 1823, there were built and registered in our ports 780 merchant ships, measuring 67,144 tons; in 1823 the number built and registered was 847, burden 86,028 tons; and in the last year there were built and registered 1,011 ships, exceeding in the whole 100,000 tons. If this was ruin and destruction, might such destruction go on (hear).

Mr. Bright opposed the clauses, which, if necessary, should be made the subject of a separate measure, and not introduced in a bill with which they had no natural connexion.

Mr. Ellice expressed a hope that the right hon. gent. would, at no distant day, admit the principle of allowing merchants to repair their ships where they could get them done best and cheapest, as a general measure. There were now combinations of workmen, but there were also combinations of master shipwrights; and these were as bad for the merchant service as those of the workmen.

The clauses were then read a first, second, and third time, and agreed to.

The bill thus amended was passed.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Mr. Denison wished to ask the right hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson), a question of very great importance to the foreign trade of the country. Whether it was allowed to the ships of a different nation to import into this country the produce of another country? Whether the produce of one foreign country could be legally imported in ships of another, for consumption here?—For instance, whether a Swedish ship would be allowed to take a cargo to the Mediterranean to sell it there—and having taken in another lading in a French port, to bring that lading to this country? If that were the law, he conceived our merchants must labour under a considerable disadvantage; because the foreign vessel could be fitted out at much less expense than a British vessel.

Mr. Huskisson said, that ever since the Navigation laws were passed in the reign of Charles II., foreign produce was allowed to be imported into England, in ships of the country to which the articles belonged. There were some bulky articles to which this provision did not extend, such as timber, masts, tar, and several others, which were termed the enumerated articles. By an act brought in by Mr. Wallace in 1822, the enumerated articles were placed under a new provision. They might now be brought from the countries where they were grown in the ships of those countries or in British ships; and from any other countries where they were not grown, in ships of the countries where they happened to be so deposited. Thus masts could not be brought hither from Russia except by Russian or British ships; but if those masts found their way to Holland, or any other country in Europe, and were landed there, they might be brought to England in the ships of that country, or in British ships. Prior to the act of 1822 those enumerated articles could not be imported except in ships of this country. The general provision of the act of Charles II. was, that no article should be brought to England, except in British ships, or in ships of the country where it was grown. That act, which originally only applied to Europe, had been since extended to the United States.

Corn Laws.

Several petitions for and against a revision of the Corn Laws—the former from the manufacturing and commercial, the latter from the agricultural classes, were presented to both Houses, at various periods of the session. The following, however, was the first petition which gave rise to discussion on the subject:—

LORDS, MONDAY, APRIL 25.—A petition against any alteration in the Corn Laws having been presented by Lord Suffield,

The Earl of Lauderdale took the opportunity of asking the noble earl (Liverpool) whether it was the intention of government to propose any alteration in the corn laws during this session?

The Earl of Liverpool stated in reply, that their lordships must recollect, that the last time this subject was under the consideration of parliament was in 1822. Some alterations were then made in the system of 1815, and others were recommended, which had not been made. This was the state in which the question now stood. He certainly could not object to state in public what he often had declared in private—that some alteration in the present system was, in his opinion, necessary; and yet he was not prepared to go into the question during the present session, but hoped that it would be found convenient for their lordships to take it up in the course of the next, and to enter into it, in all its bearings. He stated this, that no uncertainty might continue on the subject, as that could only produce further agitation, and create a fluctuation in prices. Their lordships must not conceal from themselves this truth, that though the classes connected with land viewed the corn laws in a different light from those connected with trade, the true interests of all classes on this question were really the same. One class, however, looking to immediate interest, naturally wished to remove all restrictions on importation, while the other as naturally desired to raise the price of the commodity it produced. He had endeavoured to do his duty between these conflicting interests. There was, in his opinion, a difficulty in this question which he did not think had ever yet been fairly considered. No man could be more desirous than he was to see the trade of the country placed on the most liberal footing; but when commercial principles were applied to corn, obstacles arose which were not easily overcome. In all other kinds of manufacture, if a fixed protecting duty were imposed, it would be easy to abide by it. Whatsoever might be the state of the home supply at a particular time, things would at length come round, and the manufacture would find its level. But it was not so with respect to corn, because at however equitable a rate the duty might be fixed, still periods and seasons might occur in which no protecting duty whatever could be adhered to. In a time of great scarcity it could not be said to a starving population that they should pay any thing in addition to the natural price of corn. Still he thought some alteration in the present system indispensable on several grounds. The price of corn in this country was now nearly double what it was in 1815, when the present system was fixed. The argument used in making that arrangement was, that an importation price of 80s. was necessary to secure a reasonable profit on cultivation. This appeared to be by no means necessary now. In fact it could not be maintained, in consequence of the effect which it had on the value of labour. If he might venture to throw out a few observations, he would say that in making any future changes their lordships would have to proceed on one of three principles: 1st. They might simply alter the importation price, and in other respects retain the system; 2d. They might alter the existing system altogether, and adopting the recommendation of the committee of 1822, impose protecting duties with a maximum, beyond which importation should be perfectly free, and a minimum, under which none should be allowed; 3d. A general protecting duty might be fixed by which they would get rid of the system of averages, but which could not be resorted to without placing somewhere a discretionary power to remove the duty altogether in a time of scarcity. Much difficulty would be found in establishing a maximum or minimum with a fixed protecting duty. If, therefore, a fixed duty should be rejected, their lordships would have the option, either of adhering to the present system with an alteration of the import price, or establishing a system of protecting duties with a maximum and minimum; or else of taking a maximum and minimum without any protecting duty. He knew not whether he had made himself intelligible, but he thought it right to lay before the house the different systems which it was likely their lordships would have to discuss. He must now repeat, that it was not his intention to propose any alteration in the corn laws during the present session. He did not know, however, but that one particular part of the present system might sooner be brought under their lordships' consideration—he meant the question relating to the bonded corn which had been and still was in warehouses. That branch of the system had already undergone some alteration with respect to Canada corn. With regard to the other bonded corn, those members of the landed interest whom he had consulted on the subject were favourable to the contemplated alteration. As to the general question, he certainly could not think it right to enter on its consideration at this late period of the session; but, aware that it must in due time come under consideration, he was anxious to put the house in possession of his views and feelings on the subject.

The Marquis of Lansdown concurred in much of what had fallen from the noble earl; at the same time he must observe, that the result of many deliberate and serious reflections on this subject had brought him to the conclusion that it would be ultimately impossible for Parliament to continue the present system. He agreed with the noble earl as to the difficulty of fixing a duty which would not be found inconvenient in periods of scarcity or abundance; but at the same time he regarded such a plan as best calculated to prevent scarcity. It was true, they must first determine the average price which would afford a sufficient guarantee to the British cultivator, and next the average state of productiveness on the continent. He was sure that most erroneous notions prevailed as to the average cost and price of agricultural produce on the continent. In coming to a determination, it would be their lordships' duty to endeavour to conciliate all the interests in the country, and to take care that the balance should not incline too much to the one side or the other. Their great object should be, to arrive at something fixed and permanent; for, bad as the present system was, he would rather retain it with all its faults than change it for one still liable to fluctuation. It was obvious that if too high a price were fixed, the manufacturing interest would have just reason to complain of the dearth of provisions, which must raise the price of labour. If the price were fixed too low, the landed interest would be injured, and with it, as recent events had most strikingly proved, every other interest in the country would be seriously affected. On these grounds he could not too strongly impress on their lordships the necessity of looking to the establishment of a permanent law which would be capable of conciliating the interests of all the different classes of the empire.

The Earl of Lauderdale reminded their lordships, that while they were considering the subject, speculation would be at work. It was therefore necessary to delay their determination as little as possible, and to make the new system more permanent and certain than the present. The noble earl had stated, that under the present system corn was now in this country twice the price it sold for on the continent; but he should recollect, that although 80s. was the minimum price of 1815, corn had never since reached that price. During the existence of the arrangement, however, bread had never been at an unreasonable price. When their lordships considered that the present system.

under various modifications, had endured for more than a century, they could not be too cautious in departing entirely from it. He did not say that it was perfect; but it was one under which the agriculture of this country had long flourished. On this ground, he dreaded alteration. He dreaded it, because the situation of the landed interest was different from that of any other. Capital was embarked on land under leases of 21 years, and the value of that capital would be instantly affected by any alteration of the law.

The Earl of Liverpool fully agreed in the importance of a careful investigation, and that if a change of system were made, it should be as permanent as possible. But if they looked to the price of grain in this country and abroad for the last thirty years, they would find that nothing could be more varying. The variation in the weight of the taxation from the war average of 70,000,000*l.* to that of 50,000,000*l.* in time of peace, was another cause of fluctuation. The occurrence of another war might disturb all their present calculations. Besides, Prussia, Poland, and other countries, from which foreign corn was usually imported, were all poor; but as they increased in wealth and civilization, their power of supplying us would become less. In whatever way they might proceed, it appeared to him that they never could expect to obtain that certainty which would enable them to fix an unalterable price.

Lord King wished a determination to be come to on this subject as speedily as possible; for, in consequence of the agitation of the question, bargains between individuals must be at a stand till a settlement took place. He hoped that an understanding would be brought about between the landed interest and the manufacturers. Wheat in some of the continental ports was 18*s.*, but if the market was opened in this country it would rapidly rise perhaps to 56*s.* or 60*s.*; but, whatever might be the present price, great difficulty would be experienced in founding a fixed rate for importation. One great inconvenience of a high rate was, that when the ports were suddenly thrown open, an immense importation took place. Some measure, he thought, ought to be adopted to restrain the excessive importation which took place in such cases.

The Earl of Darnley thought their lordships should not be persuaded, during this mania for free trade, to change a system of so long standing, by the clamour for cheap bread. Those who asked for free trade, forgot that the agriculturists were their best customers.

COMMONS, MONDAY, APRIL 25. — Mr. T. Wilson rose to present a petition signed by a numerous and respectable body of the merchants, bankers, ship-owners, and other inhabitants of the city of London, amounting to upwards of 5,000 persons. The petition was the result of one of the most numerous and respectable public meetings that ever was convened. The meeting was so unanimous, that but a single hand was held up against two of the resolutions on which the petition was founded. The petitioners begged leave to express their opinion, that a high price of food, generally, as compared with the price of other countries, was a very great evil. It deprived the mass of the people of many comforts—it lowered the energy of labour in this country—it retarded the production of wealth—it had an injurious effect on commerce—and was prejudicial to the English character in foreign markets. They were also of opinion, that the constant variation in the price of corn was an evil scarcely less than the existence of extravagant prices themselves. Under the existing system, the people never could have the benefit of the growth of foreign countries until the article had reached a very high price here. In consequence, they had to pay nearly double the sum which ought to be paid for that article when imported, because the foreign prices were regulated by ours. There was another inconvenience produced by an extraordinary rise of price—corn then poured in from all quarters, the market was completely deluged with it, and it afterwards took four or five years to relieve the country from it. During this time the landed interest must bring their corn to market under circumstances of great disadvantage. They were compelled to sell it for what they could get, which would not be the case if there were a fair protecting duty, and the ports were allowed to be commonly open. Under these circumstances, the petitioners came to parliament to request that a more beneficial system should be pursued. They stated, that a fixed duty on the importation of corn appeared to them to be the most wise and efficacious measure that could be adopted. It was, they conceived, the only way in which a fair trade could be carried on; since it would get rid of the mischief to which the country was at present liable from fraudulent returns; and if the landed interest did not get such very high prices as they did from time to time, they would receive fair remunerating prices, and enjoy a steady market. The petitioners stated their belief, that the difference between the prices in one country and another afforded the best criterion of what a protecting duty should be. The petitioners wished such a duty to be levied as would allow corn to be sold at a fair price. They were by no means desirous that it should be so low as to induce a depression that would be injurious to the landowner. The petitioners observed, it might be supposed, by those who had not considered the subject, that the manufacturing interest was at variance with the landed interest. This they denied; and they declared their firm conviction, that the principles advocated by them, would, on the contrary, lead to an increase of trade which would be most beneficial to both parties. There was one circumstance which rendered it awkward, in his opinion, to bring this subject before the house at the present moment—he meant the prices were so low, that he feared the circumstance would stagger the feelings of some gentlemen. But it should be recollected, that for five or six years this country had not been open to the grain of the continent. There must, therefore, during that time, have been a great accumulation of corn; and it was no argument to say, because wheat was now at 20*s.* the quarter, that it would not rise to 30*s.* or 40*s.* when the ports were opened, and a part of the superfluity disposed of. If the landed gentlemen consulted their own interest, they would take the present time, when the manufacturing and mercantile system was in a course of revivion, and when agriculture was well paid, to assist in the alteration of the corn laws. To revert to the petitions, he feared that he had stated their opinions in an imperfect manner; but he hoped he had said enough to show that they were not hostile to the landed proprietors; but that they merely wished to remove a system which produced fraud and inconvenience.

Mr. Goock said, that if any subject in the world ought to be less tampered with than another, it was this. He would ask, was there a single petition on the subject of the corn laws before the hon. member (Mr. Whitmore) gave notice of his motion? Did not every class of his Majesty's subjects appear contented and happy? Did not his Majesty, in his gracious speech from the throne, declare that tranquillity and happiness reigned in every part of the country? If this were the case, he must call on the hon. member (Mr. Whitmore) to state a much stronger case than he had yet made out, before he could assent to the intended alteration (hear). He did not mean to say that the corn laws did not want revision (hear). But the time had not arrived. At present corn was only kept up to a fair price. He wished the city had let this question alone. If interference were necessary, the country gentlemen could act for themselves. At present, he believed, the workmen in the city received greater wages than they ever did. They had nothing to do on Sundays and Mondays but to stuff themselves with roast beef and plum-pudding (a laugh). To talk of poverty in the city, was all a mere humbug (a laugh). The agitation of this question had created a ferment throughout the country; and he had received many letters expressive of the great apprehensions that were entertained with respect to the proceedings of parliament. Individuals were afraid, if the system were altered, that they would be reduced to the same situation as that in which they were placed some years ago; and that they would be again borne down by the poor rates. He would say to the country gentlemen, that they would be duller

"Than the dull weed that rots on Lethe's wharf."

If they did not exert themselves on this occasion.

Mr. Huskisson said, that his Majesty's Government had no intention of proposing any revision of the corn laws in the present session. He would, however, suggest to parliament, at an early period of the next session, the propriety of entering on a general revision of those laws. At the same time he must state, that he had a proposition to submit to the house on a matter connected with this subject—he alluded to the wheat which was now shut up under bond. He thought it would be useful, even to that class of persons who objected to an alteration in the corn laws, if that wheat, under certain regulations, were suffered to come into the market.

Mr. Alderman Thompson wished to know, whether, if the corn laws were to be continued in their present state, the rt. hon. gent. meant to proceed with his bills for lowering the duties on foreign manufactures? When the price of corn was so high, it was impossible that British manufactures could come into fair competition with foreign fabrics.

Mr. Baring deprecated delaying the discussion on this subject. Whilst it remained undecided, no landlord could tell what his lease, what his agricultural property, was likely to be worth (hear); for undoubtedly the value of the lease depended on the scale of protection which was extended to corn (hear).

In such a state of things, landed gentlemen could not make settlements and arrangements regarding their property. They could not tell what provision they might make for themselves, or for those who came after them. All this depended on what would be done to regulate the price of corn. When the rt. hon. gent. said, nothing would be done now, but that next year the question should be looked into; it was the same as saying, "You shall go through the whole year under a vicious system, which Government intends to cure next year."

Sir Edward Knatchbull deprecated any alteration in the existing laws until the time should arrive when the necessity of such alteration had been proved by the actual experience of some inconvenience.

Lord Milton expressed his regret at the decision which had been expressed by ministers to postpone the discussion for the present. He thought it was their duty to come to a decision on so important a subject at the earliest possible period. In his opinion no time could be more fitting than the present. It was obvious, from the interest which the subject had excited, that the minds of the people would be kept in a state of ferment until it should be settled; and he asked whether any time could be so convenient for entering upon the discussion which must lead to that settlement as this, when universal tranquillity prevailed?

Mr. F. Lewis said, that although he had voted for the law of 1815, he was now sorry that he had done so, being convinced that the alteration between a free importation on the one hand, and the entire exclusion of corn on the other, was most injudicious and erroneous (hear, hear). But he thought it was highly preposterous that his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson), whose attention was occupied with so many subjects, of not less importance than this, should be called upon at once to come to a decision upon a topic which would require such deliberate discussion.

Sir T. Lethbridge never wished to see prices higher than at this moment, and should be happy to see the old principle of open ports and fixed duties again acted upon. There were at this moment 400,000 quarters of wheat in bond, which might be released with great benefit to the public. With respect to the amount of the duties, all he had to say was, that it was better they should be too high than too low, because it would then be easier to alter them.

Mr. Huskisson appealed to the house, to give him credit for having weighed well the reasons which had induced him to withhold any proposal on the subject, and to wait until the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Whitmore) should be before the house, when he intended to explain the operation of the change in the system of duties on the manufacturing interests, and the consequent effect which must be wrought in the corn laws. He should also be then prepared to state what it would be more easy to accomplish in the next session with respect to those laws, and to show the expediency of adopting some protection by means of duties, instead of the present objectionable alternation between a free trade in, and the entire exclusion, of corn.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

LORDS, TUESDAY, APRIL 23.—The Mar-

guis of Lansdown presented a petition from the merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and others of London, on the subject of the corn laws. This petition must be considered as expressing the sense of the great commercial body of London; for it was signed by 6,000 persons, among whom were the most eminent bankers and merchants; and if such a number as 6,000 did not include the whole, it certainly formed a great proportion of the mercantile interest. He must also observe, that while the petition prayed for an alteration in the corn laws, it by no means contained an unqualified demand of free trade. It called for importation under a protecting duty, capable of counterbalancing the burdens imposed on the British cultivator; a principle which, he believed, was agreed to by all practical men; nor did he know any persons who espoused the doctrine of a perfectly free trade in corn, except some few who were led away by abstract principles and theories. He had already stated his own opinion of the necessity of some alteration in the corn laws, and he fully concurred with the noble earl opposite, as to the impossibility of doing any thing on the subject this session; but here he must observe, that he was convinced the alteration could not be long delayed without great danger. Keeping up the present system with the avowed determination to alter it, must be attended with great inconvenience, from the incitement it would give to speculation. It was impossible to look at the prices of corn in this country compared with the rest of Europe, without entertaining the apprehension of the prices being run up here to 85s., which would open the ports, and cause an influx from all parts of the world. Such an event might bring the price of corn down to 40s. or even to 30s. the quarter, and thus produce one of the most violent convulsions this country had ever experienced. Under these circumstances, he approved of the admission of corn from Canada, and of the intention to release the bonded corn. He hoped that the effect of those measures would be to prevent corn from rising. Against such a revulsion as the opening of the ports would produce, it was the duty of Parliament to provide, and that he thought could only be done by something like a fixed duty; but the security to be derived from such a measure, he conceived, would mainly depend upon the duty being of a permanent nature. He admitted that there were difficulties in the way of determining what that duty ought to be. It was undoubtedly true, as the noble earl (Liverpool) had yesterday said, that war would have the effect of altering the price of agricultural productions by increasing the burdens on cultivation, but at the same time war gave the agriculturist an additional protection against importation, by increasing the price of freight. Thus there was a certainty of a countervailing protection in the very circumstance which the noble earl had adduced as most likely to prevent the establishment of a permanent duty. Before he sat down, he must advert to one other point. It had been stated that the agitation of this question had caused an alteration in the course of exchange unfavourable to this country. He had been informed, however, from the best authority, that that unfavourable course of exchange was in operation previous to any intimation of a wish to alter the corn laws. It was produced by a great demand by this country for cotton, coffee, and various other articles of foreign produce which were paid for in money. The agitation of the question of the corn laws might in some degree have contributed to the present state of exchange, but it certainly was not the sole nor the main cause.

The Earl of Limerick thought that the consequence of the admission of Canadian corn would be to afford an inlet to the corn of the United States. There being only a river between the two territories, it was impossible to prevent smuggling, and the corn of the United States would, in future, be brought to this country, under the name of Canadian, as the timber of those States now was.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that as a demand for raw materials from foreign countries could only originate in a foreign demand for home manufactures, there could be no variation thereby produced in the exchanges; there would be only an equal value going out and coming in. If there were any difference, it must arise from the state of the demand for home consumption. And here he wished the manufacturers would bethink themselves of the consequences which would infallibly ensue, were the landed interest to be impoverished. If the landed interest were thrown into a situation in which they could not consume largely, no class in the country would suffer so much as the manufacturers.

The Marquis of Lansdown had stated that the alteration in the course of exchange occurred before the agitation of the corn question, he believed so long ago as 13 or 14 months, chiefly by a demand for produce from abroad; but he had not said that the importation was paid for by manufactures. On the contrary, the foreign articles had been paid for in specie. In consequence of the great demand for coffee and cotton, persons had speculated on a rise in those articles, and consequently importations had taken place from all parts of the world. He admitted the justice of the general principle stated by his noble friend, and agreed with him in opinion that the true foundation of the manufacturer's prosperity was the growth of the home demand. He hoped the manufacturers would remember, that it was to the increase of that demand they had recently been indebted for their relief from a state of great difficulty and depression.

The Earl of Liverpool said that with regard to the apprehension entertained of the importation of American corn, he could assure the noble lord who had introduced that topic, that that was by no means the first danger to which the landed interest had to look. If the accounts of former importations were adverted to, it would be found that the quarter from which foreign corn had chiefly been received was the country bordering on the Baltic. The expense attending the passage would always impose a considerable check on importation from America. With respect to the delay, if blame attached to any body on that score, it was to himself. But the subject was one which, from the important considerations it involved, required the most mature deliberation. He certainly thought that Canada, as a vital part of this empire, was entitled to any advantages that could be derived from whatever system was adopted.

Lord Ellenborough said, that the only system which even approached permanence was either one of absolute freedom or absolute prohibition; and each of these was objectionable. If any system were adopted, it must change with reference to the circumstances of the country.

Lord King observed, that the noble earl opposite had stated that some change would take place. Undoubtedly some change must take place. And why must it? Because corn was too dear. If so, a great injustice would be done to the consumer by not adopting it without delay. Why should it not be adopted this year, instead of next year? The delay was injurious to the landed interests, now that it was announced that a change was to take place; as being calculated to unsettle their bargains and other transactions. He conceived that the landed interests, who paid poor rates, and church rates, and tithes, had a right to call for a protecting duty. About 12s. a quarter on wheat, and a proportionate duty on barley and oats, he thought would afford the landlord a fair compensation for those rates which were paid exclusively out of the land.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, APRIL 28.—Lord King, in presenting a petition against the Corn Laws, said, that he hoped the noble lord (Liverpool) would not continue for another year the present system of the corn laws, which compelled the whole population of the country to pay a very heavy tax. The burden which the corn laws imposed was of the odious nature of a poll tax, and was every where severely felt. If the present state of the corn laws added 15s. per quarter to the price of wheat, the continuation of the system was making every man in the country pay this 15s. unjustly; and by this tax every family in the kingdom was obliged necessarily to pay to the amount of 9l. 15s. per annum.

The Earl of Lauderdale would ask the noble lord where he had learned that the price of corn was so high as to constitute this tax? The noble lord was present at the commencement of the session, when His Majesty's speech described the prosperous state of the agriculture of the country; but the noble lord then said nothing about the high price of corn, and made no complaints of the poor suffering by the corn laws. If the noble lord really wished to canvass for petitions, he had taken the right way to get them. He would now have them in abundance from the most ignorant part of the country. He had thought it is duty to say thus much, because the observations of the noble lord were of a nature to excite no slight agitation throughout the country.

Lord King had been asked where he had learned that the price of corn was high? He had learned that fact from the petitions on the table; one of which was signed by 6000 bankers and merchants of the city of London. He had learned it by the petitions from Manchester, Liverpool, and various parts of the country. He had learned it by the rise of prices since the commencement of the session, which prices had so increased that there were apprehensions of the ports being thrown open. He was glad that the subject was to be taken up by the noble lord opposite, though he should be better pleased if there were no delay. When it should be taken up, however, he hoped and trusted their lordships would see no committee. If a committee were formed, every spectre would be brought forward and exhibited before it to frighten the country gentlemen. They would be told how cheap corn could be raised in Poland, where a plough was tied to a cow's tail or horns. There corn could be grown for nothing. If the noble lord at the head of the Treasury really meant to do any thing on this subject, he hoped he would do it without the intervention of a committee.

The Earl of Lauderdale denied that there was a single complaint or that any petitions relative to the price of corn had been presented, until after notice had been given (by Mr. Whitmore) of a motion on the subject. The noble lord, it seemed, had learned the high price of corn from the petitions of merchants; but those petitioners were not corn consumers. All that they cared about corn was, that they might have opportunities to speculate, and put large profits in their pocket.

The Earl of Limerick had stated on a previous evening, that if Canada corn were admitted it would be impossible to exclude American corn, and he had that morning met with a confirmation of his opinion. In looking over some returns, he observed one from our Consul in America, who stated that prices had been very low in that country, till a rumour got abroad that Canada corn was to be allowed to be imported, and prices immediately rose in America. There was also an opinion there that prices would certainly rise higher the instant that rumour became a certainty. A whole army of Custom-house officers could not prevent American flour from finding its way into this country, if flour might be imported from Canada. He believed the demand for a revision of the Corn Laws did not arise from any affection for the poor.

The Earl of Rosslyn said, it was incumbent on the Legislature to recollect that numerous contracts had been entered into on the faith of the present law, which it was understood should be permanent. He could not but think any supposition of an alteration would create considerable alarm. It would have a great effect in Scotland, where the Ministers' stipends were partly paid according to the price of grain in the market.

COMMONS.—A petition in favour of the Corn Laws having been presented,

Mr. Brougham said, he did not mean, on this occasion, to address himself to the important question which was to be discussed that night; but he merely wished to suggest, that hon. gents. would do well to abstain from saying any thing on presenting their petitions, or anticipate the discussion of the evening. He had never failed to observe, that when petitions were to be presented in great number, on a subject appointed for debate on the same night, the observations which were usually made upon them, occurring over and over again with each separate petition, had the effect of anticipating much of what might be more conveniently reserved for the principal debate; so that when the debate at last came on, those observations were found to have completely stifled it; or, to use a common phrase, to have thrown cold water over it. This being the case, he should himself follow his own doctrine (a laugh). A petition must numerously and respectfully signed by the inhabitants of the county of Durham, praying that no alteration might take place in the existing corn laws, had been forwarded to him, and the petitioners had done him the honour to confide it to his charge; but for the reasons he had already stated, he did not intend to present it to-night, but would bring it in to-morrow night. In the mean time the petitioners had all the benefit of the declaration which he now made, that the whole of the agricultural population of Durham were decidedly averse to any alteration of the corn laws.

The Sheriffs of the city of London appeared at the bar to present a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the city of London, praying for an alteration in the corn laws.

Mr. Alderman Wood said it was not often the lot of the Common Council to record their approbation of the measures pursued by Government (a laugh). On the present occasion, however, they expressed their admiration of the policy of ministers in removing restrictions and establishing in almost every direction a free trade; but they added, that it was quite impossible, without some great alterations in the corn laws, which should have the effect of lowering the price of grain, to stand up against the foreign manufacturer, whom we had now admitted into our own markets. The petitioners did not ask any lower duty, at the same time, than might be sufficient to protect the landowner. But under the present system of corn-laws many frauds were practised to keep up the price of grain to the consumer in this country; and the monopolist, and not the farmer, obtained all the advantage of those high prices from which the public suffered. He hoped that this trade would, for the future, be placed on that footing which would be most advantageous to the agriculturist and to the consumer generally (hear).

Mr. Wilson was happy to be able to concur in what had fallen from his worthy colleague, which it was by no means his good fortune to do every day.

The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Whitmore rose in pursuance of a notice, given early in the present session, to bring under the consideration of the house the law respecting the trade in foreign corn. In doing this, he was actuated by a deep conviction that the period was arrived, beyond which the consideration of this important subject could not with safety be postponed. It was time to make the laws regulating the Corn Trade square a little better with those principles of free trade which had, so much to the credit of Ministers, been of late so largely acted upon, and from which the greatest benefits would be found to result, not alone to the people of this great manufacturing country, but to the world at large. The Corn Laws of England stood forward in glaring contrast to those principles, and were calculated to defeat the great advantages which would otherwise accrue from their adoption. Was it not unjust to call upon the manufacturing interest to make those sacrifices, which a change of system, however beneficial in its ultimate results, never failed in the first instance to entail upon the parties interested—when at the same time they allowed to continue in its full force, a system which struck at the very root of commercial prosperity? A free admission of foreign corn, subject to such duty as the existence of burdens, bearing exclusively upon the productions of the soil might require, was the basis upon which free trade must repose, and without which it never could be permanently and effectually carried into operation. The Corn Laws of this country had inflicted the greatest injury upon the general trade of the world, that ever perhaps was produced by injudicious legislation. The returns from the Consuls abroad, stating the low price of corn in all the shipping ports of the continent, and complaining, whenever any remarks accompanied their returns, of the distress generally prevalent in the corn exporting countries, were sufficient evidence of this fact. One remarkable effect produced by them was, that they had led to the adoption of similar laws in all the other countries in Europe whose natural condition was that of importing countries of corn. Spain and Portugal had followed our example, and Holland, whose laws respecting the external trade in corn, were, until lately, the best existing in any country, had just been forced to the adoption of the same line of policy. It was obvious, that if England, the great regulator of the price of corn in this part of the world, and with a view to the supply of whose markets, a considerable portion of that commodity was grown in Poland and the other exporting countries—if England determined on shutting her ports against its admission, the corn, not finding its usual vent, must be thrown back upon the countries of its produce, causing a glut in their own markets, and overwhelming with its quantity the markets of all other countries open to its reception. It followed as an inevitable consequence, that the exclusion of foreign corn from the markets of a country naturally importing, produced similar regulations in other countries similarly situated. Now such a policy must, at no distant period, repress production; it must cause the agriculturists of the exporting countries to abandon the cultivation of grain to a considerable extent, and betake themselves to the production of some other article, which, if not equally beneficial where a regular market existed for the sale of grain, was attended with more profit. Such, when no such market could be had, in fact, had been the case, as was proved in certain letters which he had received from Mr. Behrend, a resident at Dantzic, connected with the Corn Trade, minutely informed of the actual situation of the agriculturists of that country, from the circumstance of his being a landed proprietor in it to a considerable extent. Mr. Behrend said, that "The Corn Trade having now lingered in a depressed state for upwards of six years, the result to the whole northern continent and more particularly to this country, has been extremely disastrous. The penury of the agriculturists having been driven to the highest pitch, production has gradually diminished, and as the higher classes have also felt the pressure of this general impoverishment, our commercial intercourse with the western parts of Europe has experienced a serious diminution. It is generally thought that the consumption of British colonials and manufactures, does not at present exceed one half of what it was before this unfortunate crisis of the Corn Trade took place. The price of wheat at which the Prussian farmer can afford to pay the moderate taxes of this country, is calculated by the best economists at 35s. per Winchester quarter, but the landed proprietor in Volhynia (from which province we get the bulk of good wheat), cannot supply the ports of the Baltic at less than 38s., as he has nearly 14s. to pay for freight, duties, and charges. Hence it appears, that our prices have been for more than five years under the cost of production, which accounts sufficiently for the considerable decrease which is observed in the extent of the Polish supplies and our home produce. It has been rumoured, that our government intends to retaliate, or, at least, to meet the present prohibitive system of the western countries by a similar measure, as regards several expensive articles of importation which are not in the number of the immediate necessities of life; but little good is anticipated from such a measure, as it would, perhaps, annihilate trade altogether." Upon the receipt of this letter he requested further information upon this subject, and received a second communication from the same gentleman, which he would also read:—"I am myself the possessor of a patrimonial estate, on which my father never used to keep above 100 to 150 sheep. I have now increased my flock to 1000 head, and as long as wool maintains its present value, I am certain I shall not recur to an increased culture of grain, were I to be made sure of 40s. per quarter for my wheat. I now produce about one-half the wheat which was grown on the same soil ten or twelve years ago, but find myself abundantly indemnified by an advantageous sale of the produce of my flock. I observe most of my neighbours to have adopted the same method, and, I think, I know but two classes of Polish agriculturists, one of which is ruined beyond help, and whose properties are in a state of general deterioration; and the other, having directed their whole attention to the breeding of cattle, the latter are observed to make annually large purchases of sheep, more particularly in Silesia and Saxony." Now from this reasoning, and these facts, there arose two important considerations—first, with respect to the regular supply of food for the consumption of this country; secondly, with respect to the effect this change of system would have on our own agricultural pursuits. Unless it could be shown that the average production in Europe of several years had been above the average consumption of the same period,—a fact, which few would venture to assert,—it must follow that a considerable reduction in produce, without a corresponding falling off in consumption, must lead, at some time or other, to great deficiency in the quantity of food, and, consequently, to dearth, if not famine. The stocks of wheat were considered, by all the most intelligent persons he had conversed with upon the subject as unusually low; and we were, therefore, entirely dependent upon the seasons, without, as was generally the case, having any stock upon which to draw in case of deficient produce. Our resource of foreign supply would be essentially diminished by the change in agriculture abroad, to which he had alluded. The evil might be retarded by abundant seasons; it might be altogether averted by a timely change in the corn laws, but if they were allowed to continue in full force, the fatal effect he contemplated seemed at some period inevitable. The other consideration arising from these facts was, that the hopes of the English agriculturist would be defeated, by the admission of a much larger quantity of foreign agricultural produce, other than grain, provided the present law continued to exclude the latter description of produce. More wool, more flax, more tallow, would be imported, and seriously affect the price of these articles in the English market. The present law was inconsistent with itself; and, in that respect, even Mr. Webb Hall's proposition had a greater appearance of wisdom—it was at least more consistent; though, it must be admitted, it was a consistency in error. Such, indeed, had been the fact. If gentlemen would look to the imports of these articles, they would find the quantities imported had lately very considerably increased. The annual average import of wool for five years, ending 1823, amounted to 16,194,502 lbs.; for the year 1824, it exceeded that quantity by 6,363,720 lbs. The import of tallow for five years, ending 1819, averaged 512,116 cwt. 2 qrs. 1 lb. for each year; for the five years ending 1823, it averaged 732,494 cwt. 2 qrs. 10 lbs., being an excess in the latter period of 220,378 cwt. 5 qrs. 9 lbs. The flax imported from 1811 to 1820 averaged 325,946 cwts. annually; in 1824 it amounted to 547,096 cwts. 2 qrs. 17 lbs. being an excess of the last year of 221,150 cwts. 2 qrs. 17 lbs.—Now he was well aware that the increasing population and prosperity of this country required a larger supply of these articles than heretofore. He was also aware that, in some cases, new markets had opened, and, in others, duties on imports had been lowered, which would naturally cause a larger importation; but still he was convinced that if we continued our present system, we should find ourselves competed with at home, in these various products, in a way seriously affecting the interests of the agricultural classes. He need hardly refer to the evils of glut, as we had so recently escaped from them, that they must be fresh in the recollection of every gentleman; and all who reflected upon the subject must admit that a law, the tendency of which was to produce dearth at one time, would equally conduce to create superabundance at another. Great and ruinous fluctuation of price was the inevitable result of a system of restriction; whereas freedom in the corn trade led to the opposite effect—to as much steadiness of price as was consistent with a commodity, the produce of which varied so much with the seasons. In order to illustrate this, he would suppose the trade in corn confined to a single parish. Could any one, in such a case, doubt that dearth at one period, and superabundance at another, would follow as a necessary consequence? Extend the limits of the trade from a parish to a county, the variations, though less sudden and less frequent, would still be of perpetual recurrence. Extend them to a large country, and the chance of fluctuation, as well as its range, became thereby diminished. In fact, the more the basis from whence supplies were drawn was widened, the greater the steadiness of price—the more it was narrowed, the more constant and the more fatal in their effects, the fluctuations to which they were subject. Another material consideration, respecting a price of corn considerably higher than its rate in surrounding nations, arose from its effect on capital invested in other pursuits. It must raise the price of labour; and this rise in labour must, in some shape or other, affect the manufacturer. Some imagined it raised the price of his commodities; others, of whom he was one, that it reduced the rate of his profits. In the former case, competition in foreign markets, with articles of foreign produce, would become impossible; in the latter case, the profits of stock would be essentially diminished. In either case dangerous consequences would result. Capital, upon the possession of which the power and importance, as well as wealth of this country depended, would be attracted by superior advantages to some other situation. Gentlemen unaccustomed to reflect upon subjects of this nature, and perceiving great appearance of prosperity in all directions, might, perhaps, undervalue this consideration; and yet, there was none of more vital consequence to the essential interests of this country. Did any statesman in that house believe we could pursue this policy with impunity; did any man of common intelligence in the country, who viewed the subject with impartiality, believe it? Could they adduce a single instance of a country similarly situated which had pursued such a system, and continued to thrive under it? He challenged them to produce an instance in any part or in any period of the world. The downfall of Holland, on the contrary, was attributed by the best authorities, whom it might appear pedantry to quote, to the circumstance of a large artificial rise in the price of bread; and he felt convinced, if the corn laws were to continue without modification for twenty years, that the prosperity of England would receive a mortal stab. There was also another effect produced by this law, of no mean importance. It was clear that its object was to raise the price of provisions for the benefit of one class of the community, at the expense of the rest. The class whose benefit was thus sought was the powerful and affluent class; those whose interests were rendered subservient were the mass and body of the people—could this produce any other effect than discord and disunion, where harmony and concord were so essential for the public good? Were they prepared at the present time of day to separate the aristocracy from the people? Were they prepared to set up a privileged class, to whose immediate advantage the real interests of the country were to be heedlessly sacrificed? This would be at all times most dangerous—introducing a principle altogether at variance with the spirit of the constitution, and calculated to work in it a change which could not be contemplated without most serious apprehension. But was this the time they would select for so rash an experiment? Was it a time of ignorance upon matters of this nature? Was it a moment when monopoly could shelter itself under the garb of patriotism? Was it not, on the contrary, the time above all others when the flimsy veil would be most easily seen through, and when the real nature of the law would stand forth in all its worst features, naked and exposed to the indignant gaze of an enlightened and injured people? Before he proceeded to state what alteration in the law he was about to recommend, he should mention shortly what the Corn Law of England formerly was, and the rather because some were in the habit of considering the present law as of long standing, and as having therefore received the seal of time and experience. This was an error. The principle introduced by the law of 1815 was entirely new, such as had been never dreamt of before, being in truth, the wildest theory, and most insane speculation, that ever entered into the heads of practical statesmen. It contained a provision, that there should be a complete exclusion of foreign corn under a given price, 80s. per quarter, and a free admission of it above that price. The law of 1823 in some measure modified this principle, but containing an import price, and fixing it as high as 70s. It left the law in very nearly the same injurious state. This was not so formerly. By the law passed in 1773, the time at which we became a regular importing country, foreign wheat was at all times admissible into the English markets, subject to one high duty of 24s. 3d. per quarter, and two low duties; the first of 2s. 3d., the second of 6d. per quarter. The high duty was payable when wheat was below 44s. per quarter; the first low duty of 2s. 6d. when its average price was at or above 44s.; the second low duty of 6d. per quarter when the price reached 46s. The same principle and amount of duties was continued by the law passed in 1791, but the prices at which they were payable were altered: the high duty of 24s. 3d. was payable up to 50s.; the first low duty of 2s. 6d. between 50s. and 54s.; and the second low duty of 6d. at or above 54s. In 1804 these prices were again changed to 63s. per quarter, up to which the high duty was payable; between 63s. and 66s. the first low duty was imposed, and at 66s. the second low duty took place. Owing to the price in the English market being always (with the exception of three or four years, which occurred after the American war,) above that price at which the high duty was payable, the effect was a free trade in corn, subject to a duty of 2s. 6d. per quarter at most, but generally to a duty of only 6d. Virtually, then, though not nominally, we had a free trade in corn with very low duties.—He should now proceed to the proposed alteration, but before he did so, he must clear his way of the exclusive burdens to which the agriculturist of this country was subject, and on account of which, by the admission of all parties, he was entitled to some protection. These had been much exaggerated; but neither was he disposed to reduce them to their lowest amount, as he was convinced that there was a disposition on the part of the people of this country, to make a fair and liberal allowance to the agricultural interest with respect to these burdens: but he must enquire a little as to their amount. They were said to consist of poor rates, tithes, land tax, highway, and other parochial rates.

The poor rates, including county rates and other payments, amounted in 1823 to about			£7,000,000

Highways, &c.	-	-	2,000,000

But to cover all possible loss accruing from these burdens, he would take them at 18,000,000l. Now, what would be the effect of a duty of 10s. per quarter imposed on the import of foreign wheat into this country? If they took the consumption at 14,000,000 quarters, it would stand thus:—

14,000,000 quarters wheat, raised in price by a duty of 10s. per quarter	£7,000,000
14,000,000 barley, duty 3s.	3,500,000
20,000,000 oats, duty 3s.	3,000,000
Grass produce, vegetables, &c.	5,000,000

A duty of 10s. then would have the effect of drawing from the pockets of the people of this country 18,000,000l. annually more than they would have to pay if the trade in corn were free. The object of the duty must be to raise the price of agricultural produce generally, or it would be of no value at all; and it would be absurd to impose restrictions without a motive, as would be the case if it were true, as some seemed to imagine, that the duty would fall only upon the foreign corn imported, and not produce the effect of raising the price of the whole quantity consumed. In the event of a free trade in corn, the home growth would be less, and the imports of foreign corn greater. The latter drawn from soils of a superior quality than those in cultivation in this country, would be sold with profit to the grower at more moderate prices. It was clear that low prices would be the consequence of open ports, and high ones (the demand continuing the same) the result of the exclusion of foreign corn, provided it did not, as it would, produce great fluctuation of price: a moderate duty, supposing it not to exclude foreign corn, would thus have the effect of raising its price generally in the markets of this country. If the price of wheat were raised, that of every other description of agricultural produce would proportionably be increased. The next point to which he wished to call attention, was, the probable price at which a certain quantity of foreign corn could now be sold in the markets of this country. One datum was afforded by the average price at Rotterdam, from 1815 to 1824, the result of which was an average price for the whole ten years of 47s. 9½d. per quarter. True it was, that in one of the years, 1817, the price rose, on account of scarcity in France and England, to 93s. per quarter; but during the four or five latter years of this period, the prices were unusually depressed, owing to the English markets being closed against the admission of foreign corn. There was, therefore, no reason to imagine it was too high an average; and as Rotterdam was about the same distance from the ports of the exporting countries as the harbours of Great Britain, the probability was, that if our ports were open for the admission of foreign corn, it could not be sold with profit below that price. The average price of wheat at New York, for the five years ending 1824, was 38s. per quarter. This, however, was a period during which no import for British consumption took place, and there was, therefore, no reason to imagine the price higher, than it would amount to under the circumstance of a demand for this country; to this might be added the expense of freight, &c., amounting to about 12s., which would raise it to about 50s. per quarter. Wheat from Odessa could hardly be imported under a price of 44s., including all the charges. From these facts, added to all the information he had been able to collect from the most competent authorities, and whose opinion, with respect to the probable price of foreign corn in the English markets, provided they were open to its reception, he had found to vary between 45s. and 52s., he was at least justified in assuming, that 45s. without duty would be as low a price as that at which any quantity of foreign corn could be imported into this country. If to this were added a duty of 10s. per quarter, it would raise the price to 55s., and that was quite as high as any attention to the real interests of the country, would justify an attempt to raise it. He was, however, aware that great alarm prevailed amongst the agriculturists upon this subject, and that, judging from the present low prices on the continent, they believed, that if the ports were thrown open for the admission of foreign corn, subject only to a moderate duty, a most serious revulsion would take place in their interests; that, in fact, they would be overwhelmed with a deluge of foreign corn, which would bring back all the tremendous distress which existed during the recent period of low prices. They conceived this more especially, as they inferred from the circumstance of no import having taken place into Great Britain for six years, that there must be a large quantity ready to be poured into this country. He believed their fears were greatly beyond that which the real facts of the case would justify; but he had no objection to meet them by such a regulation, as must be admitted, even by the most fearful, to be a sufficient guarantee against such an evil. He would propose, more with a view to quiet apprehension than as a matter of any real importance, to increase the duty by 5s. per quarter, in proportion as the price declined 5s.: thus at 55s. the duty to be 10s.; from 55 to 50	-	15 per quarter.

50 to 45	-	20 ditto.
45 to 40	-	25 ditto.

It was his belief that this would be, as the high duty formerly was, a dead letter, as he had no idea of prices falling so low under a system of import subject to moderate duties as to call into operation any other than the 10s. duty; but it was the part of true wisdom to make any sacrifices to public feeling, which could be done without endangering the main object to be attained; and with that view and not from any feeling of the utility of the measure itself, he ventured to propose it. The fears respecting the immense quantity of foreign corn which would be poured into our ports, or the opening of the market of this country to its admission, he held to be greatly exaggerated; he did not conceive that at the present moment the whole world could furnish us with a 1,000,000 quarters of wheat; and he had strong reason to believe, that, considering the low state of our stocks, this would not be more than we required to re-establish them. Nor did he imagine that any great revulsion of price would immediately occur. Where a real and not fictitious demand existed, the opening of the ports produced but a slight effect on price; this was exemplified by the opening of the ports (as it was called) for oats last August; the price, when the ports opened, was 28s. per quarter; it declined in September to 22s. 7d. and rose again in December to 23s. 4d.; the quantity imported was 488,000 quarters. With reference to the usual import, provided the law were altered according to the plan he had suggested, he had no reason to believe that it would amount to any quantity which could be considered injurious to our own agriculturists. They might judge of what was likely to be by what had been. The total imports of wheat, from 1800 to 1820, amounted to 12,577,029 qrs., giving an annual average import of 589,906 qrs. The average price of that period amounted to 84s. 6d.; but, during a portion of it, the currency was depreciated, and allowance must be made for such depreciation. If 10 per cent. were deducted from it, they would deduct much more than the real fact demanded; and this would give a metallic price for the period in question of 76s., 20s. a quarter higher than that at which he should wish to see it raised to by any duty they might impose. During the period in question, there occurred 4 or 5 years of decided dearth, when the prices rose to a tremendous height, and a proportionably large import took place. The following were the years of largest import, with the average price of each year:—

	Qra. Wheat.	£ s.
1800.....	1,263,771.....	110 5
1801.....	1,424,241.....	115 11
1810.....	1,439,615.....	103 0
1817.....	1,030,829.....	94 0
1818.....	1,536,080.....	83 8

Whoever would examine the resources from whence these large supplies were drawn, would see at once that nothing but a very high price could have attracted a portion of them to this country. The whole world seemed ransacked, with a view to the supply of Great Britain in periods of dearth; not the products of Europe and America alone were pressed into our service, but those of Asia and Africa were made to contribute to our wants. He did not see any reason to imagine that, with a moderate average price of 55s. per quarter for wheat, we should import upon an average more than we did during the 21 years of which he had taken notice. Supposing, however, the average amount of our annual imports of wheat to be 1,000,000, instead of 600,000 quarters, surely no great alarm need be felt by the British agriculturist. He would still have to supply 13,000,000 quarters; and as the population of the country was rapidly increasing, the demand would certainly not diminish, but, on the contrary, might in a few years be expected most materially to increase. The plan he proposed to the house for an alteration of the law involved the maintenance of a system of averages. He was aware how unfashionable such a system was at the present moment; but, after the most mature reflection, he gave it as his decided opinion, that so long as a duty upon the import of foreign corn continued a part of our system, so long must it be regulated by some such machinery; and he must own, he had no such violent objection to it as he heard generally proclaimed. He saw no reason to doubt that the frauds which were stated to have been committed might be effectually prevented by applying such remedies as the wisdom of the legislature might devise; nor was fraud so likely to be committed, under a system of import, with moderate duties, as under the present law, which established an artificial barrier to all trade in foreign corn, until prices should have reached a given amount. When there was a large quantity of grain in bond, waiting for a market—entailing a heavy loss upon the merchant to whom it belonged—subject to damage and destruction of various kinds—and a most beneficial market existing just without the precincts of the warehouse—there was certainly a premium held out for fraud, such as hardly ever existed before, and which might, in some instances, be irresistible; but the alteration now proposed in the law would at once remove all such inducement: at the utmost, the whole benefit to be attained by fraudulent returns would be a somewhat lower duty than that, at which, without a rise in price in our markets, foreign corn would be admitted. He had no great apprehension that such a motive would induce men of so high a sense of honour as that which distinguished the character of British merchants, to tarnish their reputation by so dishonest a practice. Supposing even that some inconvenience of this nature belonged inherently to the average system, still was it not necessary to guard against the greater inconveniences of import duty upon so important an article as grain, at periods of dearth? They must be prepared either to continue their duty at whatever price corn might amount to, or they must establish a practicable mode, by which, at a given price, such duty should cease. With respect to the first, he had no idea of a duty, however moderate, being maintainable in a period of dearth. He had no idea of any one who had reflected upon the irritation and feverish excitement always existing in the public mind at such periods, seriously determining upon a law of which that was a provision. Mr. Burke's opinion upon this point was deserving of great weight. He stated in his thoughts and details upon scarcity, published in 1796, that he had observed that the lower orders patiently submitted to any privations on the score of food, so long as they could attribute them to no other cause than the visitations of Providence—but that the moment they detected the hand of government interfering with their supply of food, they became discontented and riotous—they attributed not a portion of their distress, but the whole of it to this cause. This appeared to him a most sound opinion, and he trusted that whatever change the house might determine upon in the Corn Laws, it never would be lost sight of. Some proposed to remedy the evil by entrusting the Privy Council with a power to suspend the duty when they saw reason to do so. He did not know what the present Privy Council might feel upon the subject, but a power more invidious, one more difficult of execution, without giving great offence to conflicting interests—one more calculated to render them odious in the eyes of the people, he could hardly imagine. Others recommended a temporary act to be passed at a period of dearth; but it should be borne in mind, that a dearth was commonly ascertained in October or November, and that Parliament did not usually assemble until February. It would therefore be necessary to call it together for this special purpose, at an unusual and inconvenient season, besides affording food for all that jealousy and excitement which such a proceeding would necessarily give rise to. Few would contend, that, under the freest system of trade, no dearth would ever occur; that it would be rendered less frequent was obvious; but to guard against it entirely was an Utopian speculation, upon which it would be most dangerous to legislate. He must own too, that the imposition of high duties at very low prices, which by removing prejudice, and giving a feeling of security to the agriculturist, would so much facilitate a melioration in the law, weighed much in his mind in favour of a continuance of averages, without which no such provision could be made. The information derived from these averages, together with the convenience the public derived from them in regulating rents and contracts of various sorts, ought to induce the house to pause before they changed a system which had existed for so long a period, and which never, that he was aware of, had afforded ground for complaint until there was grafted upon it an import price, with which it had manifestly no inseparable connexion. He felt most anxious the house should immediately proceed to amend a law which contained principles so much at variance with every part of our policy—so fraught with injury to the people of this country—so entirely opposed to the spirit and intelligence of the age; and he deeply regretted the determination expressed by Government not to enter upon this important subject in the present session. If ever there were a period when it could be discussed with less risk of excitement on the public mind than another, it was the present. No distress prevailed amongst any class. The interests, therefore, of all parties might be considered with that calmness and moderation so essential to their being thoroughly understood. Those among the agriculturists who admitted a change to be desirable, but recommended the house to wait until the moment of scarcity arrived, surely took an extraordinary view of their own interest. Did they imagine that to be a period, when even their fair claims would be patiently listened to? Did they not, on the contrary, expect that such a feeling would go forth throughout the country—that clamour, not reason—deep rooted prejudice, not fair judgment—would at such a season be called upon to decide upon the subject? It was his full belief, that if they allowed the causes now in operation to produce their full effect before they settled this great question, the agriculturists must expect to be hurried away by the tide of popular feeling, and to be compelled to relinquish all claims, even the fairest and most legitimate, to protection and security.—Many other points remained to be noticed, but he had already trespassed at too great length upon the time and patience of the house, and would conclude by moving “that the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole house to consider of the Corn Laws.”*

Mr. Gooch said, it did not appear to him that the hon. member had made out a case sufficiently strong to justify him in calling upon the house to accede to his proposition. In the last six years, the average price of wheat was 58s. 3d. per quarter, and he would ask the house whether, considering all the expences to which the farmer was subject, it was possible for him to farm his land at a lower price? It appeared to him, that the present system of corn laws, with all its imperfections on its head, worked well, and afforded the farmer a fair remunerating price. He was not the advocate of high prices, and he considered that 60s. per quarter was a fair remuneration on wheat, and 30s. on barley. He was desirous that every working man in this country should have an adequate recompence for his labour, and should on the Saturday night be enabled to diffuse comfort amongst his wife and children (hear, hear). Nothing, of course, could be more popular than the doctrine of cheap bread. Once raise the clamour about it, and it would naturally run like wild fire through the country; but let the house remember that the expences to which land was subject were extremely high, much higher than the hon. member had stated; there were the costs of roads, bridges, gnaols, county rates, poor rates, and all the rest, all of which fell upon the land. It was a mistake to suppose that the labouring classes suffered in consequence of high prices; they derived their advantage whilst the farmer enjoyed the benefit of high prices. There never was a period when the country was more prosperous than at present, and at no former period, until the notice of the hon. member's motion, did there prevail a more general tranquillity; he therefore thought the hon. member had much to answer for. It was quite absurd to talk of our being able to compete with foreign countries. They might as well say that if two horses started, the one with a feather on its back, the other with twelve stone, that the chance would be equal. Whilst things continued as they were, such a contest would be impossible; but only let John Bull start fair, and he would back him ten to one (hear, hear). He thought the house should leave “well enough alone,” and should therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Curwen observed, that the agitation of this question brought the manufacturer and the agriculturist in direct collision; and although the country had no security of a supply from abroad, they had a certainty that the proposed alterations would throw much land out of cultivation, which would lead to the most disastrous consequences.

Lord Oxmantown said, that the hon. mover seemed to place too much dependence on the supply from foreign countries. He should be slow in acceding to any proposition having a tendency to injure our hardy rustic population, which constituted the strength of the empire.

Mr. Huskisson said, that he did not intend to advert to the details which his hon. friend had with such great labour and research submitted to the consideration of the house. He should, therefore, only say that he concurred with him in his general principle, that the trade in corn ought to be conducted with the same liberal policy which was adopted with respect to other branches of the commerce of the country; but he did not think that the present time was the most fit for its introduction. In the outset he wished it might be distinctly understood, that it was to the time only that he objected. If it should be the pleasure of the house to go into the committee, he might have to propose measures, differing not in principle, but in degree, from his hon. friend's view of the subject. His opinions on the corn laws were not unknown to the house and country. They were on record in the report of the committee of 1821, and since then he had seen no reason to depart from them. There were few gentlemen, he believed, who were once disposed to differ from that report, but would now concur in its general conclusions; but while they admitted these, he would allow there might still be a great difference as to the time, mode, and degree of making any alteration in the laws as they now stood. He would assert that, with the facts before him, of corn being sold in the ports of France and the Netherlands at half the price at which it could be purchased here, no man would be warranted in contending that the present corn laws could be adopted as a permanent system (hear, hear). We were now in the tenth year of peace, and it was not unreasonable to expect that the price of corn here could not continue so much above that at which it might be procured at the ports on the continent; but if this fact were worthy of consideration, there was another which it was also of importance to bear in mind. For forty years this country allowed a free trade in corn, and for every year of that time we imported a quantity more or less from the continent. That importation had been discontinued for the last six years, during which we did not receive from abroad any addition to our home supply. This interruption created one of the greatest difficulties under which we were called upon to revise the present corn laws; for, the consequence of the interruption was, a great accumulation of corn in all the countries from which we were in the habit of importing. To this was to be added, that since we had ceased to import corn, our harvests at home had been more than usually productive; and he believed the same might be said of the other corn countries of Europe. There was then a great increase in the stock of corn on hand in all the continental ports from which we had usually imported, and this was farther increased by the fact that Spain and Portugal, imitating our example, had latterly received less than their usual supply from the northern ports. The result of all these circumstances was, that the supply was at present so much beyond the demand in many of the European ports, that in some corn did not produce half, in others not one third, and in others again not one fourth of the average prices of the last forty years, before they had ceased to export corn to this country (hear, hear). Now it was not travelling into any new theory of political economy to assert that the average price in those ports for the last forty years, might be taken as the fair price, which would give some remuneration to the grower, and that any thing less than that would be a loss to him. From returns which he had seen, it appeared that the average price in Dantzic for the last forty years, before importation to this country was interrupted, was 45s. and a fraction. It must then be evident that any thing much below that price would be a loss to the grower. It would be unfair to infer the real cost price, at the present day, from what the corn would fetch in the market. He would ask the hon. member who introduced this motion—he would appeal to the hon. members for Ireland, and ask what difference would it not have made to that country if, some years back, we had removed its free trade in the export of corn to Great Britain, and not allowed a vent for its superabundant harvests? Would any man say, that the price to which corn would have fallen after such interruption, should be taken as a fair criterion of the cost of production? He was sure no such point would be contended, and he maintained that neither could it be contended with respect to the cost of growing the article in those countries whose import of corn to England had been interrupted. He did not say this out of any particular feeling of compassion for the holders of foreign corn in foreign ports, but merely to point out to the attention of the house, that when we came to any permanent measure for regulating the importation of corn, we should look rather at the cost of producing it in the countries where it was now so cheap, than at the price which it might bring to the grower after so long an interruption of his exports. Another view of the question was, that some of the countries from which we had formerly imported grain, having no other vent for their surplus produce but what our wants under particular circumstances might create, would discontinue to grow corn, and employ their lands to some more profitable purpose; and that thus the surplus in the market would remedy itself. This was an important feature in the case, when they came to look at the question in another light. His hon. friend had stated, on the authority of several letters from the continent, that this had already been the case in some places—that many individuals had discontinued the cultivation of corn, and had laid down their lands under pasture for large flocks of sheep; and here he begged to state a circumstance to illustrate how the interruption in any one branch of trade tended to affect most sensibly our general commercial system. He alluded to the tax on foreign wool, which he himself acknowledged to have supported some few years ago. The consequence of that imposition was, to have depressed the value of low priced wool on the Continent by excluding it from our markets, that the wool growers of Silesia, and some parts of Germany, established manufactories for coarse cloths, and were able to undersell us in that article, and had in a great degree excluded us from the markets of the United States and South America. The removal of the tax on foreign wool, however, remedied that evil. As soon as it could be imported here, it rose in price to the manufacturers abroad, from twenty-three to thirty-three florins. We were thus enabled to compete with them, and in a short time drove them from their own and the American market (hear hear). He mentioned these facts to show the effects of an accumulation in the foreign market, and the difficulties which it threw in our way at present in bringing about any effectual alteration in the corn laws. He could not disguise from himself the fact, that if we now opened our ports to an unrestricted corn trade, we might introduce all at once the great accumulation in the foreign ports, and thus disgust the home grower with a free trade in corn. That there were inconveniences attending the system in whichever way we treated it, he did not deny, but they were the necessary result of the system which we had adopted in 1815—of that monopoly to which we were in consequence exposed, and which he would show, before he sat down, could not afford a permanent advantage to any party. The question, then, was, with this accumulation in the foreign market, what course ought we to pursue? There were various ways of treating the subject. Those who thought that the home grower ought to have a monopoly up to a certain price, and that above that there should be a free trade, would introduce the same alternation of monopoly and free trade to which he had just adverted; but then the question came—at what price should the free trade begin? His hon. friend the member for Suffolk had in a fair and candid manner said, that looking to the alteration of circumstances since 1815, he should consider the prohibition of corn at 60s. as quite sufficient to afford as fair a remunerating price to the British grower, as 80s. did in the year 1815. This was a fair and honest admission, that the time was not far distant beyond which the present system could not be continued. One mode suggested would thus be to prohibit importation as long as corn did not exceed 60s. here; and another was to have the ports constantly open, with such a duty as would afford a protection to the English farmer. If, however, the reduction were made to 60s., the whole of the accumulation of the ports of the continent would be thrown upon the country. What the effect of that would be, he would not attempt to describe, though he did not partake of the general fears entertained on the subject (hear, hear). If a permanent duty were to be fixed, how, he would ask, were they to deal with the accumulations on the continent? Were they to be admitted at once, or gradually? These considerations showed the difficulties with which the question was surrounded at the present time, and which could not be expected to embarrass it at another period. The circumstances of the present day, which prevented an attempt to alter the corn laws, were so forcibly alluded to in the report of the committee of 1821, that he should be induced to trouble the house with the extract. After suggesting the propriety of a trade in corn, open to all nations in the world, subject only to a fair protecting duty, the committee proceeded to say—"In suggesting this change of system for further consideration, as a possible improvement of the corn laws at some future time, the committee are fully aware of the unsuitness of the present moment for attempting such a change, when, owing to the general abundance of the late harvests in Europe, and to the markets of this country having been shut against foreign corn for near 30 months, a great accumulation has taken place in the shipping ports on the continent, and in the warehouses of foreign corn in this country; and when that accumulation, from want of any vent, is held at very low prices, and might tend still further to depress the already overstocked markets of this country, if allowed to be introduced at this period, except at such a high rate of duty as it would be inexpedient to attempt, and moreover very difficult to determine. The present market-price of the corn thus accumulated, is not the measure of the cost at which it has been produced, or of the rate at which it can be afforded by the foreign grower, but the result of a general glut of the article, of a long want of demand, and of heavy loss on the part of those by whom it has been raised, and of those by whom it is now held either in the warehouses of the continent or of this country." It was, therefore, evident, that the difficulties which at present existed were fully contemplated by the committee four years ago. He would now, however, observe, that having said the present time was not the most fit for such an allegation, it was not for him to assert, that the whole of the difficulty would be removed by the next session. It was possible, that some vent might be obtained for the glut at present in the foreign market. If it should be absorbed, it would remove one great difficulty in meeting the question; if not, he for one, looking at the time which the present laws had been in operation, and the chance of having better information on the subject next session, would be prepared, when it arrived, to go into the full consideration of it with the view of providing some permanent measure. Difficulties he was prepared to expect; but they were not such as, in his opinion, might not be overcome. Looking back to another great measure—the law for regulating the currency of the country, against which insuperable difficulties were supposed to exist—he remembered what had been observed by an hon. member (Mr. Baring), that those seeming difficulties should not deter the legislature from coming back to the sound principles of political economy. That great measure was carried, and the result had fully justified the wisdom which dictated its enactment. So he trusted it would be found with the present question. He should in the next session be prepared to concur in some measure which would fix the duty at a certain rate, to be gradually reduced, so as that the supply from foreign countries might by degrees come to its fair level. He believed it was the intention of the legislature in 1821 to give to the British farmer a monopoly of the home-market, for a certain period, in order to redeem the great losses he had sustained; but, by the commencement of the next session, that period would have been sufficiently extended. He could not believe the stock on hand at home to be very great. Indeed, the high price at this season, induced him to think that the supply was little if any thing beyond the demand; and it was not at all improbable, that before the 15th of August next, if the corn laws were allowed to remain in their present state, we might before that period have the whole of the foreign markets pouring in their accumulations upon us. This was a circumstance, which for the sake of the country, ought to be guarded against. He would, therefore, take an early opportunity of submitting a proposition to the house, of opening the stores here, and allowing the bonded corn to enter the market; and after the admission of the hon. member, that 60s. would be a fair remuneration to the farmer, he thought that to this proposition there could be no objection. He could not look at the possibility of having the ports thrown open on the 15th of August to the glut in the foreign market, without feelings of apprehension as to the consequences; and if he could so arrange as to keep the price below that which would admit foreign corn, without keeping it too low, he thought he should be performing great service to the country. The quantity of foreign corn at present in bond in this country, was not so great as was imagined. It was estimated at 394,000 quarters of wheat, and a very small quantity of other kinds of grain. He was sure, that if any gentleman were to object to the admission of this corn, which was calculated to release a capital that had been so long locked up, he must take a very different view of this question from that which presented itself to his mind. It was not from any feeling of regard to the owners of the corn that he made this statement. They had speculated in the article, and must stand by the consequences of their speculation. They might have made a profit out of it; as things had turned out, they had sustained a loss. Considering, therefore, the charges which the parties had already paid upon this corn, and the loss which they had sustained, not only in being deprived of all interest on the capital which had been locked up by it, but also in being deprived of the use of that capital itself, he was sure that if they were now allowed to sell that corn at 80s. per quarter, they would be losers by such a procedure. The proposal which he should hereafter make to the house would be this—that the corn now in bond should come out at 70s. per quarter. Now the averages at the end of March, before this question began to be agitated, were 69s. per quarter, and before this time would have reached 70s. per quarter, had it not been for its agitation. He thought, that when the price of corn reached that sum, the house would not object to the admission of bonded corn into the market, on payment of a duty of 8s. or 10s. per quarter, especially as it would still leave the owners of it liable to a very considerable loss. They would not be at liberty to take it out of bond all at once; but as four months must elapse before the commencement of the next harvest, they would be at liberty to take it out in four quarterly portions, provided that if the whole of it were not withdrawn by the 15th of next August, the owners of it should be liable to all the conditions upon which it was originally imported. He thought that by such a system, the country would be saved from that revulsion which might otherwise take place, should a large importation of foreign corn take place before the month of August next ensuing. Another advantage which would arise from it would be this—that much of the accumulated corn in this country would be disposed of before the arrival of the period when the corn laws must come under the revision of parliament. He therefore thought, that there could be no rational objection to the details of the measure which he had just mentioned; he should bring it forward on an early day, and he trusted, that he should then be able to convince the house that a duty of 8s. or 10s. per quarter would be quite sufficient for the protection of the interests of all parties concerned in this great question. The house would not, he was sure, expect him to enter upon the views which government took as to the proper course to be adopted upon this subject. The reasons why such a mode of proceeding would be highly impolitic were so obvious, that he deemed it unnecessary to recapitulate them. He could not, however, refrain from dissenting from the language which had fallen from his hon. friend (Mr. Gooch), who had said, "The present law worked well; and why not let well alone?" Now he (Mr. H.) had always understood that the great desideratum in this question was to provide steadiness of price. But how did the present law provide for these ends? By limiting the markets from which we drew our supplies—by destroying the vent which we should otherwise have for our produce whenever we were blessed with a superabundant harvest—and by exposing us to an alternate fluctuation of high and low prices. To say of a system which affected the price of labour and the comforts of the labourer, and which cramped the resources not only of the manufacturer, but also of the farmer himself—that it worked well, was so completely refuted by the report of 1831, that he was surprised that any man should be bold enough to make it. What did they think of its working well in 1822, when corn was as low as 38s. per quarter (hear, hear), and when gentlemen came down to the house nightly to talk of a national bankruptcy, and to propose the most extraordinary changes in the currency? At the present moment it might work well; but had the country gentlemen forgotten their own misfortunes, their former predictions of ruin to the country,—nay, their repeated requests that this system, which now worked so well, should be instantly altered (hear, hear)? In two years, the price of corn had varied from 112s. to 38s. per quarter.—Such a fluctuation in price deprived the business of the farmer of all security, and converted it into a business of mere gambling. The mining bubbles could not produce more gambling than that to which such fluctuations must necessarily lead. The man who engaged in a long lease, could not at present be aware of the conditions upon which he was taking it, or of the results which it might produce upon his family arrangements. This was not the only inconvenience of the system. Look at the situation in which we were placed, when a bad harvest made it necessary for us to go to the foreign market. The price of corn immediately advanced there: the foreign Government, seeing our demand for it, laid a tax upon the article: this further increased the price—but he would pursue the description no further. To assert that this was "working well" was too gross a fallacy to be entertained for a single moment. An assertion had been made, that if the prices did fluctuate excessively, they still produced a fair average price. A fair average price! He wondered what this phrase meant, when applied to the provisions of the people. He should like to know how any gentleman, who was accustomed to eat a good dinner every day, would like to be kept one week without food, and to be supplied the next with twice as much as he wanted. Would he feel satisfied at being told that he had got a fair average quantity of provisions for each day in the two weeks (hear, hear, and a laugh)? He thought that the gentleman would not be satisfied—that he would find such an averaging system to be neither wholesome to his constitution nor pleasant to his stomach (hear, hear). But it was said that to withdraw our protection from the manufacturers of the country, and to continue it to the corn, was acting upon an erroneous system. He denied this position entirely, and contended, that reasoning from analogy in a case like the present must necessarily lead to an erroneous conclusion. In the first place we could manufacture cheaper than every other country; but every other country could grow corn cheaper than we could. In the next, although in 1775 the duty on cotton had been reduced 10 per cent, we still exported 30 millions of cottons annually. But did we export 30 bushels of corn? Then there was no accumulation of cottons on the continent, but there was an accumulation of corn. When there was an accumulation of cotton, the manufacturer could contract his supply; but could a similar measure be adopted by the agriculturist, when there was an accumulation of corn? Beside these considerations, there were several others, applying to agriculture, and not to manufactures, which were sufficient to convince any impartial man that the argument founded upon this analogy was any thing but logical (hear, hear). He was not one of those who wished to run the risk of endangering the constitution by lessening the rank which the landed interest held in the country. To be admitted into that class, ought to be the ambition of every man who by his industry and his talents had acquired a fortune for his family. He was quite willing, seeing that the rents had already adjusted themselves to the alteration in the currency, and to the improved condition of the country, to give any protection to the landed interest, which would obviate the necessity of any reduction in the relative situation which it now held with regard to the rest of the community. Still it was quite evident that there must be some limit at which foreign corn must be admitted into the country. The difficulty—and it was one which required all the attention of Government—was to see at what point the price of labour was likely to produce such a diminution of profit and of capital to the manufacturer as to compel him to seek protection in a foreign state. Capital and skill could not be compelled to remain in this country—they were certain to emigrate if they were impeded by burdens they were unable to bear; it was therefore the duty of the house to watch the effect of the price of labour on the advantages we at present possessed; and if gentlemen reflected that it was to the capital and skill which our manufacturers possessed that the agricultural interest owed its present prosperity, they would see that if their capital and skill were removed from us, the agriculturists in the long run must be the greatest sufferers. At this moment America, which procured the raw material more easily than we did, was manufacturing cottons so cheaply as to be driving our cottons out of the market. At this moment American cotton goods were on their passage to different ports in the Mediterranean, and were selling there at a price at which we could not afford to furnish them. If capital had not a fair remuneration here, it would seek for it in America. To give it a fair remuneration, the price of labour must be kept down to a certain point. An hon. member had stated, and almost as if it had been a reproach to them, that the workmen of London had roast beef and plum-pudding on Saturday, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday. He did not mean to assert that they had it not, and he had little doubt that they were accustomed to wash such dainties down by large draughts of the ancient and constitutional beverage, beer. Now he would wish the hon. member the next time that he presided at the Farmers' Club, to ask the members of it, whence came the roast beef, the plum-pudding, and the beer, on which the workmen banqueted, and what would be the condition of those who produced these articles, if the workmen could not procure money to purchase them? Agriculture could not flourish, unless all other classes in the country were in prosperity. Commerce and manufactures could not be sustained here, if they met with greater advantages in other countries. The profits now derived from them were smaller than they had been at any former period; and any thing which tended to increase them would be productive of great benefit. He mentioned this circumstance to prove, that it would be necessary to enter at a future time upon the revision of the corn laws; though he maintained, as he had before done, that the present was not the moment for commencing it. We had done a great deal already to promote the freedom of trade; but every thing could not be done at once. We had allowed the importation of wool, of iron, and of various articles which had formerly been prohibited; and the effect of that measure had been to produce a large importation of the prohibited articles. Some difficulty might arise, if we proceeded too far in such a system; and it was therefore prudent to wait awhile where we now were, to see whether such difficulty would arise; and if it did arise, how it was to be obviated. There were other considerations which deserved the notice of Government. We knew that several foreign countries were in some distress, owing to our exclusion of their corn, and that they had, in revenge, shut out our manufactures. It might be worth while to consider, whether we did not hold in our hands at present the keys of solving this difficulty—whether, to those who excluded our colonial produce and our manufactures, we had not a right to say, “We will not admit you to the benefit of a free trade in corn, unless you will at the same time admit the free introduction of our manufactures?” This was one of the principal reasons why he thought that this question might be permitted to stand over to a more convenient period. He was aware of the responsibility which was incurred by ministers in general, and by himself in particular, in recommending to parliament not to legislate on this subject at present. Circumstances might arise beyond the reach of human thought, which, by their effects and consequences, might induce him to regret that he had offered such a recommendation to it. The risks arising out of such circumstances were not, however, faults of his creation, but faults of the existing system. He was not shutting his eyes against them, but was judging from all the circumstances of the case, when he said that at present he thought it right to postpone the discussion of the corn laws to another session. He complained of the excessive speculation which was now going forward, not only in shares and companies, but also in foreign merchandize. Such speculation was the offspring of unnatural excitement; and in the body mercantile, as well as in the body physical, such excitement was generally followed by depression and exhaustion. He called upon those who to a certain degree were the controllers of the currency, to watch with care and diligence over the foreign exchanges; and implored the country banks not to lend their money to the encouragement of crude and hasty speculations. One of his great reasons for not letting the corn laws loose at present, was the excessive speculation which was now so prevalent. It had already deranged the foreign exchanges, and he wished not to derange them further by opening the door to similar speculation in foreign corn (cheering).

Mr. Baring agreed with the rt. hon. gent. as to the dangers which were to be apprehended from the disproportion between the price of food in this country and its price elsewhere; but he drew from the existence of those dangers a very different conclusion from that which appeared to have been drawn by the rt. hon. gent. It was necessary for us to look at the consequences likely to arise from that disproportion at a time when we could do so with coolness, and without alarm. He confessed, that after the speech of the rt. hon. gent., he was utterly at a loss to know what were the intentions of Government for the next year, or what ideas it wished to excite regarding them in the country. If such were the uncertainty prevailing among members who had heard the speech of the rt. hon. gent., what would be the uncertainty prevailing to-morrow amongst those who had not heard it, and who would only be acquainted with it through the medium of others? If any hon. member were asked by his constituents, to tell them what the intentions of Government were on this subject, could he answer the question? He admitted, that the agricultural interest of the country was entitled to protection from parliament, from having enjoyed it so long. But the indulgence ought to be limited by the prosperity of the country; for if its industry could not bear the monopoly of the agriculturists, the manufacturers must be distressed, and their distress would revert with tenfold force upon the agriculturists. If it were true, as he believed it was, that the inhabitants of England paid twice as much as those of France for their food, he should like to know what it was that enabled them to support that additional expense? Was it not their artificial industry? As soon as that was stopped, millions of paupers would be thrown upon the country, and the land would be burdened for their subsistence. Distress might fall upon the manufacturers at first, but it was certain not to be long in pressing on the steps of the agriculturist. Still desirous as he was of giving adequate protection to the manufacturer, he was not willing to withdraw it hastily from the agriculturist. He conceived that such a change would be pregnant with danger to the landed interests, and therefore he deprecated it. With respect to the amount of an importation price, he rather thought with the hon. member (Mr. Gooch) that about 60s. per quarter would be the mark. He concluded by urging the house to investigate the subject without further delay.

After a desultory conversation between Col. Wood, Lord Althorp, Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. Wodehouse, Mr. Calcraft, and others,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer insisted that had the Government taken up the question of the corn laws on the present session, they would, from the very nature of the subject, and its probable operation upon other matters connected with the affairs of the country, have been disabled from introducing and perfecting those other measures which were universally acknowledged to be of the most beneficial tendency to all classes of the people. This was, he thought, an answer to that branch of the argument. He acknowledged that he had been a party to the corn bill of 1810 which he had opposed in 1815. The reasons were, that the intervening years had produced results upon which no wisdom could have been calculated; and he had discovered, with many others, that the course of events was beyond parliamentary control. He had, then, no difficulty in retracting opinions which experience proved to have been founded in error. He could not allow that government was now to blame, or that it was bound to take this question up, because against its inclination it had been brought into discussion.

The house divided.—For the motion, 47; Against it, 187; Majority, 140.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.—Mr. Hume presented a petition from a district in the county of Devon, complaining of the enormous prices of provisions of all kinds, and expressing a hope that the duties on grain would be reduced to some such standard as would better enable the working classes to afford their labour at the present lowered rate of wages.

Mr. Maberly begged to call the attention of the house to a subject which he thought had not yet been sufficiently attended to by the house, but which was strongly suggested by the petition. Ministers had lately adopted a variety of regulations relative to the encouragement of our commerce and free trade in our manufactures. The result of all those arrangements would be, to let in the labour of the continent to compete with our labour. But how could cheap labour be long subsisted in England, while the prices of food were so excessive as they now were? How was it possible that our manufactures should long be able to contend with the manufactures supplied by the cheaper labour of the continent, while the high duties on imported corn were kept up at their present standard? Ministers should have paused before they ventured upon adopting such regulations in respect of our trade and manufactures; they should have considered the corn laws in the first place, and should now consider them, before they took any other steps in regard to our commerce. If this course were not immediately adopted, some very considerable evil would be sure to follow upon its neglect. The manufacturing gentlemen would soon discover the manufactures of the country not to be in so flourishing a state as they now were. We relied mainly on our skill, indeed; for as to manual labour, it was obvious that in that we should be undersold. But he would entreat gentlemen not to rely too implicitly even on our skill, for America possessed that quality too; and it was only on the preceding night that the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself had informed the house, that America could compete with our skill in the cotton manufacture. This subject was altogether of the most serious import.

Bonded Corn.—Canada Corn.

MONDAY, MAY 2.—On the motion that the house should resolve itself into a committee on the acts relating to the importation of corn,

Mr. Curwen trusted that the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson) in proposing to the house any measure on this subject, would state, upon some satisfactory grounds, that a want of corn was likely to be experienced; as that could alone, in his (Mr. C.'s) opinion, justify an alteration in the present system. He had no doubt that any regulation which should have the effect of preventing the averages from rising too high, would be beneficial to the country; but he repeated, that in order to justify any alteration, it ought to be made out that the home supply was not, or was likely not to be, equal to the necessary consumption.

Mr. Curteis said, it was the general opinion here and in Ireland, that the produce would be amply sufficient for all the wants of the country in the present year. To propose any alteration which should have the effect of reducing the present prices of corn would, he thought, under such circumstances, be a breach of faith with the farmers.

The house having resolved itself into a committee,

Mr. Huskisson wished only to bring before the consideration of the house, the law relating to foreign corn as it now stood, and the facts connected with that law, in order that they might both be distinctly understood. They were, then, simply these.—In the year 1815, an act was passed by which all foreign corn was prohibited from being admitted into the ports of Great Britain whenever the average price should be under 80s. per quarter. A subsequent act of 1822 left the last act unaltered, but it provided that foreign corn should be admitted when English corn had reached 70s. per quarter, upon payment of 17s. per quarter. This was the state of the law at the present moment, with regard to this description of corn. It had occurred to him, and also to others who had paid attention to the subject, that under the present circumstances, looking to the high prices which corn had reached, and to the deterioration which the corn now in the warehouses and under hand was likely to suffer, it was desirable that some facility should be afforded to the admission of that corn for home consumption, until the supply which the next harvest would afford should be available. This view was taken, not for the benefit of the holders, but for that of the public. No other consideration could have induced the government to recommend a departure from the present regulations which affected this branch of commerce. Now, with respect to the facts, he begged to remind the house that three weeks ago the price of English corn was 69s. per quarter. Since that period the price had been gradually rising. Hence he had a right to assume that the former low prices were the consequences of an unnatural stagnation, and that the rise had taken place owing to the time of year and the belief that no alteration was to be made in the existing laws, at least during the present year. With respect to the bonded corn, the holders might now bring it into the market when the average price was 70s. on payment of 17s. But those persons, under the expectation that prices must rise, would perhaps abstain from sending in their corn, because as they knew that they could always bring it in at 70s., on payment of the duty, they would believe that they might as advantageously release it at 80s. on payment of no duty at all. The object of the present regulation was, therefore, to induce the holders to bring the corn into consumption before the 15th of August next. He had been induced to fix the duty at 10s., believing that amount would be sufficient at once to secure the public, and to induce the holders to bring their corn into consumption; but he had heard that even with this duty, the holders would prefer to keep back their corn until after the 15th of August, in the hope that the average price would then have reached 80s. If, in the course of this discussion, the 10s. per quarter should be thought too high, and that it would defeat its object, he was not indisposed to lower it, for it was not a question of high or low duty, but of what regulation it would be most advantageous to adopt for the benefit of the public and the consumer. His proposition would be this—that the holder should have the option of bringing out his stock in portions of one-third at a time. There would be a space of three months between the passing of the bill and the 15th of August, when its provisions were to terminate. During this period the corn now in the warehouse was to be admitted upon payment of a duty of 10s. per quarter, after which the present regulations were again to come into force. The committee would therefore see that this measure, besides the objects he had mentioned, would accomplish that of preventing corn from reaching too high a price. The quantity of corn now in the warehouses, including a small quantity of barley and Canada corn, was about 400,000 quarters. The effect of its introduction must depend chiefly upon the supply at present in the country. In the year 1820, the introduction of a very small quantity of oats had depressed the markets very materially; and in the last year the same circumstance had produced no such effect. From the state of the markets throughout the country, as well as that of London, it was evident that there was a tendency to increase in the prices of corn. He was therefore entitled to contend that this introduction ought not to be complained of by the holders. Part of the wheat which it was the object of the measure to release had been in bond six years. Some of it had arrived here just at the period when the ports were closed in 1819, and other parts had been actually shipped at that period, and had been kept back by contrary winds, until after the passing of the act in that year. It was, however, wholly impracticable upon such a question to enter into a consideration of the interests of any individuals. The regulation was proposed solely upon public grounds, and however it might serve hereafter to point out any alteration in the corn laws generally, it was intended now to apply solely to the corn under bond. The other resolution which he had to submit was relative to Canada corn, of which there was now in this country about 20,000 quarters. It was, perhaps, hardly necessary to legislate upon that quantity, since it would be liberated by the operation of law, at 67s. per quarter. He should, however, propose immediately to set Canada wheat free, upon payment of a duty of 5s. per quarter. The freight could not be less than 14 or 16s. per quarter, and this would, probably, be quite a sufficient protection. He concluded by moving resolutions for carrying into effect the propositions he had submitted.

Mr. Baring concurred in the proposition before the house, and believed it would be a desirable and wise measure to let in this foreign corn. He thought it would be unwise to limit the period to the 15th of August, because the holders might not be disposed to bring in their corn until the last moment. He should rather it were restricted to a month or six weeks at farthest, which would be quite long enough for all useful purposes, and would prevent the speculations which the nearer prospect of the harvest might give rise to.

Mr. Bennet contended, that the admission duty on the bonded corn ought not to be less than 17s. a quarter. Say only that corn was imported at 32s., the duty of 17s., making 49s. would still be a bounty upon bringing it into the market. To let the bonded corn in at 10s. duty, would be to give a bonus to the importers of 140,000l., which might much better be added to the revenue for the year. Such a course would amount to little less than a breach of the understanding which had been entered into with the home grower.

Mr. L. Foster believed that the letting in the bonded corn at that moment, at any, and at whatever duty, would be the best thing that could be done for the benefit of the home grower. If once the ports were opened, which would certainly be the case if this measure did not pass, the whole six years' accumulation of wheat which was now lying in the ports of Prussia and Poland would be poured in upon us, and give a shock to the landed interest which it would be years in recovering. The corn to which he alluded was now selling on the continent for 20s. a quarter; freight and insurance included, it could be imported at 28s.; that was the evil that the agricultural classes really had to fear. The hon. gent. sat down by stating that he was in favour of letting in the bonded flour, as well as the wheat, but at a duty of 4s. per cwt., instead of 2s. 9d., which he did not think sufficient.

Gen. Gascoyne supported the admission of the bonded corn, and contended that it was an aid given to the land-owners, rather than any benefit to the public. He was of opinion that, even at 10s. duty, the corn let in would not be brought to market, but kept to take the chance of higher prices. He therefore moved as an amendment, that the admission duty should be 8s. only.

Mr. Sykes said, that it had never been intended that the revenue should derive any gain from the duty on corn; and the measure proposed was only one of justice, and of tardy justice, to the importers.

Mr. Ald. Thompson thought that there was

1,000,000l. of capital locked up in the bonded corn, which Government was bound to set at liberty the moment it could be done with safety. He should move, as a farther amendment, that the admission duty should be 5s. instead of 7s.

Col. Wood was opposed to the resolution because he deprecated any thing that looked like breaking in upon the corn laws. He had no fear of any advance which would be injurious to any party.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was in favour of bringing the bonded corn out at once, and thought that the sense of the house was decidedly in favour of the proposition of his rt. hon. friend. He would not support the resolution before the committee, if he thought it would have the effect of keeping the bonded corn out of the market, but he did not believe it would have that effect. He could assure the committee, that he did not recommend the 10s. duty in preference to the lower sum, for the miserable addition which it might make to the revenue, but for other considerations.

Mr. Maxwell said, he would admit that the British farmer had a right to expect a protecting duty equal to the tithes, poor rates, and those other imposts which pressed peculiarly upon him; but beyond this the house ought not to go.

Mr. Monck understood the high duties to be sought for for the protection of the country gentlemen, because, as the house was informed, they were men who lived on their estates, and spent their money in the country; and they were also most valuable to the state by acting as unpaid magistrates. Truly, all these were most important services, but he did not see that they were altogether unrequited. From the calculations which had been made, it appeared that the effect of the present corn laws was to raise the price of the quarter of wheat to 70s., and that without them it would not exceed 56s. Now, taking our consumption at 14 millions of quarters, as was contended by some hon. members, here was a duty upon the great body of the people of 14 millions, for the benefit of the country gentlemen. He did not mean to say that their services were overpaid; but after this, he hoped no man would assert that they were wholly unpaid (hear, hear). He should support the original resolution.

Mr. Western said, that if he concurred in the proposition at all, it would be in the terms of the original resolution. On the general question of the Corn Laws, he would observe, that on the whole the consequences had been beneficial to the country. Had it occurred, as was predicted, that the price would never be under 80s., if ever the corn bill passed? On the contrary, had not that price been lower since than it had been for some years before? He did not think those laws had been fairly dealt with. Hon. members had talked of the great fluctuations in price; but it should be recollected, that the high price of 112s. occurred while a free trade existed, and that the low price of 38s. was under the protecting duty.

Mr. Huskisson denied that the country was satisfied with the corn laws as they now stood. On the contrary, there was, he contended, a very general wish for their repeal.

The resolution was put, and carried without a division.

On the motion that all restrictive duties now in force on the importation of corn from our North American colonies should cease, and that there should be imposed in lieu thereof a duty of 5s. per quarter on all wheat imported from those colonies,

Mr. L. Foster contended, that without investigation, we had no data on which to decide whether 5s. duty was the proper sum at which importation from Canada should take place. That investigation had not taken place; and if in the absence of it hon. members were prepared to say that 5s. should be the duty at which corn should be imported from Canada, he did not see what should hinder them from going at once into the whole question, and deciding what should be the duty at which we might import it from Danzig. The price of wheat at present in Canada, they were told, was 38s., the expense of its transit across the Atlantic was 12s. per quarter, and the proposed duty 5s. which would make the quarter here 55s.; but what proof had they that 38s. was the average price in Canada? It might be much less for any thing the house knew at present on the subject. The hon. member then entered into a statement of the prices of corn in Amsterdam for the last five years, which showed that the average price in the whole of these years was not more than 32s. 7d.; and he contended that it could be imported at the same rate into this country. Under those circumstances, he did not think it would be wise to alter the laws with respect to the introduction of foreign corn. We had tried the extremes of prices. We had corn at a high price, and we saw the good effects of it operate on the manufacturer, who got a proportionately good price for the article of his trade. We had afterwards very cheap corn, and the manufacturers had to deal only with bankrupt customers. He concurred in the observation made by an hon. friend on a former evening, that 60s. or 60s. might be a fair remunerating price, but he did not think that, without some investigation, the market ought to be opened permanently to Canada corn at 55s.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that his hon. friend could not see why Canada should be excepted from the general rule with respect to the importation of foreign corn. Did his hon. friend consider that Canada was one of our colonies—that its inhabitants were our fellow-subjects (hear, hear)? If the argument of his hon. friend were of any force, might it not apply to a regulation by which (in 1806) we admitted Irish corn into this country (hear, hear)? What would his hon. friend say, if the same objection had then been made which he now made to the importation from Canada—and he could assure him there had been many who entertained apprehensions lest that measure should be found injurious to the corn trade of England? But had we no other motive for dealing with our North American colony? What had been the conduct of Spain to her colonies? Every thing which the most narrow policy could dictate she practised to check their prosperity. She prevented even the cultivation of the vine among them, and did all in her power to cramp their energies in every way; and what was the consequence? She lost them (hear, hear). Were we to imitate such an example? The Canadians had nothing, they could have nothing but their raw material to send us, and it was our interest and our duty to give them encouragement for its growth.

His hon. friend seemed to forget the vote which the house came to last year, for the purpose of enabling great numbers of the poor half-starved peasantry of Ireland to pass over to Canada in order to settle there, and that a similar vote was passed in the present year. Were we now, after having induced those unfortunate persons to emigrate, to turn round on them and say that we would give no further encouragement to their labours (hear, hear)? He trusted the committee would look on this subject with a more liberal feeling towards those parties at home and abroad who might be affected by it.

Mr. Newman was favourable to the importation of corn from Canada, but great precautions ought to be taken to prevent our receiving the corn of the United States instead of that of our own colony. He was informed, that in contemplation of the present measures, cargoes of corn had been sent from Europe, in order to be re-shipped from Canada to this country. Any attempt of this kind ought to be strictly watched.

Col. Wood could not concur in the resolution, for if they agreed to it, there was an end to the corn laws. By those laws it was enacted, that when corn reached 67s. heve, the market should be open for Canada corn at a fixed duty. Now, the fair way to deal with that would be to lower the opening price, but not to make that great departure from the corn laws, so as to say that at all times our market should be open to Canada corn at the low duty of 5s. All that the agriculturists wanted was a remunerating price, and it was the interest of all parties in the country that they should have it.

Mr. Baring supported the resolution on the ground that the real consideration with regard to the Canadas was that which had been stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was preposterous to suppose that corn would be sent from Danzig to Canada, and imported from Canada into this country. The freight would be so high as to render such a trade any thing but profitable. It was equally preposterous to suppose that it would be sent into Canada from the United States for such a purpose. In coming to Canada from the United States, it must cross a broad river; and it was almost impossible that in doing so it would escape observation.

Mr. Huskisson contended for the propriety of the resolution. The Canadas drew all their manufactured goods from England, and ought to be allowed to send us in return for them their staple, which was corn. At present they were allowed to send it here, but as soon as it arrived it was placed under lock, and remained useless until the markets reached a certain price. The consequence was, that the bills of the Canadian merchants had been protested, and our own manufacturers deprived of payment. He would ask, whether the Canadians ought to suffer such indignity; and whether it could be expected that they would long submit to brook it quietly?

Mr. Newman said that he was credibly informed that a vessel was at that moment chartered at Hamburg, to go to Canada with corn, which was afterwards to be imported into England. The idea, therefore, of such a trade was not quite so preposterous as the hon. member (Mr. Baring) seemed to suppose.

Mr. Lockhart opposed the resolution, and contended on the authority of Tacitus, that it was not the interest of the mother country to extend too much protection to the agriculturists of a colony. During a famine in the reign of Claudius, it was discovered that there were only 15 days' provision in Rome. This created considerable consternation, and Tacitus in describing it mentioned with great regret and indignation, that in consequence of certain immunities granted to the colonies, Italy, which had formerly exported corn to all her provinces, was left at the mercy of Sicily, Egypt, and Africa, for the daily support and maintenance of her inhabitants. He trusted that the rulers of this country would take a hint from the remarks of that author, and not leave England dependent on any foreign nation whatsoever for a supply of the most requisite necessary of human life. The resolution was then agreed to.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.—Mr. Huskisson moved the third reading of the Bonded and Canada corn bill. He was satisfied that the owners of warehoused corn would not fail to bring it into market before the next harvest, if they had an opportunity of doing so; because, if the corn in foreign ports should be imported, it would bring the price much lower than that which they could obtain for it now. With respect to what had been said about the importation of American corn, he had conversed with persons who were perfectly informed on the subject, and he found that during the time when corn was at the highest price ever known in this country, there never was more than fifty thousand quarters of Canadian corn imported. The lowest price at which corn of the United States could be landed at Montreal, including the expense of carriage, the risk, and the duty, was from 20s. to 25s. In order, however, to allay the fears of those who dreaded the importation of American corn, he had no objection to say, that if, during five years, the average importation of what was called Canadian corn should exceed 100,000 quarters, he would take that fact as evidence that there had been a fraudulent importation of American corn, and that it was necessary to adopt some measures to guard against it (hear).

Mr. H. Sumner wished a clause to be introduced into the bill, to limit the importation of Canadian corn to a hundred thousand quarters.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer begged to remind those gentlemen who supposed that large quantities of American corn would be fraudulently introduced into the home market, that the measure before the house was intended for the benefit of the Canadians themselves, who would therefore have an interest in preventing such a proceeding (hear). There were so many difficulties opposed to the fraudulent introduction of American corn, that he believed the thing was almost impracticable. In the first place, the corn must be brought from some port in Lake Champlain in an American ship, and be landed at Kingston, Montreal, or Quebec; it must then be put on board a British ship (for only in such a vessel could it be brought to this country from Canada); and before all this could be done, it was necessary that perjury should be committed over and over again, and the vigilance of the Custom-house be defeated, which would be somewhat difficult, seeing that a cargo of corn was a bulky article, and not easily transported, particularly in a country like Canada, where the roads were not very favourable, and the points of communication hundreds of miles from each other. If gentlemen would study the geographical situation of the two countries, they would find that there was no ground for their alarm.

Sir E. Kestchbull would not concur in either high or low rate. He did not think any alteration in the corn-laws was necessary.

Mr. Curlews deprecated the spirit of innovation by which ministers appeared to be animated. They seemed to be bitten by a strange sort of mania; not the hydrophobia certainly, for they wished to bring every thing across the water; but by an innovating mania, which in his opinion, was little calculated to promote the best interests of the country.

Mr. Whitmore observed, that there was very great misapprehension as to the quantity of corn imported into this country from Canada. From returns which he had seen, it appeared, that from the years 1800 to 1830, the annual average amount of wheat imported from thence did not exceed 23,000 quarters.

The bill then passed.

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 31.—The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for the house to resolve itself into a committee on the Bonded corn and Canada corn bill.

The Earl of Malmesbury feared that corn from the United States would be introduced into this country as Canadian corn. He would therefore move, that it be an instruction to the committee to omit so much of the bill as admitted of the importation of Canadian corn.

Earl Bathurst contended, that it was next to impossible that wheat could be clandestinely introduced into Canada, and thence imported into this country, under the pretence of its being Canadian produce. If it should ever happen, which he did not anticipate, that the quantity of grain imported from Canada should be so large as seriously to affect the interests of the cultivator in this country, there would exist no objection to revise the law which it was now proposed to enact.

The Earl of Lauderdale wished the bill to be divided into two parts. He could see no connexion between that part of the measure which related to bonded wheat and that which permitted the importation of Canadian corn. With respect to the latter subject, their lordships were called upon to legislate without being in possession of the requisite information. No return had been made of the price of corn in Canada since 1820.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that when he considered that it was impossible that the general question could be taken into consideration this session, he thought that the proposal with respect to bonded wheat would be advantageous to the consumer, and also to the landed interest. It would be advantageous to the consumer, because it would operate as a check upon the rise in price; and it would benefit the landed interest, because it would prevent the price advancing to such an extent as would authorise the opening of the ports, and thereby create a glut of the market. But he attached but little importance to that part of the measure compared with the other part, the object of which was to admit Canadian corn into this country on more favourable terms than had hitherto been allowed. He considered that measure to be most essential and sound in principle. Their lordships had been engaged, this session, and most wisely, in his opinion, in pursuing a system for the extending our commerce and trade, by getting rid of monopolies and restrictions. Did any man believe that it was possible to adopt such a system with respect to some articles, and to exclude from it the very article which, of all others, was the most important? The system of monopoly from which this country had recently been engaged in extricating herself, was not our fault. It was the system of the whole world. But now, when other countries were becoming free and independent with respect to trade, did it become us to act upon such a contracted, such a dangerous principle, as would lead us to withhold from our own colonies the benefit of a free trade? Even if parliament should determine to adhere to the present system of corn laws with the utmost rigour with respect to the rest of the world, he would advise that to our own colonies the benefit of a free trade should be extended. It was idle to contend that any inconvenience would result from the proposed measure; he thought the contrary would happen. The expense of freight and insurance on corn imported from Canada could not be less than 12s. The idea of the United States' corn being clandestinely introduced, was absurd. The price of corn fluctuated from 36s. to 40s. per quarter in that country—prices which would afford no temptation to the American exporter. It should be recollected that Canada took our manufactures, and we should therefore enable her to get the means of paying for them. He did not grudge Ireland any of the benefits which she enjoyed, but let their lordships consider the difference in the amount of taxes which Ireland and England paid. Even Poland, at the present moment, paid higher taxes than Ireland. He strongly advised those who were connected with Ireland not to adopt the principle of keeping down the colonies which were dependant on Great Britain. The free importation of corn from Ireland was not one of the conditions of the Union, but had been wisely established by acts passed since the Union. The importation of corn from Ireland was viewed with extreme jealousy when it was first proposed, but no inconvenience had resulted from it. When this was the case with regard to a country scarcely removed from this, and paying hardly any taxes, what danger or inconvenience could rationally be expected to arise from the importation of corn from Canada? He would have their lordships to consider where Canada was placed—to contemplate the prospects which were opening in other parts of America, and then to say whether Canada was not the colony, which of all others, ought to receive encouragement from the mother country. Every principle of free trade, of justice towards a dependency, and of sound policy, called upon their lordships to adopt the measure before them. The more he considered it, the more firmly was he persuaded that all the ideas of danger resulting from it were visionary.

The Earl of Rosslyn said, that the principle upon which the noble lord called upon their lordships to agree to the measure before them was, that of making a breach in the whole system of corn laws. He considered the measure as the first step towards the adoption of a system which would dissolve all existing contracts between landlord and tenant.

The Earl of Liverpool said that the noble lord who spoke last had completely misunderstood his argument. He had not contended for the adoption of the measure as opposed to the principle of the corn laws, but had called upon their lordships to agree to it as a favour to our own colonies, even if we should resolve to maintain our present system of corn laws against all the world.

The Earl of Limerick opposed the bill, the operation of which, he believed, would be no less injurious to the landed interest than to other national interests, which would, perhaps, engage more of the consideration of the house. The shipping interests, and the useful nursery for seamen which our coast-trade at present formed, would be destroyed by the admission of foreign corn in the way that was now proposed; and at some future time, when perils threatened our country, we should look in vain for that host of able defenders who had heretofore made our navy the pride of England and the terror of all the rest of the world. He saw no grounds upon which this measure was recommended, excepting by a vote of a public meeting of certain persons in the city of London. Now, with all possible deference, and with the highest opinion of the respectability of the persons composing that meeting, he thought, from their habits, and from the motives by which it might be reasonably supposed that they were swayed, that they were not the fittest judges upon this subject. As little was he disposed to coincide with the crude opinions of the professors of that new philosophy of political economy, no two of whom agreed in the doctrines of their sect. He resisted this vote, because he considered it as the advanced guard of an attack hereafter to be made on the general corn laws of the country.

The Earl of Enniskillen begged to call before the attention of the house the difficulties under which Ireland had so long laboured. The landed proprietor had been for many years compelled to live upon borrowed money; and now that those difficulties seemed to be removed in some degree, and the nation was recovering that prosperity to which it had so long been a stranger, an attempt was made to put an extinguisher upon it. The men of landed property ought to stand by one another. If they did not the landed interest would overwhelm them. He regretted to be obliged to oppose the measure, but he felt that he was compelled to do so.

The Earl of Caernarvon said, that whatever might be the objections to this alteration in the corn laws, it must in all cases be much better than the alternate effect of closing the ports altogether, and admitting corn without any restriction. With respect, however, to Canada, as there was no probability of these effects reaching the corn sent from that country, he thought this part of the question might be safely postponed until the next year, when the whole subject would probably come under the consideration of the house. He believed that an alteration of the corn laws would, upon the whole, be beneficial to the landed interest.

Lord Redersdale said, he was induced to offer his opinions on this subject to the house, chiefly because, as it appeared to him, one very important point had been kept out of their lordships' view. The constitution of this country was founded upon, and could never be safely separated from, the landed interest. To talk, therefore, of a free trade in corn, was at once absurd and dangerous. It was impossible that such a free trade could ever exist, consistently with the safety and prosperity of the kingdom. With respect to what had been said as to the trade with Canada, he, although he had every wish that the commercial advantages of that colony should be extended as far as possible, could not concur. The principle of admitting the corn grown in Canada, if it were once recognized, must be acknowledged to its fullest extent; and were their lordships prepared to say that they would admit all the productions of Canada on the same footing as those of this country? The landed interest of England, exclusive of the claim which its connexion with the very spirit of the constitution entitled it to, had also a right to protection, because it was more heavily assessed than any other description of property. Upon these grounds, then, he objected to the bill before the house; and even if these did not exist, he should object no less to any measure which might have the effect of placing the corn trade of England upon the same footing as that of any foreign country. He believed that to do this would be to adopt a false and dangerous policy, and one which was opposed to the soundest maxims of national economy. The land was, in his opinion, the foundation of all our wealth, and from it every other description of advantage flowed. This had been the idea entertained by all our old writers on political economy, and experience had proved that they were not mistaken. His lordship concluded by expressing his intention to oppose the bill.

The house then divided on the amendment—Content, 27.—Proxies, 7.—Total, 34.—Non-content, 24.—Proxies, 15.—Total, 39.

Further consideration of the subject was postponed to Monday next.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.—The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for committing the Bonded and Canada Corn bill.

Lord King would vote for the bill, which he hoped would be the forerunner of a better next year. The present corn bill had been passed many years ago, when we were said to be in a transition from war to peace. The transition, however, had lasted long, and 17,000,000*l.* of taxes had been reduced without any alteration in the corn laws.

The bill was then committed.

The Earl of Malmesbury, though he objected to this measure, disclaimed any wish to raise his rents, which had been imputed to the landlords (by Lord King). He then proceeded to object to the clause under consideration, on the ground that it did not afford sufficient protection to the English farmer. The proposition was founded on the new principles of free-trade, which never could be applied to the productions of the land. His lordship concluded by moving that the clause be omitted.

Lord Lifford, in opposing the clause, disclaimed acting in the spirit of a monopolist. As manufacturers became informed, they would see that their interests were intimately connected with those of the agriculturists.

The Earl of Liverpool would not, at present, say one word on the general question of a free corn trade; but even those who most strenuously argued the expediency of such a system, never laid it down without reserving some protection for the agriculturists. He contended, however, that a liberal system was attended with no danger whatever from America; the waters of the Atlantic were a sufficient security against that. The average importation from Canada for twenty years was 16,000 quarters annually; the largest quantity that had been imported from thence in any one year was 47,000 quarters: if this bill were to pass, many years must elapse before 100,000 quarters could be imported. It had various difficulties to contend with; the duty was 5s., and the insurance and freight was 12s. 6d., besides which, the trade was shut up for six months in the year, and confined exclusively to British ships. So far from being injurious in its consequences to agriculture, he maintained that this measure would be beneficial to it, and therefore it was most extraordinary to him that any prejudice should exist against it. But, on the other hand, had any noble lord reflected on the immense importance of Canada to this country? Between one-fourth and fifth of the whole mercantile navigation of this country was employed by Canada; in addition to which our trade with that country was one of the main props of our navy, for from it were taken all the best and hardest of our seamen. But by a narrow and contracted policy towards Canada, their lordships would throw all that navigation into the United States. Canada was not poor; she prospered, and he trusted she would continue to prosper; but he wanted to make her feel that she prospered by her connexion with Great Britain; and at the same time he wished to make their lordships feel the importance of not throwing away the advantages which she afforded to this country. He was satisfied to alter the duration of the clause to three years, which would afford them an opportunity of judging of the objections to it; for he confessed that nothing could cause him more severe disappointment than their rejection of this measure. He objected to its being limited to one year, although he hoped that all the corn laws would undergo revision next year; but this, he contended, ought to be taken separately from the others, for Canada stood on distinct grounds. Let the general corn laws be taken upon their own merits; but this measure, he was satisfied, was right and expedient.

The Earl of Lauderdale could not consent to the clause without further information.

Lord Dacre objected to the clause on the ground of such information as he had received. He contended that in enacting this clause, they were legislating not for Canada, but for the United States; for the United States would have no difficulty in smuggling their corn into Canada along the lakes. The house was therefore enacting that the whole produce of the United States might be imported, at an inadequate duty, into this country for three years to come. He hoped, therefore, their lordships would pause before they passed a measure that might be followed by the destruction of agriculture.

In a conversation between the Earls of Malmesbury and Liverpool, with respect to the duration of the measure, the latter first said he would accept two years instead of three, and then that he would be satisfied that the measure should only continue for one year, and to the end of the then next session: upon which Lord Malmesbury withdrew his motion for the omission of the clause.

The Earl of Lauderdale then moved that the certificate which was required by the bill as to the corn being the produce of Canada should be given by the grower and owner of the grain. The clause was agreed to, as was the rest of the bill.

Foreign Corn.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—Mr. Wodehouse moved, that an address be presented to his Majesty, requesting that he would be pleased to direct the Consuls abroad to continue their attention to the prices of foreign corn; and that it was expedient on all accounts to ascertain the amount at which that corn might be placed free on board ship, together with the charges of freight, and the length of time necessary to carry such corn to this country, and also every particular relative to the course of exchange, and the nature and condition of any restraint upon the exportation or importation in the ports where they might be respectively resident.

Mr. Huskisson observed, that if these returns, when they should be obtained, did not contain all that he expected or wished upon the subject, it must be referred to the extreme difficulty of getting accurate information. There were, however, some small ports in which no consuls were resident, and from them, of course, no information could be obtained. For his own part, he was so desirous to do all that was possible on this subject, that if any hon. gent. would favour him with his wishes on it, and the mode in which he desired them to be effected, he would give to them every facility in his power. He anticipated, however, that some difficulty would be experienced in making the returns; because, owing to the existing restrictions, there was no exportation at all in many of the ports where we had consuls; and although there were large quantities of corn in the granaries, it would be almost impossible to ascertain the price at which it could be put on board ship.

Mr. Benett trusted that the returns would enable the house, from the price of foreign corn, to regulate that of this country.

Mr. T. Wilson doubted whether the information, when obtained, would be useful. He thought the restrictions, which had been so long exercised in this country, had had such an effect upon others, that a different ratio of prices existed abroad, and that they could therefore never be made available for the purpose of fixing the price of corn at home.

Mr. Whitmore expressed himself favourably towards the motion, and thought that it was highly desirable that all possible information should be obtained before it was attempted to legislate upon the subject. The more recent that information was, the more valuable it must of necessity be; but he could not help cautioning hon. members against supposing that these returns would enable them to ascertain the average prices of foreign corn. The amount of freight too, at a time when there had been little or no exportation, would not lead to the amount when the exportation should be increased.

The motion was agreed to.

Distillery Laws.

Mr. Western asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was his intention to proceed with his plan for allowing rum to come into competition with the barley spirits of the country, and, if it were, upon what view he objected to the barley spirits? He put this question because a considerable alarm had been created upon the subject, not only among the distillers, but also among the barley-growers.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer repeated that it was his intention to propose, in some stage of the Distillery bill, the insertion of certain words, of which the effect would be to allow rum to be rectified, and that the difference which he proposed to make in the duty between Bri ish spirits and rum would be 1s. 3d. per gallon. Though the distillers stated that this proposition would be ruinous to them, the rum-dealers, for whose benefit he proposed it, also said that it would be mischievous to them. He thought that he was right, as he now stood, between the two extremes. He should propose to make this alteration in the Distillery bill to-morrow.

Sir J. Sebright and Sir J. Wrottesley asked the rt. hon. gent. to foreign the measure till next session, in order that he might conciliate all parties to it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: If the hon. baronets had as much to do with adverse parties as he had, they would see that if he waited till he could see both parties satisfied with these measures, or even one of them, he should stand stock-still for ever (a laugh).

MONDAY, JUNE 13. — The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day, for the house resolving itself into a committee, for the further consideration of the report on the Distillery bill.

Mr. W. Smith condemned the bill as one with which the Irish would be dissatisfied—which would be unjust to the English, and of which the Scotch would have just cause to complain. Under these circumstances, he conceived the rt. hon. gent. ought to agree to a postponement of the measure. If it was now carried, the English distillery would sustain a loss of at least one hundred thousand pounds.

On the clause for permitting distillers to convert rum into gin being proposed in the committee,

Mr. Western objected to it on the ground that it would have an injurious effect on the barley-growers of England. He contended also, that it would give an unfair and unnecessary preference to the productions of the West India colonies, and that it would be severely felt by the whole of the distillery trade. He concluded by moving as an amendment, that the words "other than rum" be inserted in this clause, which would have the effect of exempting that spirit from its operation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipated no such injurious consequences from the permission which this clause would give to distillers to convert rum into gin. He was quite convinced, in the first place, that it would not be disadvantageous to the barley-growers. The process of converting rum into gin was not very easy, nor could it be effected without considerable cost as well as care. He did not, therefore, apprehend on this account, as well as on that of the duty, that it would injure the English distillery trade. That it would be beneficial to the interests of such of our colonies in which rum was manufactured was quite obvious, and he thought these colonies were fairly entitled to the advantages of this alteration in the law. A system had been acted upon towards them during the war, which, if it were then necessary, had become so no longer. The treatment which we—like most other countries that had colonies—had used towards them, instead of being that of a mother country, as we were fond of calling ourselves, was that of a step-mother (hear). He thought, upon every ground of justice, that the colonies were entitled to this facility in disposing of their produce, and the more so, as it would not, he believed, interfere with the interests of this country. He therefore opposed the amendment.

The committee then divided—For the amendment, 43—Against it, 81—Majority, 38.

The house then resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

Country Banks.

COMMONS, WED. JUNE 22.—Mr. Hume presented a petition from Mr. Frederick Jones, complaining that he had demanded payment in gold for certain notes of the Castle Bank of Bristol, and was told by the clerk that it was not convenient to get at the gold then, and must call another day, at the same time tendering Bank of England notes in payment. The petitioner complained of this refusal to pay in gold, and said that upon consulting his legal adviser, he found he had no remedy but an action at law, on which he might not obtain judgment for nine months, and then be put off still further by a writ of error, or some such dilatory course. The hon. member observed, that the house must be aware of the operation of the currency upon the price of every article in the market, and that political economists attributed the fluctuation of general prices to some alteration which was effected by the working of the currency. He was aware that Mr. Ricardo was of opinion that every thing which could be expected, would be accomplished in the system of the currency, when the country banks were paying in Bank of England notes, which were convertible into gold upon demand. His own wish however, was, that even before the close of the present session of Parliament, a bill should be brought in to place country banks upon the same footing as the Bank of England—namely, that they should pay in gold on demand. This would have a twofold effect: it would tend to check the evil of an over-currency, and at the same time to prevent the tedious delay of a law process for the recovery of a debt which ought to be paid on demand.

Mr. John Smith never heard a more singular petition than that just offered by his hon. friend. Instead of their being a difference between the country banks and the Bank of England as to the payment of their notes, the law was the same for both. He admitted that no country banker did or could keep by him, gold sufficient to satisfy all the notes he might have in circulation; but country banks were unquestionably liable to pay in gold on demand, and he never knew an instance in which they were not ready to do so. Indeed, it would ruin the credit of any country banker to refuse such cash payments, and he was at a loss to understand the object of the petitioner.

Mr. Brougham was equally astonished at the petitioner's complaint, for he knew that the country banks were liable to pay in gold, as well as the Bank of England, since the passing of the last act. What necessity was there, therefore, for a new law? The petitioner complained that in default of payment he had no remedy now but an action at law. Why, what other remedy could he have if a new law were passed? Indeed, a new law would be an evil, for it would raise a doubt upon that which was, he thought, perfectly clear at present; for beyond all doubt, a country banker was bound to pay in specie on demand.

Mr. Hume was informed that the interpretation of the new act, was such as to deprive the claimant of a right to that prompt arrest which existed at common law before.

Mr. Huskisson said that there was no doubt of the immediate responsibility of every banker in issuing a 20s. note.

Mr. Hume consented to withdraw the petition till he made strict enquiries concerning the facts and the parties concerned.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Mr. Hume reverted to the petition of Mr. Jones: he had since ascertained that the statements in the petition were correct. He really thought that our currency ought by no means to be permitted to remain in its present state; for while it did it could not be contended that it was a gold currency, as it ought, and was intended to be. The condition it was in had already led to a considerable rise of prices. By the 37th of Geo. III. c. 52, s. 3, commonly called the cash suspension bill, it was provided, "that if any person, being liable for the payment of any such notes and draughts as might be issued in pursuance of that act, should object to pay the sum thereon becoming due, in specie, within the space of three days after demand made by the holder, it should be lawful for justices of the peace, magistrates of the session, &c. upon complaint to that effect being made to them, to summon every such person; and after examining parties and witnesses on oath, they were empowered, if the complaint should be established to their satisfaction, to award the sum due;" and such sum, with costs not exceeding 25*l.* in default of payment, might be levied by sale and distress on the goods, &c. of the party proceeded against. In a subsequent bill this valuable clause had been unfortunately omitted—he meant in Mr. Peel's bill relative to the re-establishment of the currency. Such being the case, he thought the house ought not to lose a moment's time in re-enacting it. It was calculated that 99*l.* out of every 100*l.* issued in notes, was issued in country notes; and the consequence was, that in the country there was little or no gold to be got. He was sorry that he did not at that moment see the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Peel) in his place, for he would only on this topic beg to refer the rt. hon. gent. to his own definition of a currency in the well known act, usually called Mr. Peel's bill. It was quite clear to his (Mr. H.'s) mind, that the country bankers' paper which was afloat had nothing of that character which attached to "currency" in the sense in which that term was used in the act he spoke of. His reason for again moving that this petition be brought up was, that it regarded a matter of extreme importance to the country at large.

Lord Folkestone thought that the petition contained matters of very grave consideration on general principles. It stated a fact that he could not help considering as a grievance of very great magnitude. When Mr. Peel's bill was passed, he understood that the currency was restored to a proper state; in fact that every man might get gold in exchange for his bank-notes if he pleased. Either from some failure in that act, or some misapprehension of its provisions on the part of the bankers, its effect had not been such. Here was a petitioner who held a certain quantity of notes issued by a banker at Bristol. For these notes the petitioner had demanded payment in gold, as he believed 99 out of every 100 persons would conceive themselves entitled to demand in such a case. Now, however, it appeared they would not be so entitled. An hon. gent. had suggested, that in case of refusal on the part of the banker, the applicant would have his remedy at law. Now he had been told, that a party's action, should he ever choose to bring one, could not be tried for some eight or nine months; and should the case be decided by that time, the bankers might then obtain a writ of error, and so put off payment for a year and a half longer. The case, therefore, stood thus. In June, 1825, Mr. Jones, being in want of gold, applies for it to certain bankers in exchange for their own paper; they refuse to comply with his demand; he is left to his remedy at law, and such is the state of law, that he may expect his remedy and his gold about March or April, in 1827. He had been interrupted by an hon. friend, who told him, that any body who chose could get gold in exchange for his Bank of England notes, on application at the Bank of England. Why, so he could, no doubt; but was every man in want of gold for some 6*l.* or 7*l.* in notes, for example, to travel up to London, some hundreds of miles perhaps for that purpose? He thanked the hon. gent. for having introduced this petition; and expressed his hope that ministers would feel it incumbent upon them, even at this late period of the session, to bring in some measure that should give operation to that clause in the cash payments' suspension act, which had been unfortunately omitted in the later statute of Mr. Peel.

Mr. H. Gurney said that the conduct of the parties complained of was exceedingly absurd. They had done that which scarcely any other men in the same capacity would be so foolish as to do; they had refused seven sovereigns for seven of their own notes; although every country banker must know, that on demand he must pay his own notes in gold. The noble lord was mistaken in supposing that the delay he had described could take place in exchanging notes for gold; at the utmost, it could only extend to the time which would elapse between the sending to London for gold, and the arrival of a remittance in that currency. The situation of our currency at this moment he considered to be less satisfactory than he had ever before known it to be. When Mr. Peel, a few years since, brought in his bill, it had the effect of making money scarce, and, by consequence, increased the issues of country bankers. For his own part, he should have liked to have seen the currency put on such a footing, that gold alone should have circulated through the country. If one pound notes were permitted at all, they should be restricted to the issue of the Bank of England. While individuals, in the country, were allowed to issue one pound notes, as they were allowed to do at present, it was obvious that the issue of gold must be, in a great measure, confined to London.

Mr. Ellis concurred in thinking that our currency was scarcely ever in a less satisfactory state. If a war, or a bad harvest, or any other event, which might shake the credit of the country, should occur, the government would be under the necessity of allowing the commercial pressure, that must ensue, to go on without any remedy; or of renewing the suspension of cash payments. Much of the present evil was occasioned by permitting the issue of 1*l.* and 2*l.* country bank notes. The general circulation of the country consisted of 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes (no, no). He might be wrong; but in Scotland, and in most of the northern parts of England he had visited, whenever he wanted change for a 5*l.* note, he could only get notes of 1*l.* Suppose in any case of emergency, such as he had mentioned, a great demand for gold should be made by the country banks on the Bank of England; how would the latter meet that demand? They could not take their mortgages or their Exchequer bills into the market; and unless they had gold in their coffers, he was at a loss to know how they would contend with such a difficulty.

Mr. J. Smith: When it was said that 99*l.* out of every 100*l.* in the circulation of the country, consisted of 1*l.* notes, he hardly knew how to express the surprise with which he listened to such a statement. He would venture to state—and circumstances had enabled him to form some opinion on the subject (hear)—that 5*l.* and 5 guinea notes, and not 1*l.* notes, comprised a very large proportion of our circulation. The case set out in this petition originated in a quarrel between the petitioner and the banker at Bristol, who, most illegally, and imprudently, he must say, refused to give gold to the party in exchange for the notes of the firm. It seemed to be insinuated in the speech of his noble friend that such a practice might be commonly resorted to amongst bankers; but he begged most explicitly to deny the imputation. In respect to what had been said about the currency of the north of England, he could assure the house that in Lancashire, where the greatest amount of wages was paid of any county in England, the whole was paid in specie. He himself was one of those who felt no fears at all about the condition of the currency (hear). How should it happen that the greatest commercial country in the world could be in want of specie? There could be no doubt of our having a sufficiency as long as our commerce should exist; or of our retaining it until some such calamity should befall us as the wit or powers of man should prove unavailing to oppose. With respect to the alleged evil, he saw no necessity for any remedy, as some gentlemen had proposed. In point of fact, if a man came to him, as a banker, and asked him at once for his balance, he was not, in law, bound to pay him. But his credit—that upon which alone he existed—what, in such a case would become of that? No man would trust him a second time. This was a delicate subject; and when he heard hon. gentlemen throw out such imputations as they had done, especially at a time when, from the great amount of our exports lately, the exchanges, though not absolutely against us, were, if any thing, a little on the wrong side, he could not but deprecate the introduction of so many extraneous topics. He did not believe there were three country bankers in the kingdom who would refuse gold for their notes. It was not clear that under any circumstances, it would be possible for us to divest our circulation of paper currency of a small amount; and if possible, he regarded such a measure as one of more doubtful utility than those hon. members who had preceded him.

Mr. Abercrombie thought that this was not a question that properly involved all those numerous extrinsic considerations into which hon. gentlemen had so largely entered (hear, hear). The main question was, indeed, important. If bankers refused to pay in gold, when asked for it, they might occasion a good deal of inconvenience. If the existing law were so defective as his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) had stated, the country banker could be little apprehensive of a demand for gold, because a large proportion of those who held the notes would rather submit to the inconvenience of retaining them, than sustain actions against the bankers, which might be prolonged to the extent that had been suggested. Thus the check on the issue of notes, by their immediate convertibility, would be so far lessened. By the act of 1797, if the issuer of a note refused payment in gold, he might be summoned before a magistrate and compelled to pay in three, and afterwards in seven days. So the law remained till 1816. But the act of 1822, permitting the issue of one pound notes, omitted this salutary proviso. This omission should be immediately supplied. It was immediate convertibility, and that alone, which constituted our security under the present system of currency; and he earnestly recommended the house to resort to the proviso of 1797.

Mr. Peel, after recapitulating the statement contained in the petition, observed that he was sorry that the hon. member (Mr. Ellice) thought the circulation to be in so bad a state, and prophesied so darkly of its future condition. He could not help imagining that the circulation was in a much more satisfactory state than it would have been had parliament adopted the suggestions of the hon. member, or those of the member for Essex (Mr. Western) who wished for an adjustment of all contracts between buyers and sellers. As to the policy of entertaining a measure on this subject, it certainly appeared to him that it would be invidious to introduce one, on a matter where so many interests were concerned—particularly as the banker had admitted his error, and allowed his liability to pay in gold. If the banker did not so pay, the law would compel him; although if he were asked at what period, after demand, he was not prepared to answer the question.

Mr. Maberly said, if the complaint of the present petitioner were received, the house would be bound to receive the petition of every tradesman who chose to make application to that house, because he could not, on the moment, procure gold for a bank-note, or for any legal written instrument, promising to pay a certain sum of money on a certain day. The house had been called on to enact a summary measure on this subject. Such a measure would alter the whole of the law between debtor and creditor, and was one of the most monstrous propositions he had ever heard since he had the honour of sitting in that house (hear). If the house received this petition, they ought at all events to listen attentively whilst it was read.

Mr. Canning had not the shadow of a doubt on his mind, that, as the law at present stood, the country banker was as much liable to pay his notes in gold, as the Bank of England (hear). It was asked, under what law? He would answer, under that general law of the land which made gold a legal tender (hear). It had been said, that a protection was taken away, by the omission of a clause which existed in the Bank Restriction Act. But he begged the house to recollect the history of that whole transaction. The small circulation was first enacted under the Bank Restriction Act; and in order that it might be satisfactory, it was placed under a new sanction. And why? Because the general sanction of the law, which compelled the banker to pay in gold, was suspended. It became necessary to protect the holders of notes under the new system by a farther enactment—that enactment being the clause which had been referred to. But the law suspending cash payments was done away with—the machinery of that part of the Bank system no longer prevailed, and the old law was in full force and effect, by which every bill or note, purporting to represent a sum of money, should be paid in gold. That law being revived, there was no species of bank circulation that required, or could have, a better sanction. The same law applied to all paper issues, whether of the Bank of England or of private bankers; and any attempt to discriminate between them would only produce confusion (hear, hear). This short statement of the case, had been greatly perplexed by his hon. friend the member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice), who had thought this a convenient opportunity for harking back on the opinions he had broached a few years ago, on the subject of the currency. He concluded by expressing his satisfaction with the system now in operation (hear, hear).

Mr. Baring observed, that the objection was, that though the system was continued as far as regarded the small notes of country bankers, the summary remedy had been destroyed. Thus far, therefore, the country had not returned to its ancient state. He was of opinion, that this summary remedy ought to be revived more for the sake of the principle, than for any practical advantage to be gained by it, for practically he was ready to allow that it was not necessary. It ought to be recollected, that the country bankers were persons to whom a privilege was given, and the public ought to enjoy a corresponding protection. The restoration of cash payments would be imperfect, and the country liable to great convulsions, if it were not more saturated with gold than at the present moment. The quantity was now too small, and it could not bear the occasional contraction and expansion to which it might be exposed. For instance, the country might be called upon to expend three, four, or five millions upon grain, and this sacrifice could not be made with ease when the whole of the sum must come out of the coffers of the Bank of England. Should Government next year bring forward a proposition for putting an end to the issue of small notes in the country, he should meet it with great approbation. Formerly great injustice had been done between debtor and creditor by tampering with the currency, and though Ministers had done rightly in risking the great experiment of a change, much distress and ruin to individuals and families had attended the change. Neither side of the house had reason to be proud of the part it took in that proceeding.

Mr. Huskisson: When the Bank resumed its payments in specie, it was found highly desirable, for public convenience, to continue in some degree the issue of small notes. The question was not now, whether those issues should be allowed; but whether a special remedy should be given to the holders. The power to issue notes, under proper authority, had long, and still existed in Scotland, and never was assisted there by any special protection to the holders. When the restriction on the payment of cash by the Bank of England took place, it was necessary that there should be a power of levying, by summary process, the amount of the notes on the goods of the issuer, if he refused to pay in gold or notes of the Bank of England. But the moment that restriction had been removed, the remedy had ceased to be necessary. At present, if a summary process were applicable to 11. notes, why not to 51. notes (hear)? In the county of Lancaster there were no 11. notes; but there was an issue of bills, and other securities of a like description, far under 51., to a very large amount, and the only remedy of the holder was at the ordinary law. That law was perfectly clear. It was this—that there was no legal mode of satisfying the holder of a note, except through the medium of the legal coin of the realm. This, he thought, was as good a state of security as any country could afford, or boast of. As to the amount of notes, that was another question—the amount of the note had nothing to do with the payment in specie. He remembered, that when the Cash Payments bill was brought in, an attempt was made to introduce a clause, that the payment of country notes in Bank of England notes should be deemed satisfactory. He, however, resisted that clause; and it was then distinctly understood—though now it seemed to have been forgotten—that there was no legal tender for debts contracted in any shape, except in silver coin of the realm, to the amount of 20s., and above that sum in the gold coin of the country. The petition was then laid on the table.

Usury Laws.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, FEB. 8.—Mr. Sergeant Onslow rose, to bring in a bill to repeal the usury laws. He did not feel himself called upon to say any thing in defence of it, since the house had shown their approbation of it in a division during the last session, when there appeared 120 for it, and only 23 against it. Though this bill was ultimately defeated, he had heard no solid objection to it. He had, indeed, heard several predictions of the evil consequences which might arise from it; but his opponents were bound to prove that the probable advantage would not be greater than the apprehended mischief. The state of the money-market was at present such as to obviate many of the inconveniences which were formerly anticipated from his bill, and therefore he trusted that those gentlemen who had formerly opposed it would now withdraw their opposition.

Mr. Davenport declared his intention of opposing the motion, as he considered the learned sergeant's bill would involve the landed interest in ruin.

Mr. J. Smith was sorry to observe a disposition to oppose this bill, supported as it was by arguments at once clear, distinct, and unanswerable (hear, hear). The bill was lost last year, through the courtesy of his learned friend. It was deferred not once or twice, but a dozen times at least, to meet the convenience of the gentlemen who opposed it; and the result of this conciliatory conduct was, that they assembled one night, when no discussion was expected, and threw it out by dint of numbers.

Mr. Curwen would hold by the old laws, and would even propose to enact them, if they did not exist, in consequence of the numerous speculations now abroad, which were such as to stagger credibility. If he were rightly informed, these speculations would require a capital of 160,000,000l. to carry them into effect.

The house then divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 52—Against it, 45—Majority, 7.

THURSDAY, FEB. 17.—Mr. Sergeant Onslow moved the order of the day for the Usury Laws' Repeal bill.

Mr. Calcraft thought the present state of the money-market, where every man who wanted capital could obtain it on convenient terms, was alone a sufficient reason against altering the law. He admitted the general principle of leaving men to dispose of their property as they thought fit; but this rule was not without an exception. The building act compelled men to build their houses with party-walls of a regulated thickness. By the law with respect to gaming, a man was prevented from doing what he pleased with his money; he might not lose it at play, nor open a house with it, in which others might lose their's. If men might be left to use their own property as they pleased, why was the Lord Chancellor now engaged in introducing a bill to repress that species of speculation of which so much had lately been on foot? In referring to history, it would be found that in proportion as the regulations of the rate of interest had been enforced by statute, in that degree had the country flourished. He would admit that in difficult times, men might be driven to those straits in which these laws would be inconvenient. Those, however, were emergencies against which the law could not provide. As to the insurance and annuity process, which it was said this bill would remove, he believed that the transactions of that kind were very few. And then was it nothing that under these laws the country had flourished and attained its present greatness?—He concluded by observing that he thought the mischievous tendency of the bill, and the utility of the usury laws, was established by the evidence of Messrs. Dunn, Rothschild, and Preston.

Mr. Hume was of opinion that the repeal of these laws would be followed by similar advantages which had ensued on the partial removal of the restrictions on the Irish trade. It was argued that the repeal of those restrictions would have been ruinous to the country, but when only a part of them had been abrogated, the beneficial result was so manifest, that almost all the Irish merchants petitioned for their entire removal. With respect to the speculations now afloat in the city, he was ready to admit that all those should be discountenanced, in which men of rank and station in the country having embarked, induced others to follow their example, and then shifted their responsibility on the public (hear, hear). To that extent he discountenanced these projects; but if the interests of commerce required projects of public improvement; to say that the parties should be compelled to pay up at once three-fourths of the money, which, perhaps, might not be required for ten years, was absurd (general cheers). With respect to the question before the house, it had been said that no complaints were made against the existing laws. Why what did that prove? Formerly it was urged, that the alteration was inexpedient when the rate of interest was high. Why now then was the very time when the rate of interest was low; and if the accumulating process should go on in this country, as there was every prospect of its doing, he saw no reason to think that during his life time the rate of interest would ever reach five per cent. He had stated on a former occasion that if, when the general rate were five per cent, it should be possible for the landed interest, by force of law, to borrow at three, the difference would be a bonus to them:

and he would add that the facility of borrowing money, with a certainty of not being called on, made them involve themselves much more deeply, than if they were subject to the fluctuations of the market. If he were to propose that his hon. friend (Mr. Calcraft) should take no more than fifteen shillings an acre for his land, what would his hon. friend say, on his present principles? He, for his part, was quite certain that the only reason why his hon. friend did not charge 10l. an acre, was the apprehension of not being paid for it (a laugh). It was just the same in the case of money, and the same rule should apply to all.

Mr. Cripps opposed the bill, on the ground that the country had flourished under the existing law.

Mr. J. Smith said, the same argument might be applied to every measure of improvement. If a bill were brought in to make a new turnpike-road, it might be argued that the country had prospered without it, and therefore it was unnecessary. Such an argument was not worthy of notice. The question was, was the repeal useful or hurtful? All other arguments were idle. In his opinion the restriction was mischievous. Money, like other commodities, would obtain its value; and if a law settled the rate at which the use of it was to be paid for, below its value, its owners would find means for evading the law. Take, for example, the case of a tradesman who was pressed for money, and supplied his immediate wants by drawing a bill, and had no means of taking up the bill when it became due. What did he do? Why he went to the banker or holder of the bill, requested him to keep it another week, and offered to pay for the accommodation. If this man could have borrowed the money of his neighbour, at six or seven per cent., he might have got it, and been saved from this sort of ruin. This question had been agitated for several years, out of the house, and there, at least, it was finally settled.

The Solicitor General began by saying that he met the hon. gent. (Mr. J. Smith) entirely on the ground of utility, and would endeavour to shew, that on this ground the law ought not to be repealed. Borrowers might be divided into three classes—mercantile, landed, and persons who, not belonging to either of these classes, might be considered as general borrowers. If the law only applied to mercantile borrowers, the repeal would not be injurious. They did not borrow of necessity, but they borrowed to trade; and if they could make 10 or 12 per cent. on the money borrowed, he saw no reason why the lender might not ask them to pay him 7 or 8 per cent. But if they were allowed to demand this, was there any landed gent. who possessed so foggy an understanding as not to see that, if the monied man could lend to the trader, at a higher rate than five per cent. he would not lend to him at that sum? It was one advantage to the lender, that he could recal his capital at pleasure, or at a short notice. Now when a man lent capital to a trader, he was generally enabled to command the use of his capital when he pleased. But if he lent his money on land, there was all the trouble of mortgage; he could not recal it for two or three years, and therefore, when he lent it to the landed gentleman, he would make him pay a higher rate of interest than the trader. The landed gentleman would find no money-lender so pleased with his physiognomy, as to lend money to him at a lower rate than he could get elsewhere; and if this repeal enabled him to get more from the trader, it would enhance the difficulty of borrowing to the land-owner. There were eight out of ten estates in this country involved in debt; but landed gentlemen did not borrow to make profits, they did not borrow to fructify, and they must be injured by whatever increased, as this measure would increase, the rate of interest. The third class, or general borrowers, was the most numerous, and, perhaps, eight out of ten gentlemen were of this class. They did not borrow to make profit, and they had no security to offer. They would suffer even still more than the landed gentlemen from the repeal. These might be called involuntary borrowers; they had no choice; they were a large class of persons, and they were all, by this proposed repeal, to be given up, ad libitum, to the claims of the extortioner, and to a system of exaction. He did not wish to trouble the house, but there was one effect of the repeal as to the Bankrupt Laws, which he would shortly advert to. As the law stood, if a man lent money at a higher rate than five per cent. to a trader, he was held to be a partner of that trader; and in case of the trader failing, the law would come on his whole private property to pay the debts of the firm. But if the Usury Laws were repealed, a monied man would lend money to a trader at a higher rate; he would make eight, ten, or twelve, per cent., and in case the trader failed, his property would remain untouched. He would take the case of a brewer, in want of money. The person he applied to might say: "You are making 20 per cent.; if I lend you my money, I must have 10 or 12." Here was a soft, oily, comfortable, and not Jewish way of making a very handsome profit. The brewer makes 20, and pays the lender 10 or 12; and the lender obtains from the brewer a security for his advances. Suppose the brewer fails, there is nothing to pay the creditors, and he, who has really been engrossing the profits of the trade, preserves his property entire. A monied man might even set up an agent to contract debts, and answer for them under the Bankrupt Laws, while he, who had been reaping the profits of the trade, who had absolutely put into his pocket the debts contracted by his agent, would not be answerable for a farthing. If the laws were repealed, they would open a door to fraud; and this principle, under the present Bankrupt Laws, he thought worthy of attention. The hon. member for Aberdeen had said, that landed gentlemen might ask what they pleased for the use of their land. But he would ask the hon. member if the Corn Law, which allowed corn to be imported when the price was 80s. did not fix a maximum on rent? Beyond that, the landed gentleman could not demand a rent. Because he thought the repeal proposed unseasonable in time, and pernicious in principle, he should move that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

On the amendment being put,

Mr. Sergeant Oswalson observed in answer to the last speaker, that all who had money to lend, looked both at the rate of interest and the security for paying it; and it was the case now, as it always had been and must be, that men with a less certain security, such as mercantile men, could not borrow on as favourable terms as those who, like landed gentlemen, had better security. The learned member seemed to think that a lender could at all times have what he asked, and that the rate of interest was entirely fixed by the wish of the lenders. He had taken no notice of the competition of lenders. If this were as the learned member stated, how was it, that at present, when the legal rate of interest was five per cent., men lent their money much below that rate? It was clear that some other principle besides the will of the lender, settled the rate at which the rent of money was to be paid. This principle was partly the competition among the lenders. Money was like land or houses, which, when men borrowed, they paid for the use of; and as the rent both of houses and land was unrestricted, he did not see why the rent of money—for there was nothing magical in the term interest—should not be as unrestricted as the rent of either houses or land.

Mr. Robertson resisted the repeal, as opposed to the suggestions of experience. He observed that according to the practice of most civilized nations, the rate of interest on loans was fixed. A departure from this salutary principle had caused the ruin of some of the free states of the continent.

Mr. Alderman Hoygate opposed the bill. It would be especially ruinous to the small traders. The present law was not constantly evaded—if it were, this bill would not have been pressed upon the house every year for the last ten or a dozen years.

Mr. C. Wynn had so often stated his sentiments to be favourable to this bill, that he should not have risen that night had it not been to account for the absence of his Majesty's ministers on this occasion. He believed that all of them, except the learned gent. who had moved the amendment, considered the bill as one which would greatly advance the public interest. His right hon. friends, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade, had, on more than one occasion, publicly defended the policy of it; and he was confident that all his colleagues, with the exception, perhaps, of the right hon. Sec. for Foreign Affairs, who, to the best of his knowledge, had never taken the question into his consideration, were strongly in favour of it. They had left the house, because they anticipated that the division would not take place till a late hour, and that their presence would not be wanted to render the question successful. He had stayed at the request of his rt. hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, to declare the opinion of ministers on this bill, in case such a declaration of opinion should be rendered necessary by any thing that occurred in the course of the debate.

Mr. Bright considered the absence of the whole body of ministers from the house to be inconsistent with their public duty. He was afraid to remove the Usury laws, because he thought their repeal would diminish the comforts of the middle and lower classes of the community.

The house then divided, when there appeared for the bill, 40—Against it, 45—Majority against it, 5.

Joint Stock Companies.

LORDS, THURSDAY, FEB. 3. — The Lord Chancellor made some remarks with respect to a system now going on to a mischievous extent—he meant joint stock companies—most of which were not yet, and never might be formed, although, before their formation took place, the shares of the persons adventuring therein were made the subjects of sale, to the enormous profit and advantage of those who set such companies afloat. It was his intention to bring in a bill to check proceedings of this sort. He thought it right to mention the subject on the first day of the session, because he intended that the operation of the bill should affect all sales of interest on shares in those companies which might be proposed to be established, but were not yet formed, from and after the first day of the present session, so that there could be no ground for complaint with respect to the want of notice, supposing their lordships should think proper to approve of the bill. With respect to the past, he would either leave it to be dealt with according to the common law as it at present stood, or he would introduce into the bill a clause declaratory of the common law on the subject.

MONDAY, FEB. 7.—The Lord Chancellor said, that there seemed some uncertainty with respect to the actual state of the law on the subject of joint stock companies. But whatever might be the existing law, it could never be intended that the public should stand in this situation—that before the authority of the Crown or of Parliament should be given to constitute a joint stock company, persons should be permitted to sell at an enormous profit the shares of that company, which was nothing more nor less than laying a bait for their own benefit, by which innocent individuals were great sufferers. The object of his measure should therefore be to prevent the transferring such shares until the company should have received the sanction of a charter or an act of parliament. The transfer of such shares was declared illegal by the 6th Geo. I.; but the penalties of that act, which were no less than a præsumptio, and loss of goods and chattels, were so enormous that it was probable nobody would be disposed to enforce them.

COMMONS, MONDAY, FEB. 28.—On a reading of the Oil Gas Company bill,

Mr. Grenfell objected to the practice of granting to joint stock companies the privilege of suing and being sued by their secretaries. If, as it was alleged, many companies now in progress had no real foundation, and were only formed with a view of deluding the public, their power of delusion would be considerably increased by their being enabled to hold out to the world that they possessed any thing like parliamentary sanction.

Mr. Huskisson admitted that some of the new companies possessed the character which the hon. member ascribed to them; but how was it possible for the house to know whether certain companies were or were not formed on sound plans, and whether their capital was subscribed? He believed, indeed, that if it should appear that the capital of the companies was not subscribed—that it was only a pretended capital, they would experience great difficulty in getting their bills through all their stages in another place.

Mr. Hobhouse said that when the proper time came, he should be able to prove that there was no pretence whatever for some of the projects of the present companies. There was one company in particular, the Pasco-Peruvian Mine Company, which he pledged himself to prove had no foundation whatever, and no object in view except to work mines on the Stock Exchange.

Mr. Baring was of opinion that the house ought to come to some determination of its own with respect to the companies in question, and not allow the bills relating to them to pass in hope that they would undergo revision in another place. He did not see that any great harm would result from giving companies the power of suing and of being sued by their secretary. If it were meant that the house should reject every bill which proposed to give that power to a company whose shares were not all paid up, he would say that by so doing they might obstruct many useful plans. He hoped that his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) would make up his mind as to what course it would be proper for the house to pursue on the subject.

Mr. Huskisson said, that he had stated last year that to all bills having for their object to exempt particular companies from the observance of conditions to which all others were liable, he would object; but he must confess that he did not see much objection to allowing companies, for their own convenience, and for that of the persons with whom they transacted business, to sue and be sued by their secretary. It was not for him to probe the merits of all the existing speculations, and to declare which were likely to prove beneficial to the country or otherwise. It was for the public to ascertain, before they engaged in such speculations, what was their nature: people should be more cautious.

Mr. Hume said that the house should be cautious in meddling with the subject. He would ask whether, when the bill for building the Strand Bridge was introduced, any member would have been found to call that project a delusion; and yet it appeared hardly possible that any of the speculations of the present day could be more ruinous in their consequences than that had been. The house ought not, in his opinion, to throw any impediments in the way of speculation, so long as the persons promoting them sought no peculiar privileges. Here the conversation terminated.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18.—A petition having been presented by Mr. T. Wilson from the cowkeepers of the metropolis, against a joint stock company, called the Alderney Milk Company,

Mr. Grenfell expressed his regret that the Lord Chancellor's bill, to regulate these joint stock companies, was not yet forthcoming.

Mr. Huskisson said, that whatever might be their opinion as to the nature of many of the recent speculations, the law which referred to partnerships was well known, and, with the exception of bankers, he did not see that there was any thing in the law to limit the number of persons who might choose to associate for the purpose of carrying on any particular trade. He would admit that the rage and folly of the day led to speculations for carrying on ordinary trades in the way of extensive partnerships. They had milk companies, and brick companies, and fish companies, and several others of that kind which he could not enumerate; but when any of them came before the house with a bill, and asked for no new or exclusive privilege or power, he did not see how the house could turn them away. By refusing the power which they asked of suing and being sued in the name of one of their officers, he did not see that they could be prevented from acting as a partnership; but the getting such a power would not of itself be the means of enabling them to continue long in those extensive associations. He was sure that the good sense and industry of those who carried on trades for the more extensive exercise of which some of the companies had been formed, would in the end prevail, and that the trades would return to their natural channel. Many of those owners of shares, who might be considered as sleeping partners in trades of which they knew nothing but the name, but who expected to reap large profits without any care, activity, or exertion on their parts, would, he feared, find in the end their expectations disappointed, and that they could not compete with effect against individuals who devoted their whole time and attention to the promotion of their respective trades. The high-raised hopes of many who embarked in such speculations would, in the end, vanish "into thin air," and leave those who entertained them nothing but regret and disappointment (hear, hear). At the same time he did not see how the parliament could at present interfere. If, in any of the measures which came before them, any thing illegal could be shown—if any particular evil could be pointed out—he would be willing to afford every remedy in his power; but unless that was done, it would be better to let those things take their course, and they would be found to come back in a short time to their natural level. Now, in this milk company, for instance, he saw nothing illegal in its formation, nor any thing in which the house could with propriety interfere; at the same time he felt satisfied that it could never succeed against the vigilance and activity of individual industry (hear, hear).

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 25.—The Earl of Lauderdale, on presenting a petition against the Equitable Loan bill said, that their lordships would do well to consider whether it was not time to stand forward and show their sense of the speculations which were afloat. Nothing, he was sure, could be more injurious to the country than such a spirit of rash and inconsiderate enterprise. There were at present placed at the command of the directors and other managers of joint stock companies, more than two millions, one-fourth of which, he believed, was more than the minister had raised by loan, at once, during any period of the late war.

The Earl of Liverpool wished to take this opportunity of saying a few words on the subject alluded to. In a country like this, where extensive commercial interests were constantly at work, a great degree of speculation was unavoidable, and, kept within certain limits, was attended with much advantage to the country. In a moment like the present, in a profound peace, and when the interest of money was low, it was particularly to be expected. But he wished that the public should be set right as to the situation in which they stood. He never knew a moment when there was a greater prospect of lasting peace than the present, but still no man could answer for events. No man could say how long this peace might last. Now he would ask any man to reflect what would be the situation of the public, if (not to speak of actual war) any thing short of war—any embarrassing event were to occur? Their lordships would recollect that when commercial embarrassments occurred during the late war, bankers and merchants came forward and applied to Parliament for aid, which they obtained by issues of Exchequer bills. He wished it, however, to be clearly understood that those persons who now engaged in joint stock companies, or other enterprises, would enter on those speculations at their peril. He did not wish to see any legislative measure introduced to prevent persons from embarking in any speculation they might think proper: every one had a right to employ his capital as he chose. But he thought it his duty to declare, that he never would advise the introduction of any bill for their relief; on the contrary, if such a measure were proposed, he would oppose it, and he hoped that Parliament would resist any measure of the kind. He thought that this could not be too well understood at the present moment, nor made too publicly known.

The Lord Chancellor said that he ought to apologize, if he might so express himself, for not having brought in the bill of which he had formerly given notice, relative to joint stock companies; but parties had come before him while he was exercising his judicial duties, and he did not think it right to be declaring the law in that house while he had to give judgment in another place. He had been employed since September last in hearing persons engaged in speculation, who had been quarrelling among themselves. From what took place in the Court of Chancery, it would appear that these parties had enough to fear from the state of the law as it now stood, to say nothing of any new act. They could not be aware of the extent of the danger in which they were placed.

Bubble Act Repeal.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 29.—Mr. Peter Moore observed, that some positive decision was necessary on that great subject of speculation and improvement which was now so actively in operation. At least 160 millions of capital were afloat, and for his own part he trusted that he should see that amount tripled and quadrupled. An attempt was made to cast imputations on those who embarked in these schemes, and the schemes themselves were designated as bubbles. He had the honour of being connected with some of these companies, and he was prepared to meet the most scrutinizing inquiries as to their objects and mode of proceeding. He should not at present enter into the great question; but on the second reading of the bill would be prepared to meet the fullest discussion. The hon. member concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act of the 6th Geo. I.

The Attorney-General said, that the 6th Geo. I. comprised a great many different subjects with which the motion of the hon. member had no connexion whatever. Surely, then, it was not to be dealt with in this inconsiderate manner. He must oppose the motion.

Mr. Grenfell was anxious that something should be done to render the real state of the law intelligible. In the course of the last week, a joint-stock company had been formed, with a prince of the blood at its head. There was another, at the head of which were the Archbishop of Canterbury and the whole bench of bishops. Yet, if the common apprehension of the law were correct, those persons had incurred the penalties of a præsumptor.

Mr. Ellice expressed his readiness to vote for the introduction of the bill, in order that the subject might be fairly discussed and disposed of; although he by no means knew that he should agree to its second reading. In that and the other house of parliament, liberal views had been taken of the subject by the Noble Lord at the head of the Treasury, and by the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson), who stated that which appeared to him to be consonant to common sense—namely, that the public should be allowed to institute what companies they pleased, but that all attempts at fraud should be punished. At the same time an alarm was sounded out of chancery, cautioning persons against embarking in the new speculations. The same thing happened not long ago with respect to South America. The independence of that country was much countenanced in parliament at the time that all recognition of it was utterly refused in the court of chancery. Some alteration in the law had, in consequence, become indispensably necessary.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that the objection to the motion was, that it could not attain the purpose designed by the hon. member. He was not prepared to say what would be the state of the common law with regard to traders if the 6th Geo. I. were repealed. He must admit, however, that the law as it now stood, with the decision of two very high authorities against the operation of that act, left matters in too much uncertainty.

Mr. P. Moore, to conciliate opposition, offered to alter his motion for a repeal, to a motion for altering and amending the act.—(Cries of "withdraw").

After some animadversion by Mr. Huskisson, on the inconsiderate manner in which this motion had been introduced, the motion was withdrawn.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—The Attorney-General moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much of an act of the 6th of Geo. I. cap. 18, (the Bubble Act), as related to joint-stock companies. This act had of late excited considerable discussion in the courts of law and equity, and it appeared to be agreed on all hands that its meaning and effect were altogether unintelligible. It was, in fact, impossible to ascertain what had been the intention of the legislature in passing that act. When it was further recollected, that the penalty imposed by the act was no less than that of a premeditated, he thought nothing more was wanted to show the necessity of repealing it. But there were other grounds which manifested that necessity still more strongly. From 1720, the year in which it was passed, down to the present time, joint-stock companies had been formed for the most useful and laudable purposes; such as the companies for the insurance of lives and property, and many others; all of which, under the interpretation which was sometimes put upon this act, were said to be illegal. For the protection, then, of these individuals, it was highly expedient to repeal the existing law. He might be asked, whether it was his intention to propose any provision instead of it; and to this he must reply, that he had at first intended to do so, but that after having very attentively considered the subject, he had been convinced that such a course would be at once difficult, unwise, and impolitic. The reasons which had induced him to believe, that it would be inexpedient to legislate on this subject were, that up to the period of passing the Bubble Act, although the commerce of this country had been extended in a very important degree, no legal enactments had been considered as necessary. After the events which gave rise to this act, previous to 1720, with the exception of a criminal prosecution, the nature of which was not very clearly understood, and which took place two years afterwards, no legal proceedings had been had under it until within a few years ago.—He would add, that he meant to insert in his bill a provision, that it was not to interfere with any proceeding now depending in any of the courts of law or equity, but that they were to be decided according to the law as it had stood when those proceedings were commenced. There was another provision which he meant to add, with a view of facilitating the granting of charters by the crown, to companies for trading and other purposes. Under the charters as they were commonly granted, the persons incorporated were not individually liable for any of the debts of the company, but only so far as the corporate property extended. This circumstance caused considerable reluctance on the part of the crown, and those whose duty it was to advise the crown, to grant charters. Persons wishing to form a company were therefore obliged to apply, in the first place, to parliament, for an act enabling the crown to grant a charter, and afterwards for the charter, thus doubling the expense. To remedy this, he should propose a clause enabling the crown, whenever applications should be made for a charter, to insert in it a provision, rendering any individual member of a corporation liable for the debts of that corporation, according to the judgment of the crown in each particular case. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in the bill.

Col. Davies regretted that the law, as laid down by Lord Ellenborough, in deciding a case on this act, had not been adhered to, because in his opinion that decision sufficiently explained the act of parliament, and would have rendered the proposed bill unnecessary.

Mr. Huskisson said, that the proposition of his learned friend was one which he warmly concurred in, because he was satisfied that the interests of commerce required the encouragement and protection of joint-stock companies. When the gallant member said, that if Lord Ellenborough's decision had not been called in question, the proposed bill would not have been necessary, he showed that by the possibility of that decision being disturbed, it was highly expedient to have the law made certain. That decision was, that all companies not prejudicial to the public interests were legal. The question if prejudicial or not, was of course to be left to a jury. But where persons had embarked large properties in a speculation, ought they not to be guaranteed by some secure provision of the law, instead of leaving their interests to the eloquence of a counsel, or to the discretion of a jury? He had no reason to doubt Lord Ellenborough's interpretation of the law; but the law itself was still left in a state of uncertainty, and the object of his learned friend was to remove that uncertainty. The mere provision that parties should sue and be sued was not enough, as the inconveniences which were every day experienced abundantly proved. If this bill were passed, parties would, in future, be enabled to enter into their speculations without any other restriction than that which the crown would exercise in pronouncing upon the utility and propriety of their designs.

Mr. Denman could not agree with his gallant friend, as to Lord Ellenborough's decision, because it left the law in this state;—the persons composing a company were liable to be indicted ed, and then there were two points to be decided—the first by the jury, whether the object of the company were beneficial or injurious to the public; and the second, what interpretation the judge might think fit to put upon the words of the act. Since the passing of the act, only two cases had arisen upon it, in which the jury had found that the objects of the companies were beneficial; but it was nevertheless a subject which in its nature admitted of so much variety of opinion that it was unfit to be left to the decision of a jury.—He must be permitted to say, that the act itself was a specimen of the inexpediency of occasional legislation. It was not passed until after the evils which it pretended to remedy were over, and at the end of a century it was the cause of serious inconveniences, to obviate which another application to the legislature had become necessary.

Leave was given to bring in the bill

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—On the motion for the second reading of the bill for the repeal of the Bubble Act,

The Earl of Leinster opposed the motion. The act of Geo. I. had been passed to correct a great public grievance, which would be encouraged by the alteration proposed to be made in the law. The companies now forming, and which the repeal of the bubble act would sanction, were all monopolies, and their effect would be to drive the fair trader out of the market. When the existence of the East India Company and other established monopolies was objected to, why create new ones?

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the allusion made by the noble lord to the East India Company was not in point. The objection with regard to that Company was, that it was said to be a monopoly against the public; but he was surprised that the noble lord did not see that those companies, if they were to be monopolies at all, must be so in favour of the public. As for private traders being driven out of the market, that he did not think probable; for it was well known that large companies always conducted their concerns in a much less prudent manner, and with far less attention to their interests, than individuals. There could therefore be no harm in repealing this obsolete act of parliament, while its existence only tended to create confusion, in consequence of individuals not knowing what they might, according to law, do or not do.

The Lord Chancellor stated, that the principle of the present bill was to repeal the act of 6 Geo. I., and to leave the parties to whom it was intended to apply to the operation of the common law. It did not destroy the power of the Crown to grant any charters, but it enlarged that power to the granting of qualified charters. As it repealed the statute of Geo. I., and as that statute was supposed only to stand in the way of associations such as the public had lately seen attempted, he thought it better that a clause should be introduced into the bill declaring that the common law remained unaltered and untouched. The common law, which would thus be enforced, was, in his opinion, equal to every thing contemplated in the statute.

The Earl of Liverpool objected to the proposed clause, as it might render it necessary in all future acts to state, not only the laws repealed, but the laws which remained in force after the repeal of a special statute.

The bill was then ordered to be committed tomorrow.

Equitable Loan Company.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.—Lord Dacre, on moving the second reading of the bill, said, that the object of the bill was merely to enable a company to sue and be sued by one of their clerks; a portion of their capital being invested in a manner calculated to afford considerable relief to the poor. The Equitable Loan Company proposed to act as pawnbrokers in a way most favourable to the interests of the poor. The establishment resembled, as much as possible, those institutions in Italy and France called Monte de Piété; and he could not think that the opposition to so charitable a purpose was founded on any other ground than that of interest.

The Lord Chancellor said, that as guardians of the public safety, it was their lordships' duty to guard against the mischiefs which were likely to ensue from the conduct of these companies. During the last two or three years those mischiefs had been suffered to spread to a most dangerous extent. It was true, that many persons were connected with them, who were entitled on every account to the greatest respect; but when, for instance, it was stated that out of 40,000 shares, of which this company consisted, all had been sold at a premium, excepting 6,000, the public required some other security than the respectability, however great it might be, of certain individuals. He was no foe to joint stock companies, if they were for proper purposes, and under due provisions. There were many great national objects which could be accomplished by no other means, and which were fairly entitled to the privileges of a charter, or of an act of parliament. But without such protection, nothing could be more foolish and vain than to suppose that bills could be passed, only because they contained the clause that the companies to which they related might sue and be sued. Any lawyer would satisfy their lordships in ten minutes, that a more efficacious and futile clause could not be inserted in a bill, and that nothing could be less of a security to the public. He had been led to consider this subject deeply, from the circumstance of his having been called upon in another place to pronounce judgment upon a question which involved it. There was another circumstance, and one which weighed with him very considerably; it was, that as the law was not now strong enough to compel the parties engaged in such undertakings to do justice among themselves, it was impossible that it could do justice between them and the public. The transactions of the Scotch commercial banks were all of this nature, and no man who thought of the inconveniences which might result from it would deny that the law in this respect ought to be altered. While there was no dispute, the inconveniences could not arise; but when appeals should come from the courts of session, it would be found that all which had been done in the courts below must go for nothing, whatever might be the justice of the case. A more important case than this, his lordship thought, whether as regarded the particular company now under discussion, or the general interests of the public, had not been before the house for ages.

The second reading was deferred till counsel should have been heard on the bill.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.—Lord Dacre moved the second reading of the Equitable Loan Bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale said that he would consent to the bill being sent to a committee, in order to have the company's trust deed made a part of the bill, and on the third reading it would be for their lordships to consider how far the bill so constructed ought to receive their sanction, and how far it might be consistent with law. His objection to this bill did not arise from any wanton prejudice, but from a strong feeling of the injurious effect of joint stock companies on the commerce of the country. He could not concur in the assertion that those companies encouraged competition. So far from that, he thought the direct effect of them was to destroy all competition, and to bring the most ruinous consequences upon trade. In the nature of such companies, they could not carry on trade so beneficially to the country as private individuals.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that if this company were not illegal, it might be for their lordships to consider, whether it would be useful to the community to grant them the privileges which they sought; but if they were not legal, it might be asked on what ground they claimed any privileges at all? It was admitted at their lordships' bar, that until the signing of the trust-deed, the company was illegal: he had no objection to allow the trust-deed to form a part of the bill, either by schedule or otherwise; and after it had passed the committee, it would be competent for their lordships to discuss whether the bill, as it would then stand, was or was not a fit measure for legislative sanction; and he would take care that the 12 judges should be summoned to give their opinion as to its legality.

Lord Dacre thought it had been very fairly put by counsel at their lordships' bar, that if any legal objections existed to this bill, they ought to be removed, on the ground of its public utility. If that utility could be proved—and he had no doubt whatever that the most satisfactory evidence could be given on that subject—he thought their lordships were bound, in justice to the country, to give every facility to the measure. Suppose this bill were to be objected to on the ground of its illegality, what, he asked, would be the situation of the thirty-four companies which had already had bills passed in their favour, granting them the power of suing and being sued?

The Lord Chancellor said, that from what was passing in the courts of justice, it would be but just to all the parties concerned in such companies as this, that the deeds should form part of all future bills. It was necessary that the contents of such deeds should be known to all parties, or the legislature must decide upon altering the practice of the courts of law.

The bill was ordered to be committed to-morrow.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.—On the motion for the third reading of the Equitable Loan bill,

The Lord Chancellor, in rising to oppose the motion, said this company proposed to lend on pledges, sums under 10l. at a lower interest than the pawnbrokers. Now, as the number of persons composing the company might amount to about 7,000, was it fair that a body so constituted should compete with individuals? The result would be a monopoly, the establishment of which could not be for the interest of the public. This company might lend at a low interest till all competitors were driven out of the market, and then do as they pleased. The power of suing the clerk was no advantage to the public. If a judgment were got against the clerk in a civil action, and he could not pay, was the prosecutor to proceed against all the 7,000 partners? If a criminal proceeding might be successful against the clerk, those who had the option of bringing it, were placed in the difficulty of either punishing the innocent or of abstaining from seeking any redress. For the encouragement of companies of this kind, it would perhaps be thought necessary to repeal the act of Geo. I. called the Bubble Act; but if that were done, it would but little alter the case, for he could tell their Lordships that there was hardly any thing in that act which was not punishable by the common law. The noble and learned lord restated the opinions he had at different times in that house, as well as in the Court of Chancery, delivered on joint stock companies, and concluded by moving that the bill be read a third time that day three months.

Lord Dacre said, that the mere enactment to lend small sums of money under 10l., at an interest of 90 per cent. less than that charged by the pawnbrokers, was of itself a proof that the bill would be a benefit to the country. His lordship then proceeded to point out the various advantages which the public would derive from the establishment of this company, as contrasted with the system pursued by the pawnbrokers; and contended that the Lord Chancellor had not taken a correct view of the preamble of the bill. The learned lord had also overlooked the effect of certain clauses in the bill: there were some clauses in it, which made every member of the company liable in person as well as in purse, and those clauses relating to partnership, to which his Lordship had alluded, had been copied from an act, called "An Act for the better regulation of Partnerships in Ireland," which had received the learned lord's assent this session. He was satisfied that the bill was calculated to afford great benefit to the country; and it would therefore be matter of deep regret to him, if the learned lord on the woolsack, or the learned lord (Redesdale) who sat before him, should so surround it with technical difficulties as to cause it to be rejected by the house.

The house then divided—For the third reading—Content, 14—Not content, 27—Majority against the bill, 13.

London Water Works.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 1.—On the motion that the London Water Works bill be read a second time,

Mr. Fremantle said, he had been the chairman of a committee formerly appointed on the subject of water companies. His opinion had previously been, that the divisions which these companies had made of the metropolis was a monopoly, and that their profits were far too great. Upon inquiry he was induced to change that opinion altogether. He was far from thinking that competition was a desirable thing in these companies, and he hoped that the house would pause before they permitted new companies to be formed, the consequence of which must be the ruin of themselves or others. In none of the companies, he believed, had the proprietors received 5 per cent. on the amount of their capital.

Mr. F. Buxton said that in 1815, the present companies entered into an agreement with each other, by means of which all competition was effectually prevented. They decided on what price they should demand. If they pleased they might refuse to supply any individual with water; and if a person quitted one company for the purpose of procuring a supply from another, he might be disappointed, since they had agreed not to interfere with each other's establishments. The hon. gent. had said, that competition was good with respect to every article but one, and that was water. It was strange that competition would not be beneficial, where a necessary of life was concerned. In 1810, when there was a competition, the price of water fell 25 per cent.; but in 1815, when competition was put an end to, it immediately rose 25 per cent. To understand the imposition, he begged to call the attention of the house to the case of a schoolmaster residing at Stratford. One of the companies agreed to supply him with water at 18s. a year. At the end of the year, they told him that they must raise the rate 100 per cent. They did so. In the following year, they advanced it 100 per cent. more; and last year they informed him they must add another 100 per cent. He thought proper to remonstrate; and what was the consequence? Why, they actually raised the rate by 200 per cent. last year.

Mr. T. Wilson said the hon. gent. (Mr. Buxton) had stated one fact, relative to the schoolmaster; but he had not told them how many boys were in the school when the charge was first made, and how many when the increase was demanded. The hon. member (Mr. Fremantle) had said that competition in this case was mischievous. He thought so too; and he held it to be equally bad in gas concerns.

The house divided.—For the second reading, 69—Against it, 30—Majority, 39.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.—The sheriffs of London appeared at the bar with a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, against the formation of new water companies proposing to supply the city with water from wells.

Mr. C. Calvert expressed his apprehension that those wells, or pits, would be ineffectual as a means of supplying water, and that at the same time they would be injurious, by destroying the supply of water from springs, to several public establishments.

Mr. M. A. Taylor observed, that the house might judge of the manner in which some of those new speculations were got up, when he informed them that the very first intimation he ever received of the existence of this water company, was his having seen it in a newspaper, where it was ushered to the world as being under his special sanction (a laugh). It was true a gentleman called on him some time before, and, to his great surprise, asked for his opinion about all the water-works and wells in London. He told him what he knew on the subject, and the gentleman immediately observed, that he had a plan for procuring from wells sunk in the city and its vicinity, water of the very purest quality, inferior only to claret as a beverage (a laugh). He then showed him some plans by which it was proposed to sink those wells. He (Mr. T.) asked the gentleman whether he had considered the depths to which he might have to sink, and the difficulties attending the undertaking? To which he replied, that he had, but he was certain, that with his (Mr. T.'s) assistance, they should get through (a laugh). He said, he could not afford him any assistance in the matter, but he advised the gentleman to take a walk in St. George's Fields, as there was a building in that vicinity well adapted to his frame of mind (hear, hear). In a short time after he (Mr. T.) saw his name announced as having given his sanction and support to the measure.

The petition was referred to the committee on the bill.

Metropolitan Fish Company.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9.—TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—On the motion of Lord J. Fitzroy, for the second reading of the Metropolitan Fish Company bill,

Mr. Calcraft said, that this was one of the many absurd speculations at present afloat. Fish was at present brought to the London market at the cost of seven farthings a pound. It was said, that fish was dear at the west end of the town, but this was only because people at the west end of the town would have the best fish that could be selected from the market. He was informed that the first step which the company had taken was to employ an agent to conduct their business at a salary of 2,000l. This was, to be sure, an economical mode of going to work. He would not oppose the second reading of the bill, but when he met the supporters of it in the committee, he would dare them to a proof of the statements contained in their prospectus.

Lord J. Fitzroy observed that he had no private interest in the success of the measure.

Mr. T. Wilson said, that the company was formed for the benefit of the public, and would counteract the efforts of fish-salesmen to keep up the price of fish.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, that the company was established, not for the purpose of catching, but of buying fish. A retired fish-monger was to be paid 2,000l. a-year to go to Billingsgate to buy fish. The effect of such competition must be to raise the price of fish.

Mr. J. Smith thought that much good would arise from the establishment of the company.

The bill was read a second time.

London Brick Company.

MONDAY, MARCH 23.—On Mr. Curtis's motion for the second reading of the London Brick Company bill, Mr. Calcraft said, that on the general principle which he had adopted with respect to such companies as the present, he would oppose this bill, unless (which he did not expect) he heard some good reasons from the opposite side that the act was necessary. He could not see why, if this company had only for its object the making of bricks, they might not do it without an act of Parliament.

Mr. Curtis said, that on the principle of competition and free trade, he thought the hon. member (Mr. Calcraft) might support the bill.

Mr. Calcraft said this was not free trade. This was the opposition of a company against individual industry.

The bill was lost, without a division.

Pasco-Peruvian Mining Company.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16.—On the motion for the second reading of the Pasco Peruvian Mining Company bill,

Mr. Hobhouse said, that he should state his opinion on this bill freely and explicitly, and he more, because both private and public means had been employed to intimidate him from doing so (hear, hear). But what he had to say he could prove; and, if it were necessary he could develop some details which would perhaps surprise the house not a little (hear, hear). The pretence on which these speculating companies came before the house, was that they might have power, for general convenience, to sue by an individual, and be sued. But this pretext was a miserable delusion: what they really wanted was, to be seen in communication with authority; they wanted to raise their shares in the markets, by having it understood that what they published was done with the knowledge and sanction of Government (hear, hear). He would shortly state the regular detail by which the original shareholders in companies like the present were daily putting large sums into their own pockets. The thing was done without the smallest risk, and almost without any advance of capital. Suppose for instance, a company projected, like the present; that there were to be 10,000 shares of 100*l.* each, making a capital of one million; and that the original projectors were 50 in number. The 50 projectors agreed at once to take all the shares among themselves. Each took 200 shares and paid a deposit of 5*l.* on each share, each advancing, in his whole proportion, 1,000*l.* Now by management well understood on the Stock Exchange, as soon as prospectuses were issued, and people came to purchase the stock, they were informed that the 5*l.* shares had risen to 16*l.* (hear, hear). Thus an original projector sold only 66 of his 200 shares, and got 56*l.* over his cost price—having 134 shares to get what he could for, clear profit upon the transaction. And this was supposing a moderate profit; in many cases the rise had not been from 100*l.* to 111*l.* but the 100*l.* shares had been resold at 600*l.*, 700*l.*, and even as high as 1,200*l.* (hear, hear), producing almost immediately, immense fortunes to the projectors, without the slightest risk on their part. The puffs and advertisements by which this system was supported were so disgraceful, that he should hardly expect belief from the house if he did not state them in their precise terms. In the first prospectus issued, he found the following statement:—"It (meaning the company) has already secured contracts for a long term of years for some valuable mines on the celebrated heights of Pasco." Now, with whom were these contracts secured? Why, with an individual of the name of Quiros, who was an expatriated patriot at the very date when that prospectus was issued, the Royalists being at that time in possession of the whole territory said to be contracted for (hear, hear). The same prospectus stated that "all engagements for the payment of money on behalf of the company" were to be made in such a manner, "that the liability of the shareholders should not, in any case, exceed the amount of the instalments remaining unpaid on their respective shares." Why this was not only in the teeth of the law, which already made every such shareholder liable to the extent of his whole fortune, but the bill absolutely brought into the house contradicted that whole regulation, and declared that it should not be lawful for the company to enter into any contract limiting the liability of its shareholders. In the prospectus, purchasers were told that they were not to be liable, and a bill was brought into parliament directly making them liable. Now, was not this a delusion? People were to buy under one presumption, and to hold under another. The hon. member then adverted to the opinion of Chief Justice Abbott in the case of "Joseph v. Febret," and contended that the Pasco Company came entirely under the provisions of the Bubble Act. In the second prospectus issued by the company, it was stated that "a contract for additional mines in the district of Pasco having been entered into on behalf of this company since the publication of the prospectus, the directors deem it expedient to submit to the shareholders the following general outline of their new engagement:—It comprises upwards of 360 mines, each mine occupying a surface of about 1,800 square yards." Now he would call the attention of the house to a small book, which was published by order of the Viceroy of Lima in 1796, in which was given a list of the silver mines then worked. These were stated at 78, and the number not worked was 21; making in the whole 99 mines in the district, and these belonged to 72 owners; but in the face of this the directors stated that they had contracts for the working of upwards of 360. According to the account quoted from Humboldt, the mines of Pasco produced in 1796, 227,514 marks of silver; and in 1801, he gave their produce at 237,435 marks; and he (Mr. Hobhouse) supposed it would not be estimated at a greater amount if worked in the present day. Yet surely that must have been a very small amount if there were so many mines at work as the company would have the public believe. The directors, however, to meet this objection, quoted in their pamphlet an extract from the Lima Gazette of 1821, in which allusion was made to 3,000 mines in the district. Mr. Caldcleugh stated that there were 5,000 inhabitants in the district; so that it would appear that there was just one man and a quarter to each mine (hear, hear). He admitted there might be a great number of excavations or shafts communicating with the mines, but he utterly denied that there were so many mines in existence in that country. It was next stated, that there were in the vicinity of the mines, "fields appropriated to the growth of barley." Was it probable that barley would grow at an elevation of 13,000 feet above the level of the sea, where there were frosts every night? How was it, then, that all former miners employed in the country were entirely depending for support on the maize sent to them from Lima? The statement on the face of it was erroneous. But the matter was set at rest by Mr. Caldcleugh, who stated, that at an elevation much lower than that of the mines, at the height of 12,300 feet, he met with but one solitary shrub. The prospectus went on to say, "The owner has undertaken to convey the whole of this property to the company, either in perpetuity, or in any other manner which the laws of Peru might require for vesting in the company the exclusive right to possess and work the mines for their own benefit." Now he would contend that the gentlemen alluded to, Don Juan Vives, had no right of ownership. Neither he nor Mr. Quiros could convey any right of ownership; one was an expatriated patriot, and the other an exiled royalist, whose property had been put under sequestration. But it was said that this sequestration had never been enforced; but why had it not?—Because in fact, the mines had never been worked since. Gen. San Martin was no authority; he himself had run away from the country. But let hon. members refer to what was stated by Capt. Hall, and they would find a very different account of the transaction; and it was more than probable that the Government of the country, when they came to have a settled government there, would reserve the mines for the use of the state; indeed, it was already intimated, that they were to be offered as a security for a loan which was about to be contracted for by the Peruvian Government here. The directors next talked of the coals discovered in the neighbourhood. Humboldt never said a word of any coals being there, but he (Mr. Hobhouse) would admit that a coal-mine had been recently discovered, yet it was much lower down the mountain. It would require great labour to extract coal, and greater to take it up to the mines. With respect to the statement of the directors, "that the present owner of this property stated that he had realized nearly 100,000 dollars per week for several successive weeks from one single mine;" he would observe that it was a novel proceeding to take account of the value of any thing from the seller. But the fact was differently stated in the Lima Gazette, to which they so willingly referred. That described the produce as 50,000 dollars, and that not from one, but from four mines; and Mr. Vives's property was valued at 400,000 dollars, which would be beyond all proportion below its value, if it had produced 100,000 dollars per week. He would admit the account given by Humboldt of the produce of those mines to be correct; and that they would yield two millions of dollars a year; but still, that would leave the company, who possessed only one tenth of them, not more than 200,000 dollars, or about 40,000*l.*, and from that the expense of working was to be deducted, which, when done, would leave those engaged in the speculation hardly any remuneration for their labour. This attempt had been made before, and without success. The same individual, Vives, had entered into a contract in 1814 with Messrs. Abadia, Arismende, Uville, and some others, with the owners of the mines, for draining and afterwards working them for a term of years. That was followed up by the sending out of some steam-engines from England, which, after several years, were erected. The first effects of the working of the engines had been hailed with transports by the Spanish authorities, as calculated to produce the happiest results, which, to use their own words, would "deluge the country with a torrent of silver;" but, notwithstanding all those great expectations, and all the assistance given by the local authorities, the hopes entertained had never been realized. The whole project failed; and the parties in this country who had engaged in it, and sent out machinery, could never get their contracts ratified, and he believed the whole of the Europeans who went out to superintend and assist in working the mines died, except one. If any parties could claim a property in these mines, it must be the creditors and representatives of Abadia, Arismendi, and the others. A claim of that kind had actually been made, and their interest was bid for on more than one occasion in the market. The house might form some idea of the difficulties attending the working these mines, when he stated, that it took 3,000 mules and 4,000 Indians to convey the two steam-engines from Callao to Pasco. The Government at the time put all those people into requisition to assist, but that was an indulgence which the present company could not hope for. The distance from Pasco to Callao was about 56 leagues, and it required 16 days to accomplish a journey up, and 13 down. The objection founded upon the difficulty of travelling was attempted to be met by "A Pasco Shareholder," who stated that an officer in command of a body of troops, performed the journey down in six days. That might, perhaps, be true, but it did not meet the general objection. These were no longer looked upon as slaves, and all future operations in that country must be carried on by means of free labour. In Mexico the labourers were paid two dollars a day, and so it should be here. Was it considered what an immense drawback this would be on the profits of the speculation? He had heard it urged, that Spain had derived large revenues from the working of those mines. He admitted she had, because Government took its one-fifth of the gross produce, without any consideration of how many were ruined by the attempts at working them; but the house would, he hoped, not allow persons in this country to be ruined in a similar manner. If the directors meant to act bona fide, let them go on for a year or two with these operations without a bill. Let them prove the thing practicable, and then he would have no objection to granting them the privilege of suing and being sued in the name of their secretary; but at present he thought the bill would only have the effect of keeping up what he considered a delusion. He would therefore move, as an amendment, "That the bill be read a second time that day six months."

Mr. F. Burton said that in reply to the allegation that this scheme was impracticable—and that no such mines existed, let the house refer to what had been said with respect to the mines by that illustrious traveller Humboldt. He stated, "The mines of Pasco, which are worse worked than any other in Spanish America, were first discovered by the Indian Huarí Cupca in 1630. They yield annually nearly two millions of dollars. In order to form a just idea of the enormous mass of silver which nature has deposited in the bosom of these calcareous mountains, at the height of more than 4,000 metres above the level of the ocean, it should be remembered that the bed of argentiferous oxide of iron in Gaurilecha has been worked without interruption from the commencement of the 17th century, and that during the last 20 years more than 5,000,000 marks of silver, (equal to 40,000,000) have been extracted." Would this statement of Humboldt's be also called delusive? But the fact did not rest on the authority of Humboldt alone. It was confirmed by several able and intelligent travellers, and was stated with a confidence of its truth by the intelligent gentleman who was secretary to the Mexican embassy. He would, in corroboration of the statement, read an extract of a letter written by the son of the hon. member for Southwark (Sir R. Wilson) who was at present side-de-camp to Gen. Bolívar, and with him in that country. In that letter, he says "It is very surprising to me, but nevertheless it is strictly true, that silver is in such plenty that the meanest utensils are made of that metal. I could for a few knives, or other articles of iron work, procure several pounds of it; but this abundance is comparatively of little value, in consequence of the difficulty of conveyance" (hear, hear). This statement, then, so fully corroborative of what had been already mentioned by Humboldt, could leave no doubt on the mind of any man of the great abundance of silver in those countries. In addition to these, he had the testimony of an officer who commanded a part of the independent troops in 1821, that silver was extracted in large quantities at that time by means of the steam-engines sent out from England. It was farther proved that there had been discovered, within a short distance of the mines, a valuable coal-pit, which afforded abundant fuel for all the purposes of mining. The hon. member had spoken of this as if it were at a considerable distance from the mines; but the fact was, and he had it from one who was on the spot, that it was not more than a league from the mines. With such advantages, then, how could the company be called a delusion? But it seemed that the company had not a good title. He had seen the documents on which that title was founded, and he had not the slightest doubt that it would be recognised by the Government of Peru. He did not think the hon. member dealt fairly with the company, in the interpretation which he had put upon that part of the regulation in which it was stated "that all engagements entered into on behalf of the company were to be made by trustees, and in their own names, and in such manner that the liability of the shareholders shall not in any case exceed the amount of the instalments remaining unpaid on their respective shares." Now, he thought that the fair and natural interpretation of that was, that the engagements would be conducted with such attention and economy, that the shareholders would be protected from the risk of being called on for any thing beyond the amount of their instalments. Having thus said a word on one side of the question, he would call the attention of the house to another, and would give them some information as to the cause of all the calumnies which in public and in private had been circulated against this company. When it was first established, a person named Dubois wished to be concerned in it, and to obtain some shares; but the directors, for reasons which it was unnecessary for him to state, refused to have any connexion with that person. Immediately after, they were attacked, their intentions grossly misrepresented, and their object described to be nothing but a delusion on the public for the purpose of putting money into their own pockets. Yet after this, the same Mr. Dubois came to some of the directors, and, in the presence of two or three respectable individuals, said "I am the author of all the attacks which have appeared against you. I have originated and given circulation to the reports which have been spread to your disadvantage; but if you will now give me twenty shares, I will go and recant all that I have hitherto said. I will tell the whole truth, and be the means of raising the shares in the market 20 per cent" (hear, hear). This offer was rejected with indignation; but notwithstanding that, he came yesterday morning, and repeated the application, lowering his demand to ten shares (hear, hear). This was also refused; and of course the company were to expect a continuance of that person's hostility. But would the house, by rejecting the bill before them, sanction such a base attempt as this? He trusted they would not; but, by giving leave to have the bill sent to a committee, give the company an opportunity of showing the fallacy of the statements which had been circulated against them.

Mr. T. Wilson said, that he had examined the objections urged by the hon. member, and put by others out of doors, and he could state his perfect conviction that they were unfounded. He thought the charge which the hon. member made respecting the whole of the shares being divided among 25 or 50 persons was most ungracious. The fact was, that a very large portion of the shares when they came out were distributed among the public—to those who had applied for them by themselves or their friends. He (Mr. W.) had written for some, believing, as still he did, that the speculation would be a profitable mode of employing capital, and the directors set his name down for five, so that his interest was but very small in the concern. The directors reserved 100 each for themselves; so that, if it was a delusion, it was on themselves, and not on the public. There was only one objection which the hon. member had urged which had any weight. It was, that the climate was so very unhealthy; but let it be recollected, that it was not intended to send out whole corps of English miners to work those mines. They would still be worked by the natives, but under the direction and superintendence of a few English miners, who would carry with them that skill and knowledge in which the native miners were deficient. Looking at all the circumstances, he felt convinced that this was a fair and bona fide speculation for the purpose of working the mines, and that it would be pursued with advantage.

Mr. Baring said, that it was deplorable to see the gambling mania at present abroad; it had seized upon all classes, and was spreading itself in all parts of the country. If it was to be lamented that men of the first rank and family in the country haunted gaming-houses at the west end of the town, it was still more to be lamented that merchants at the east end of it should imitate their example, and make a gaming-house of the Royal Exchange. He saw no difference between the gambling of noblemen in the hells of St. James's-street, and the gambling of the merchant on the Royal Exchange, except that the latter kept earlier hours and more respectable company than the former (hear, hear). The evil was certainly one which ought to be checked, though he hardly knew how the check could be applied. The remedy would be worse than the disease, if, in putting a stop to this evil, they put a stop to the spirit of enterprise. That spirit was productive of so much benefit to the community, that he should be sorry to see any person drawing a line discriminating between fair enterprise and extravagant speculation. He believed that all the mining speculations would turn out to be delusions, and that many innocent persons, who had embarked their little capital in them, with the expectation of realizing large fortunes, would be awakened some day unpleasantly from their dreams of grandeur, by the intelligence that their all was lost. It was ridiculous to see the objects for which joint stock companies were forming every day. We heard first of a milk company—then of a bread company—then of a brick-bat company, and last of all a lime company, which was to have a joint stock of 150,000*l.* to work eleven acres of chalk. What to do with these companies he knew not; but that something should be done was indisputable. On the first day of the session, a person of great influence in the Cabinet (the Lord Chancellor) had given notice that he would apply his mind to the discovery of a remedy for this evil; but he was afraid that the remedy would be matter of doubt with the personage to whom he alluded, until the disease had either carried off the patient, or had been cured by the effort of nature.

Mr. Calcraft observed, that notwithstanding the unpromising state of the house, from the few members in attendance, he was anxious to express his opinion that his hon. friend (Mr. Hobhouse) had made out a clear case against the present bill. The truth was, that when he looked at all these schemes, and saw 28 members of parliament at the head of their respective directions; when he saw a name, often in the chair of its committees (hear, hear), so generally amongst them, he felt justified in saying, that the only real mining was parliamentary mining (a laugh). In his belief, such a system of proceeding could neither add to the wealth, the character, or the prosperity of the country. He was therefore prepared to oppose the second reading of the bill.

After some further conversation the amendment was withdrawn, and the bill ordered to be committed.

Liverpool and Manchester Rail-way Bill.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2.—On the motion for the second reading of the Liverpool and Manchester Rail-Way bill,

Sir J. Newport said, he had nothing whatever to do with any canal or rail-road, and therefore what he was about to state was perfectly disinterested. In proportion to the increased commerce of the country, it was necessary that increased facilities of conveyance should be provided. It was said, in the present case, that the canal between Liverpool and Manchester afforded, at this moment, sufficient means of conveyance between those two places. But looking at the enlarged growth of Liverpool, and its increased commerce, he was inclined to think, that though the existing modes of conveyance might have been adequate heretofore, they were not so now. To afford an increased facility of conveyance was the object of the present plan, which was supported by the united wealth of Liverpool and Manchester. The company claimed from the house that protection for their commercial transactions which it was evident they deserved. It was not sufficient for those who were connected with canal companies to say, "We have sufficient accommodation for you, the merchants, and that, too, at a rate to which you cannot object." It was not for them, but for the mercantile body, to form a judgment on that subject. In supporting this measure, he was sure also, that he spoke the sentiments of every commercial body in Ireland, all of whom had instructed their representatives to give it their countenance.

Mr. Green said, that there were already three canals between Liverpool and Manchester, whose competition secured the public from the inconvenience of monopoly. The present plan would interfere very seriously with private property. He knew one individual whose land was bounded by a canal on one side, and by the high-road on the other, and now they were going to run this rail-way through the centre of his estate. They ought to look to the interests of individuals as well as to those of the public; and he should therefore oppose the bill.

Mr. Huskisson agreed, that the legislature ought not to sanction the invasion of private property, without being satisfied that the case was one of imperious necessity. On this occasion, if he looked only to the interests of individuals—if he looked only to the interests of those whose fortunes were connected with the canals between Liverpool and Manchester—if he consulted only his own private feelings—he should feel inclined to oppose the bill; but, like the hon. bart. he stood there unconnected with any railways or canals. In voting for this measure, he did not support it as rail-way opposed to canal. He had no preference, except that which was connected with increased facility, dispatch, and economy, in the carriage of merchandise. He did not support this measure because it was a profitable thing to those by whom it had been projected. It was nothing to him whether they had embarked their money in it for profit or loss. But in this case he was inclined to think, that the subscribers seemed to have a higher object in view than the mere accumulation of wealth. They were the bankers, merchants, traders, and manufacturers of Liverpool and Manchester. They had agreed that no person should hold more than ten shares each; and if gentlemen would consider what amount of profit could be realized on so small a number of shares, they would perceive that that could not be their object. It was the great interest of the trading community, and not the profits that might be derived from the shares, which mainly actuated these parties. But it was said, that the present canals were sufficient for every purpose of commerce in the districts through which this railway was to pass. It was, nevertheless, well known that cotton had been detained at Liverpool for a fortnight, while the manufacturers at Manchester were obliged to suspend their labours; and goods which had been manufactured at Manchester for foreign parts could not be transmitted to Liverpool in time on account of the tardy canal conveyance. Not less than 1,000 tons of goods a-day were embarked on these canals between Liverpool and Manchester; and if the carriage were not immediate, the merchant and manufacturer were placed in a situation of great disadvantage. The railway company said, they would transmit goods not only at a less charge, but with greater facility than the canal companies could do. These were the great points to be looked to. We who maintained a commercial rivalry with all the countries in the world, ought to look to dispatch—ought to look to economy—for the purpose of securing our present advantages. An hon. gentleman had observed, that if a rail-road were formed, and a toll of 6d. per mile demanded, that toll must be raised to 1s., should another rail-road be directed from and to the same place, because the business would be divided between them, and the original charge of repairs, &c. would remain; but the answer to this was, that where two roads were formed, the traffic must have been doubled, and therefore the rate of 6d. would still remain, notwithstanding the formation of a new road. In 1821, only four years ago, the amount of goods exported from the port of Liverpool—a great part of which, he need not state, was brought by those canals to that town—was 11,500,000l. In 1824 it was upwards of 19,000,000l.: and that exclusive of fuel, and other things necessary for the consumption of Liverpool and Manchester, which were carried on those canals. Under these circumstances, he thought the projected railway ought to be carried into effect. Those who were connected with the canals would then be obliged to pay more attention to the mode of conveyance—they would be compelled to lower their tolls and to use greater dispatch. These, however, were all advantages gained by the public; and the proprietors of canals would find ample remuneration, since there would be sufficient employment, not only for the rail-way, but for a first, a second, and a third canal. He should, therefore, support the bill.

Mr. W. Peel said, this measure was not exclusively beneficial to Liverpool, but to the commerce of the country generally, and more particularly Ireland. There was about as much reason in the complaints of those who were connected with canals, and who therefore wished to stifle this measure, as there was in the petitions of the inn-keepers on the Kent-road, who objected to the steam-packet navigation, because it interfered with their profits. In the neighbourhood of the place where he resided, from twenty to thirty waggons were formerly employed in the carriage of goods; but he believed scarcely one was now occupied in that manner. The alteration must have pressed on the owners of those waggons; but the public derived great advantage from the introduction of a new system. This must always be the case; but it afforded no argument, in policy or justice, against the adoption of an improvement.

Mr. G. Phillips observed, that there was a large body of landed proprietors, through whose estates this rail-way was to be carried, and they complained of it as likely to prove a great annoyance and nuisance. They said, that, before such a measure was determined on, a strong case of public necessity and advantage should be made out, to justify the house in carrying the project into effect. They asserted, that such a case had not been made out. Now, he was of opinion, that considering the existence of the three canals between Manchester and Liverpool, no such case could be established. He thought that a rail-way could not enter into a successful competition with a canal. Even with the best loco-motive engine, the average rate would be but  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles per hour, which was slower than the canal conveyance. If the canals had an ample supply of water, it appeared to him that they would be perfectly competent to convey, with sufficient speed, all the merchandize that passed between Manchester and Liverpool. It was alleged, that the canal proprietors had not sufficient wharfs and warehouses for carrying on the business. Yet, in the very face of this assertion, those who were favourable to the present measure, would, if it were agreed to, carry the road through the wharfs and over the site of the warehouses of those persons whom they represented as being ill provided with accommodations of that kind already. Under these circumstances he should oppose the measure.

Mr. Brougham said that there was nothing in the statements which had been made to induce the house to refuse the committee. He hoped that this would form an exception to the common practice of committees, and that the members would attend and vote without permitting the influence of gentlemen, or the wives of gentlemen who might be interested in the measure, to have any weight with them. He pledged himself if a contrary course were to be followed, that he would bring the matter before the house, and do all in his power to enforce the due attendance of the committee.

The bill was then referred to a committee.

St. Catherine's Docks Bill.

TUESDAY, FEB. 22.—On the motion for the second reading of the above bill,

Mr. C. Calvert declared that he would at a proper time avail himself of the suggestion that had been thrown out, and object to gentlemen who were interested in the measure giving their votes in favour of it. Never was a bill brought into the house in so barefaced a manner as that in which this bill was introduced last year. Persons holding shares to the amount of 50,000l. had voted for it. Now the shareholders were more numerous, and they hoped to carry the measure in a different manner. He concluded by moving—"That the bill be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. Manning seconded the motion. The London Dock afforded sufficient accommodation to the commercial world. The London Dock Company had 13 acres of land, and, if additional accommodation were required, they could furnish it.

Mr. Wallace expressed himself strongly in favour of the bill. The parties who sought for it wanted no exclusive advantages. All they wished for was fair and open competition. It was fit, that in a great commercial country, there should be competition in undertakings of this description. Accommodation, and that of the best kind, should be given to their merchant-vessels, and that would be best obtained through the medium of open competition.

Sir J. Perks would advise gentlemen to keep their money in their pockets against a rainy day, instead of trying to ruin each other by embarking in all sorts of projects. He wished to give every protection to the mercantile marine of this country. He was anxious that the Thames, which was the high road to these docks, should be kept as clear as possible, that ships might pass up and down the river with as little difficulty as coaches passed through the streets. But he thought there was sufficient dock-room already. When he saw the number of bills which were called for, he felt that there was a clashing of interests, which was likely to end in the ruin of different parties. There were companies of all descriptions: companies to bring salt water from Brighton, and air from Bognor (a laugh)—companies to bring "Airs from heaven, and blasts from hell" (laughter). When he saw this—when he observed the variety of clashing interests that were concerned, he fell back on his own resources, on the principles of his own unconquered mind (a laugh)—and he seriously asked himself, whether the gentlemen who thus employed their capital were in the right. In his opinion they were not; and therefore he should oppose the bill.

Mr. C. B. Monck objected, not to the principle, but to the operation of the bill in the particular place which was selected for the erection of the docks. The parish contained 8 or 10,000 persons, who were chiefly employed in the lighters on the river, and they would be deeply injured, if it were carried into effect. He objected also to the sacrilegious exhumation tion of the ashes of the dead, which must be a consequence of it.

Mr. Alderman Thomson said that a large number of the inhabitants of the parish of Bermondsey had consented to the measure, and almost the whole body of merchants and ship-owners were unanimously in favour of it.

The house then divided.—For the second reading, 118—Against it, 30—Majority in favour of the second reading, 88.

Colliers' Dock Bill.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.—Sir J. Yorke, in moving the second reading of the collier dock bill, adverted to various public advantages which were to result from it. The increased number of the coal vessels made some such measure absolutely necessary to the navigation of the river. It would also have the effect, by assuring a regular supply, of reducing the price of coals.

Lord Althorp opposed the bill, which he said was an act to compel all coal vessels to go into these docks and pay the dues, which were to form the profit of the proprietors. He should move, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. Calcraft said that the bill did not compel the colliers to go into dock; it only forbade them to lie in the stream of the river.

Sir G. Cockburn said, that great injury was done to the navigation of the river by the immense masses of shipping that lay constantly in the stream. The tide was so obstructed, that banks were formed to a great extent from the deposit.

Mr. J. Smith opposed the compulsory clause, which prevented colliers from unloading in the stream, which was just the same as saying that they should not unload in the river at all. He had no objection to the bill if this clause were removed.

Mr. Stuart Wortley thought that if the Isle of Dogs dock should turn out to be an advantage to the colliers, they would resort to it without compulsion; and if not, it would be unfair and unjust to compel them.

Sir M. W. Ridley would not consent to the second reading of the bill as long as it contained the compulsory clause. He objected to the practice of introducing public clauses into private bills. If any evil were believed to exist from the practice of colliers unloading in the stream, let a public committee be appointed to inquire into it; and if their report should recommend it, let the evil be remedied by a public bill; but let it not be introduced in this manner in a private bill.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.—Sir T. Lethbridge brought in a bill for making a ship-canal from Seaton Bay, in the county of Devon, to Bridgewater Bay, on the Bristol Channel. It was intended that it should admit of vessels of 900 tons burden; and one of the chief advantages which it held out to the public was the time which would be saved, and the risk to men and cargoes which would be avoided by its affording a way to ships without the necessity of their encountering the dangerous navigation of the Land's End. The plan had been submitted to, and had received the approbation of many persons who were best enabled to pronounce upon it, and they had all agreed that it would be highly advantageous. The whole of the capital required for this canal had been actually subscribed, and amounted to 2,000,000l. The canal would pass through a very considerable extent of country, some of which was of a poor, some of a rich description. The number of persons over whose property it was to pass, was about one thousand. Of these 918 had been applied to, and only 50 of that number offered any objection to it. It was to pass near and through several large towns, the commerce of which would be considerably benefited by it. The coasting trade would also be made more secure, because it was intended to form spacious bays at each end of the canal, one of which would offer a harbour to ships in the British, and the other to those in the Bristol channel, in case of storms; and lastly, by the facility of communication which it would afford, the traffic between England and Ireland would be materially improved.

Sir J. Yorke feared that the proposed canal might have a detrimental effect on the coasting trade, and by shortening it destroy that service which had for many years been so excellent a nursery for seamen, and contributed in a very great degree to the brilliant victories which had distinguished the arms of this nation by sea.

Sir T. Lethbridge said, there could be no chance of the canal having the effect which the hon. bart. feared, because the voyages of the ships were neither to begin nor end at the canal, but it was only to facilitate the voyage between the two channels.

The bill having been read a first and second time, was ordered to be committed.

Law of Merchant and Factor.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—Mr. J. Smith rose to present a petition, signed by nearly all the principal merchants of London. They complained of the operation of certain laws relating to merchant and factor, which they described as injurious to the general interests of commerce. He had, in the last session, brought forward a bill on this subject, of which the object was defeated in the other house, by substituting another measure quite inadequate to remedy the evil of which the petitioners complained.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow supported the petition, and thought the country indebted to the hon. member for calling the attention of the house to this important subject.

Mr. T. Wilson described the subject as most important to the commerce of the country. Although this was only a petition from the merchants of London, he felt convinced that it represented the opinions of the merchants of every town in England.

Mr. Huskisson said, that as the present was not the fittest time for discussing this important question, he would abstain from entering into it. He was not indifferent to its importance, and if any measure should be introduced respecting it, he should give it his best consideration.

Mr. Scarlett hoped, that if any measure were introduced it would be done in an intelligible manner. For his own part, he did not understand the bill of last year, and the measure which was carried was not yet understood by the judges. He should be sorry to oppose any measure calculated to improve the commercial regulations of the country; but he hoped that no future bill would contain that objectionable clause which took from a man the fair dominion over his own property, and allowed others to speculate at his risk.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 7.—The Earl of Liverpool rose, on the order of the day, to move the second reading of a bill for amending the law of merchant and factor. In the first place, he wished to call attention to a petition in favour of the alteration proposed, which was signed by almost all the respectable merchants of London—by general merchants, East India, West India, North and South American merchants, those who traded to the north of Europe, to Spain, Portugal, and the Levant—in short, by the representatives of every commercial interest. The question which this bill involved might present some difficulty to persons who, like himself, were little acquainted with the details of commerce. He should endeavour to state briefly, the general grounds on which he wished to recommend the bill. It was to be expected in the present state of trade, that many cases should arise, in which laws enacted at an early period would prove embarrassing—laws, which, however politic in their origin, would become incompatible with the present state of commerce. With regard to the law of merchant and factor, if the mere principle of the contract between these parties were considered, there could be doubt that the agent ought to be bound to the extent of his principal's orders. But in the present state of trade, it was often impossible for the merchant to do more than make a general consignment, by which the factor was left to determine when he should bring the goods into the market; and if it should not be a proper time for throwing the article into the market, it was often necessary that he should be empowered to raise money upon it, by pledge. Thus far there was no doubt that the factor was bound by the instructions of his principal. But here a difficulty intervened, with respect to third parties. When the factor pledges the goods, the party lending money upon them—the pledgee—deals with the factor as owner; for as to the title of the party pledging, he can have no means of ascertaining it. He would, of course, know no more of the ownership than the fact of possession; unless the possessor chose to make disclosures. Now, supposing fraud or bankruptcy in the factor, was the loss to fall on the principal or on the pledgee who might have advanced money on the goods? It was said that if the factor's instructions were merely to sell, he could not pledge; and that in the case of pledging the loss ought to fall on the pledgee. Such was the law. But this was contrary to the principles of natural equity—contrary to analogy—contrary to very high authority—contrary to the law in other countries. The liability of the third party was contrary to the principles of equity, because the pledgee advanced his money on the mere possession of the factor, which was all he was able to ascertain. But it might well be assumed that the principal was acquainted with the person he employed as his agent; at any rate he could qualify his power, or deprive him of all authority to act. A principal might, doubtless, be defrauded by a dishonest agent;

but he must know he had the power of appointing or dismissing him, and stood, with respect to him, in a very different situation from the pledgee. The person who advanced money saw nothing, probably knew nothing, but the goods, upon which, as a sufficient security, he advanced his money; and therefore, upon every ground of equity, if there were a loss, it should fall upon the principal or the agent, and not upon the pledgee. The present state of the law made a distinction between possession and title to merchandise; but he did not see how it was possible for trade to be carried on, if possession were not allowed to be prima facie proof of title. The petition on the table proved that this might be the law, and the greater part of the commerce of London, and two-thirds of the foreign trade of the country, already rested on this principle of general equity. In support of this opinion he would refer to analogous transactions with regard to money. If a person consigned Exchequer, or indeed any other bills, to another, who pledged them to a third party, the pledgee had a right to the property. With regard, therefore, to all money securities, the law made possession a good title. In point of authority, the first decision which set up the present law took place in 1742; but against this decision he had the high opinions of Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Le Blanc, who had regretted that such should be the practice; and to these opinions he referred as sufficient authority for altering the present law. He came now to the last consideration, which was, that the present practice was contrary to the law of every other country on the subject, except England and the United States, who had borrowed their laws from England. He was informed that the evils of the law had been felt in America, where it was about to be discussed in Congress. The protection he proposed to afford to the pledgee, was even at this moment the law of Scotland. On all these grounds he recommended the adoption of this bill.

The bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—Mr. Huskisson moved the third reading of Lord Liverpool's bill; whereupon

Mr. Scarlett rose to oppose the motion. After much prefatory matter, the learned gent. said that the general question, involved in this measure, might be stated thus: should an agent who held a bill of lading, or other order for receiving the goods of his principal, for the purpose of sale, or for any other specific purpose, having no claim whatever against the principal, have power by law to raise money upon these goods by pledge of the document or order, for his own benefit, or for some object in which the principal had no interest, and thereby, if he became bankrupt or insolvent, deprive his principal of the right to reclaim the possession of his property remaining unsold, except upon the condition of redeeming the pledge? Now, to determine fairly upon this question, it was necessary to consider who were the parties that could have any interest in it. The first was the principal whose goods were placed in jeopardy; the second was the agent or factor; the third was the money-lender. He presumed no argument could be necessary to satisfy a common understanding, that the principal or true owner of the goods could never be the advocate of a measure, that had a manifest tendency to diminish his own security. It might be said, that the facility of raising money upon the pledge of goods had a tendency to prevent their being thrown upon a falling market, and that the owners of goods upon sale had a general interest in this, which outweighed the risk they ran of the insolvency of their factors. It was difficult to deal with an argument that presented itself in so abstract a form. He believed that the owner of goods on sale was more apt to consider his own individual hazards and interests, which he could easily comprehend, than the general interests of the extensive class in which the argument placed him. If a factor had actually advanced money, or accepted bills for the benefit of his principal, it was admitted that there could be nothing unjust or injurious to the principal in permitting the factor rather to pledge the goods for reimbursing himself, or paying the bills, than to compel him to a forced sale of the goods. This case, when it occurred, every owner of goods could understand. He could see that his interest was in no way prejudiced, since he must pay the money due to the factor by the sale of the goods or otherwise. But beyond this point, he was persuaded, that the general abstract interest of vendors in sustaining high market prices, would never be of sufficient force to induce an owner of particular goods to put them in hazard for the credit of a factor. On the contrary, he believed, that the owner of goods would never trust them with a factor to whom he was not indebted, but upon the understanding that the factor had capital enough to sustain his credit without in any measure sacrificing the property of his principals. It was well known, that in a great variety of trades there existed a competition amongst factors, which induced them to offer various portions of the invoice price by way of advance to their principals, in order to invite a preference. Now this mode of dealing plainly implied, that the factor held himself out as in possession of adequate capital to do even more than the strict duties of a factor required. How then could it be assumed, that the principals generally anticipated the possibility of a want of credit in their factors leading to forced sales? But if this general theory of the abstract interests of the owners of goods on sale were founded on truth, it ought to follow, that the factors should be rather encouraged than not to raise money by pledges; whereas, by an inconsistency somewhat new in legislation, they were by this bill declared criminal, and made liable to fourteen years' transportation, for doing that which the argument supposed to be a general benefit, and which the same bill sanctioned and made binding in law upon innocent parties who were defrauded by it. Moreover he was not prepared to admit that there was any public benefit resulting from that degree of facility in procuring money upon goods, which tended to raise them to an artificial price. It was far from his intention to embark upon this topic in the present argument; but the power of turning every commodity in the market into its nominal value in currency, which in effect was the enhancing of prices by an indefinite augmentation of that currency, and not of the real wealth of the country, implied an artificial state of the currency, which could neither be lasting nor advantageous to any community.—The next party whose interest was involved was the factor. Now it might well be doubted, whether a law which carried along with it a penalty upon him could be intended for his benefit. And it might, he thought, he assumed, that there was as little of wisdom or policy as of morality, in making a law for the express purpose of sanctioning the fraud, and increasing the power of a dishonest agent. It was plain that the law was applicable to such agents only. An honest factor might undoubtedly be reduced by misfortune to the necessity of borrowing money; but he denied that any honest man would borrow money upon the goods of another, in which he had no interest; still less would an honest man make a false representation of his title to the goods on which he sought to borrow money. It followed then, that the interest of an honest factor could not be concerned in this law. That it would serve the ends, and gratify the wishes of some factors, he entertained no doubt; but he could not think it either necessary or wise in the legislature to pass a law for the benefit of that description of factors, to whom alone, he was most confidently of opinion, that this law, when rightly understood, would appear to be beneficial. They would calculate upon the remote risk of prosecution by a principal residing abroad; whom they would always protest they intended to serve, not to defraud, when in a season of necessity, produced by their own imprudent speculations or extravagance, they found it expedient to satisfy their English creditors, by distributing amongst them the goods of their principals; and at all events, to make no enemies of their bankers, with whom, when their difficulties were over, they might desire to open a new account.—The only remaining party whose interest was to be considered, was the lender of the money upon the pledged goods. To him he most freely admitted, that the proposed law was highly advantageous. Nothing could be more useful or desirable to the lenders of money, than a rule of law which might dispense with all caution about the nature of the title on which they lent. To them it would be highly advantageous to make the mere naked possession of property of all description, and in all cases a conclusive title against all mankind. They might then accept property of all sorts, and from all manner of persons, upon pledge without risk. It would greatly facilitate all transactions of lending money, and add much to that species of commerce, if it were clearly established that the lender was never called upon to make any inquiry about the title of property offered in pledge. It was very well understood even now, that the shops which bought or advanced money upon all manner of goods without asking questions, had a vast superiority of custom. But unfortunately, an opinion had hitherto prevailed, which had tended to discredit this species of traffic. It had been thought, perhaps from mere prejudice, that if there were no receivers, there would be fewer thieves; and that one of the best modes of protecting property from fraud and plunder, was to expose the receiver, in some cases, to punishment, and in all cases to the loss of the property which he had received through the felony, the fraud, or the embezzlement of the party from whom he obtained it. It had been thought, moreover, a strong argument against the receiver, that he should have made no proper inquiry of the party offering him property upon pledge or sale. The man who voluntarily turned his eyes away from the light, that he might afterwards seek for shelter in his own ignorance, surely suspected the existence of that which he thought it not safe to discover too clearly. If this observation were just, it was as applicable at least to the best informed merchants and bankers, as to the more ignorant part of mankind. It was therefore very fit to be considered, admitting the benefit of this law to money-lenders, whether it could be of any real advantage to commerce to introduce this sort of morality into it by Act of Parliament, and to what extent, if once introduced, it must be carried. Now it was manifest, that a banker or merchant applied to by a factor to lend money upon the pledge of goods, must be aware that if the borrower were honest, and meant to pledge none but his own goods, he could not possibly have the slightest objection to make his title to the goods known, by producing his invoice, or his letters of advice. The application for money disclosed his necessity. The disclosure of his title, if it were a good one, could have no other effect than to strengthen his credit. No man who wanted credit could feel any desire more natural or more strong than that of displaying the resources which could best procure him credit. He gained confidence by it, was the more certain of immediately attaining his object, and could by no possibility do himself or any other man any injury by it. In all imaginable cases, therefore, where such an application was made by the holder of bills of lading, or other orders for the delivery of goods, without at the same time shewing or offering to shew his invoices or letters of advice, the money lender had, from that very omission, the more reason to suspect that the ambiguous documents which were alone produced were held by the party applying in the character of a factor or agent, and not that of a principal. The plain dictates of honesty and good faith in such a case, surely more imperiously prescribed that the lender should demand an inspection of the particulars withheld. Wherever he omitted to do so, the inference was plain, that he feared he might be pressing for an embarrassing disclosure. Those who were conversant with cases of this kind in courts of law, were well aware of the many shifts to which he who was desirous of lending money to a needy man, upon pledge of goods, without risk was obliged to resort. The most common of these was a fictitious sale of the goods. The suspicious lender, unwilling to embarrass his friend, or to imply a doubt of his integrity, which he really felt, was not disposed to take goods upon pledge, but he had no objection to purchase them, if he could be sure of a small profit. The borrower had no difficulty in satisfying him; he offered to repurchase the goods to be paid for at a future day, at a small increased price. Sometimes a third party intervened, who became the intermediate buyer and seller. He appealed to his learned friend (the Attorney General) if he had not had very recent experience in the Court of King's Bench, of these dextrous expedients. They were, it must be owned, not so convenient a machinery for fraud as the more direct road opened by this bill; and what was worse, they were sometimes, more especially in cases of bankruptcy, found ineffectual. The basis of the transaction was fraud, and it had been hitherto one of the most universal maxims of the common law, that fraud vitiated and avoided all transactions of which it made a part. But this bill proposed to qualify that maxim, in the particular case in which the fraud and dishonesty of the borrower of the money, was combined with the affected ignorance and real suspicion of the lender. For no advantage then of the principal, for no advantage of the honest factor, but for the mere benefit and security of the careless at least, if not the crafty and suspicious lender of money, a law was to be passed, whereby a dishonest factor or agent of any kind might more successfully defraud his principal. Was the necessity of lending money then so urgent, that it must be the paramount object of legislation? Or was it worthy of the character of the law of England, that it should lend an express and positive sanction to such transactions? That it should proclaim free liberty of fraud as part of the freedom of trade, and consecrate in the very sanctuary of legislation the principles of treachery and spoliation?—But it had been said, that admitting the factor to be guilty of fraud, and to merit punishment, the question was between two innocent persons, which should bear the loss resulting from that fraud, the one who had placed confidence in a dishonest factor by trusting him with his goods for sale, or the lender of the money who had placed no confidence, but exacted the security of goods for his loan? It would be easy to shew the sophistry of this mode of stating the question. In the first place, it was not true that the lender had placed no confidence in the factor, but just the reverse. The lender knowing that the true owner of merchandize must always be in possession of documents to prove his title, had chosen to rely upon the representation of the borrower, or upon an ambiguous bill of lading or order for delivery, without demanding those documents. In the next place, the lender was aware that the borrower was pressed by some urgent call for money, and that a man who was obliged to borrow was never unwilling to shew his title to credit if he had any. It was the lender, therefore, who, disregarding circumstances that ought to have excited his suspicion, had placed an unwary confidence in the mere personal character of a necessitous borrower. Whereas the principal, more especially the foreign principal, had less means of knowing the circumstances of the factor, and had confided to him nothing but what was warranted by the usual course of trade. Every man who carried on a particular branch of business, held himself out to the world, and might be reasonably presumed by those who dealt with him in that line only, to have competent skill, integrity, and resources for his ordinary business. Nor could it be reasonably supposed, that any owner of merchandizes would intrust them for sale to a factor whom he thought deficient in any of these points. But the man who dealt with a factor, not in the way of his business, but in transactions of lending him money, must surely know best, or at least was bound to know best, what were his resources. Besides, the foreign merchant was under the necessity of trusting his goods to a factor for sale; he could not otherwise conduct his commerce. But what necessity had any man for lending his money upon the pledge of goods? What obliged him to do so without first ascertaining the title of the borrower? How would commerce suffer if no factor should hereafter ever be able to obtain money upon goods in which he has no claim or interest? The true way then of stating the question seemed to be this:—Whether of the two parties, supposing them equally innocent of fraud, should the loss fall upon—him who had lent his money without necessity, without inquiry, and under circumstances that justified suspicion, and called for inquiry, or upon the owner of the goods, who was under the necessity of trusting an agent with them, who did not know of the embarrassment of that agent, and who had no negligence or want of caution to reproach himself with? But it was said, that the foreign principal might easily protect himself from the fraud of his factor by inserting his name as agent in the bill of lading. Those who insisted upon this topic had not considered, and probably were not aware, how many questions, and how much litigation, would necessarily arise from the introduction of a new clause into a long established and well understood instrument. Many doubts would occur as to the rights of third parties, as well as of the agent himself, under such a bill of lading: at present no doubt existed. But let it be recollected, that this measure was not confined to a bill of lading, but extended to every warrant or order for delivery of goods. Now, supposing the bill of lading to denote the factor as agent, it must always depend on his pleasure whether his name or that of his principal should appear at the wharfs, at the docks, or at the brokers, or in any of the subsequent documents which were enumerated in this bill.—But the true way of considering the principle of the law on this subject, was to examine what authority was to be inferred from the actual possession and custody of merchandise; for surely it was a solecism in reasoning, to infer a greater right and power in the holder of the mere order or authority to receive the possession, than in the actual possessor. To say that the custody of the various documents, which entitled the holder of them to receive possession of merchandise, should be conclusive evidence of his right to transfer the property, but that the actual possession of the merchandise itself, which was the result and consequence of these documents, and in effect the very consummation of their object, should confer no such right, was a manifest absurdity. It seemed, therefore, that the necessary consequence of this law was to revive the ancient and only rule of property in the first stages of society; namely, possession. Now, it may be worth while to pause for a moment, for the purpose of inquiring to what extent this ancient rule of property might be carried in our present artificial condition. If the possession of personal chattels were in all cases to enable the possessor to make a binding disposition of them, then it followed, that the renter of a ready-furnished house might make a binding pledge of the furniture to a pawnbroker; that a servant intrusted with his master's goods, jewels, or plate, might sell or pawn them to a broker for his own benefit; that a drover, intrusted with a farmer's cattle or sheep for sale in Smithfield (he was properly a factor), might pay his own debts with them, or raise money upon the pledge of them. Nay, why should not a coachmaker pledge or sell a carriage sent to him for repair? Or a stable-keeper, horses standing with him at livery? Or a gentleman, his job carriage and horses? All these, and a thousand other cases, depended on the principle now proposed to be subverted for the benefit of those who had money to lend. It would be more simple and intelligible to declare at once, that possession was in all cases conclusive evidence of title. It was said, however, that a bill of lading was a negotiable instrument by the custom of merchants, and that there was no reason why it should not circulate like a bill of exchange, the property in which was always transferred by indorsement for a valuable consideration. It was certainly true, that by the general rule a bill of exchange was transferred by indorsement, without reference to the title of the indorser. But this rule was subject to certain exceptions in those cases where the bill was offered or indorsed under such circumstances, as ought reasonably to have excited the suspicion of the party accepting it. If in such cases he took it without inquiry, though he gave the full value for it, the property was not transferred to him. But, in fact, there was no just analogy between a bill of exchange and a bill of lading, any more than between the things they represented. A bill of lading was a contract for the carriage and delivery of goods to the shipper, or his order, or the consignee. It entitled the holder to receive the goods. By the custom of merchants, the power or title to receive the goods might be transferred by indorsement; but the property in the goods could not be transferred by indorsement, except by the true owner. The indorsee of the bill of lading received the same title as the indorser had, and no more. The title to receive possession could not give a better right than the actual possession. A bill of exchange, on the contrary, was the acknowledgment of a debt from the acceptor to the drawer. It represented neither specific goods, nor specific monies, but imported a debt which might be paid in any lawful coin, and which, by the custom of merchants, might be transferred to an indorsee. If that indorsee should be but an agent, he would nevertheless be accountable to his principal only in the character of a debtor, and not for the delivery or safe custody of any specific monies. The receipt of money by an agent for his principal, by the laws of all nations, made him a debtor to his principal, and he might discharge that debt by paying the same amount in any other lawful coin. The currency of a nation, or that which represented the currency, as a bill of exchange, had been deemed of too fugitive a nature to be placed under the same regulations in all respects as other property. As far as he knew, the distinction existed in every civilized country. It was founded upon the very nature of the thing. The loan or deposit of a horse, or other specific chattel, implied a contract to return the same individual article: the loan of a guinea, or of a sum of money, implied no such thing; if it did, what would become of the profits of a banker? The cases of a bill of lading and a bill of exchange would be more parallel, if the bill of exchange were for a particular sealed bag of money; but then it would cease to be a bill of exchange, and become an order for a specific bag of money, not intended to circulate, but to be brought to the true owner in that form.—Before he concluded, he would call the attention of the house to the very peculiar situation in which an owner of goods might find himself placed by this law. By the laws of Russia, and of some other countries, the owner of goods actually shipped, who might have transmitted bills of lading duly signed by the master of the ship to his factor in London for sale, had a right, if he heard of the insolvency of the factor, to compel the master of the ship, before she quitted her final port of departure, to reland the goods upon paying a reasonable compensation for the freight; or to sign fresh bills of lading. What would be the surprise of such an owner, if he should afterwards accompany his own property to England, to find, that some rich merchant or banker in possession of the first set of bills of lading, pledged by the insolvent factor, not only claimed the goods, but was entitled by the law of England to maintain an action against him the true owner, to recover against him the possession of his own goods? The predicament would be strange, and not very honourable to the commercial code of our country.—For these reasons, he should give the bill his decided negative*.

Mr. Huskisson, Mr. J. Smith, Mr. T. Wilson, and Mr. Baring, supported the measure, declaring that merchants, bankers, and traders, were all dissatisfied with the existing law.

The bill was read a third time, and passed†.

Combination Laws.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29.—Mr. Huskisson rose, with great regret, to call the attention of the house to the effects of an act of last session, by which the Combination Laws had been repealed, and which now seemed likely to be followed by inconvenience and danger. The parties immediately interested in that proceeding had been subsequently acting under a misconstruction of the intentions of the Legislature; and in the motion with which he meant to conclude this evening, he proposed to correct that misconception, and not to re-enact the combination laws. He had always advocated the principle of allowing every man to dispose of his labour to the best advantage; and he thought that many of the old laws directly violated that principle. He then proceeded to advert to the bringing in of the 5th Geo. IV. c. 95, and to the avowed objects of that bill. He admitted that in principle those objects seemed to be perfectly fair, and equally to affect workmen and their employers; but such was not their practical effects; and as long as the act continued it would keep up between workmen and their employers a spirit, on one side, of alarm, on the other, of distrust. But, to review the course of the proceedings of last session:—A committee was granted, on the motion of the member for Aberdeen, for inquiry into the operation of the old laws, consisting of fifty members; and it undoubtedly examined a vast variety of evidence upon all questions connected with the subject. The result was—not a report to that house, stating the grounds upon which the committee recommended the introduction of their bill; and thereby affording to the public, and to parliament, an account of the motives which induced them to recommend it; they only passed a string of resolutions which involved no such statement whatever (hear, hear). He was himself a member of that committee; he mentioned that circumstance with regret; as, owing to his official avocations, he had not attended it so frequently as he could have wished, and as the importance of its inquiries demanded. The same causes precluded him, when the bill was brought into the house, from considering it with all attention and care in its various stages (hear). He must go further, and express his regret that such of its enactments which were of a legal nature had not, possibly, been discussed with all the technical knowledge which might have been applied to them by those of his learned friends to whose professional learning the Government ordinarily had recourse. The consequence of all this had been, that some of the provisions of the bill were of a very extraordinary nature. It not only repealed all former statutes relative to combinations and conspiracies of workmen, but it provided that no proceedings should be had at common law, &c., for the future (hear, hear), on account of any such combinations. This was the more curious, inasmuch as the hon. member who introduced the bill had taken occasion to state what was certainly high legal authority—namely, that of the member for Nottingham, that the common law would still be sufficient to prevent injurious combinations. The bill was introduced in this state; read a second time on the 2d of June; and on Saturday the 5th, only four days after the second reading, was read a third time and passed, without any discussion. The measure was therefore hurried on with as much expedition as was usually applied to the most pressing bills. To the hon. gent. himself he imputed no blame for this dispatch. Looking to the advanced period of the session, and the discussion which it had received in the committee, it was natural enough that he should desire it to go speedily through the house. But, since the passing of the act, it had happened to him (Mr. Huskisson) in his official capacity to receive complaints of the conduct of bodies of workmen in various parts of the country. They were, many of them, very painful accounts; and to his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel) reports had been forwarded, detailing acts of outrage and violence of the most disgraceful character (hear, hear). Those workmen, who had misconceived the real object of the act, had manifested a disposition to combine against the masters, and a tendency to proceedings destructive of their property and business, which, if left to itself, must terminate in the greatest mischief. Those mischiefs were growing in some districts to so alarming a pitch, that if they were not speedily repressed by the interference of parliament, his rt. hon. friend (Mr. Peel) would ere long have to deal with them in another way, by exerting the civil authority with which he was invested, and which he would not hesitate to exercise for protecting the property and persons of many of the king's subjects from these organized conspiracies. But by a timely inquiry into the subject, parliament might still be enabled to deal with it as a mere question of commercial polity—as a question relating to the rights of the labourers and the rights and property of their employers. While he thus designated the character of these combinations, he hoped he should not be considered as hostile to the right which every man had, generally speaking, to dispose of his labour and skill as he might think proper (hear, hear). He admitted the principle. He had always maintained that labour was the poor man's capital. But, on the other hand, he must as strenuously contend for the perfect freedom of those who were to give employment to that labour (hear, hear). Their's was the property which rendered that labour necessary—by which it was to be employed—by which its employment was to be paid for. If their title to freedom in these matters could not be sustained, the means of employing labour would be destroyed; and the workmen themselves would be the victims of a delusive attempt to influence and intimidate their employers (hear, hear). He would not enter at length into details, but he would advert to one or two papers that he held in his hand, which pretty clearly developed the views and the proposals of the combined workmen. The first was entitled, "The Articles of Regulation of the Operative Colliers of Lanark and Dumbar-ton." The second of "The Ayrshire Association;" and he could produce a great number of such articles forming as regular a constitution as any of those they daily read of as springing up in every part of the world. The associations had their delegates, their presidents, their committees of management, and every other sort of functionary comprised in the plan of a government (a laugh). One of the regulations provided "that the delegates from all the different works should assemble at one and the same place" on certain stated occasions: thus forming a systematic union of the workmen of different trades, and a delegation from each to one central meeting (hear, hear). Thus there was established, as against the employers, a formal system of delegation—a kind of federal republic; the trades being represented by delegates, forming a sort of Congress (a laugh). Another regulation was to this effect—"Each delegate shall be paid by his own work, excepting only the President—the Secretary—and the Treasurer, who are to be paid out of the general funds. The delegates are elected for six months, and may be re-elected." So here was a tax levied upon each workman for purposes of this mischievous character. But the real meaning and intentions of these societies, were shewn in another article, which declared that "It is the duty of these delegates, first, to point out the masters they dislike (hear, hear); Secondly, to warn such masters"—of what?—"of the danger in which they are placed in consequence of this combination; and, thirdly, to try every thing which prudence might dictate to put them out of the trade."—In such a position "prudence" implied merely that precaution that might prevent the "Union" from being brought within a breach of the law—such as the crime of murder, for example. Why, was it right, or reasonable, that persons engaged in commercial or other pursuits—should thus be kept in constant terror about their interests and property? To shew how regularly organized these bodies were, and how they proposed to exercise the tyranny he complained of, over such masters as might be placed within the sphere of their control, he would allude to the following article:—"These articles may be modified and altered at any meeting of the delegates; and if sanctioned at such meeting by two-thirds of the delegates present, they shall be final. The power of levying money from all the members of the association must be left to the general committee." So that these were not to be voluntary, but compulsory contributions—contributions "levied" upon all the parties to the union. "All laws passed by the delegates will be binding on all whom those delegates represent." Now, one of these laws was, "that there should never be allowed to be any stock of coals in the hands of any of the masters;" because if such stocks were allowed, they would be less dependent on the workmen, and might possess some means of rescuing themselves from the tyranny of the association. Other associations, however, were governed by regulations, if possible, more extraordinary. One was "that no man coming into any district within the control assumed by the associating parties, should be allowed to work, without being previously amerced 5l., to be applied to the funds of the association" (hear). And another "that any child being permitted to work, should, at ten years old, be reckoned a quarter of a man, and pay a proportionable amercement (laughter); at eighteen, to pay full price." In like manner it was provided, "that any man being called in by any collier to his assistance, should not be at liberty to work under him, unless previously adopted by the society, and unless he should have paid his 5l." Now in this part of the empire, looking to the artificial situation in which this country was placed in regard to the poor laws, that parties, who were liable some day or other to become reversioners on that immense fund, had no right to take measures that had an obvious tendency to throw them on that fund, and so increase the burden which its support imposed upon the country. He would ask whether this 5l., and the subscription of 1s. a week to the association, would not produce to each of the parties, if placed in a saving bank, far more advantageous results? These presidents and members of committees, were doubtless anxious for the enjoyment of the power which such posts would confer upon them? And was it not a principle of human nature, that in all contests for power, the most artful were those who usually obtained their object and seated themselves in places of authority? This consideration rendered it still more necessary to look narrowly into these assemblies. Another rule was, that every measure should undergo discussion, and that the majority should bind the rest—a proper rule in debating societies; but one, under these circumstances, not only inconsistent with the rights of the masters, but with the fair competition of the labourers for employment. That he had not over-stated the facts, the articles from which he had been reading would sufficiently shew: one of them declared, "that no operative, being a member of the association, shall be at liberty to engage himself for any given time or price, without the consent of the committee of management;" a law, which if put in practice generally, would be followed by effects he dared scarcely contemplate. Partially, it had been put in practice. There had been a society formed, called the "Seamen's Union." Their principles and object had been promulgated in the form of a dialogue—not the less interesting be it observed, on that account, to those whom they were addressed to. In this, as in other concerns, the association had come to the determination of not submitting to the authority of any persons whom they had not themselves appointed or approved. It appeared that they who were employed as seamen in the coasting trade, would not put to sea unless the rest of the crew, with the sole exception of the master, were members of their union (hear, hear). It was one of the articles of this union that men thus employed "should do nothing which they had never before been called upon to do as seamen," but which it was quite evident it might be very material on particular emergencies that they should do. Let the house observe the mischiefs that might ensue from such a regulation. He could state a case that had recently occurred, in which a vessel got on a sand-bank at the mouth of the river

It became necessary to have her ballast shifted; but it happened that one of the observations in this dialogue between Tom and Harry, purported that it was unworthy a seaman to assist in shifting ballast. The consequence was, that all the men were in a state of mutiny; and if other craft had not come up to the vessel's assistance, it was impossible to say what consequences might have ensued to her. As soon as the balance had been shifted by the craft's hands, the men returned to their duty, and navigated the vessel as before. But what was the result of their refusal to shift the ballast? The men in the craft who had performed the service claimed salvage. A sum of 200*l.* was awarded to them on account of salvage, which the owners were obliged to pay, the award declaring that the danger of the ship and cargo saved, was occasioned by the adherence of the crew to the rule of the Seamen's Union. If any man could affirm that such principles and conduct were not matter for the interference of Parliament, he would say, that Parliament had better cease protecting any species of property. He was not, however, surprised, when he looked at the wording of the act of last session, and the misconception that might easily be put upon it, that those men should have erroneously supposed their proceedings to be warranted by that act. The 2d section declared, "that journeymen, workmen, and other persons, who shall hereafter enter into any combination to obtain higher rates of wages," and so forth: "or to regulate the mode of carrying on any manufacture, trade, or business, or the management thereof, shall not be subject to any indictment or prosecution for conspiracy, or to any other proceeding or punishment whatever, either under the common or statute law." Would not any body on reading this sentence, suppose it was almost commendable for workmen to combine together to regulate the management of trade. He did not doubt that a great proportion of the associated workmen believed, that so far from violating the law, they had only been pursuing a course conformable with the meaning of the legislature. If then, it were only to set them right, inquiry should be forthwith instituted.—He would next direct attention to the 5th section of the act. That provided, not that any such combination should be subject to legal cognizance, but "that if any person shall hereafter by threats deter a man from his hiring, or engage in any combination or conspiracy, to destroy any machinery, goods, wares, or merchandizes, he shall, upon being convicted of such offence before a magistrate, on the evidence of any two witnesses, be punished with two months' imprisonment" (hear). Now it surely did not require an act of Parliament to declare that to deter a man by threats from his hiring, or to destroy, or combine for the destruction of goods or machinery, was an offence punishable in a certain way, upon conviction. Such acts were already offences by the law of the land, independent of any thing like combination; in so far, at least, the provisions of this act were supererogatory. It was also extraordinary that the act should require the conviction to be on the oath of two witnesses—two witnesses being necessary only in cases of high treason and perjury: and that the punishment should be limited to two months' imprisonment. Here was a law that contemplated certain offences which had in themselves nothing necessarily to do with the offence of combination. But under this act—"threatening or plotting together for the destruction of machinery," were no longer criminal offences (hear, hear). The act was totally inadequate to put down an evil—not the evil of committing the offences to which the act had so particularly adverted, but the evil of workmen being permitted to plot, and the bold open avowal of their intention to carry such plots into effect, in the manner he had pointed out to the house—a manner most destructive to the property of their employers. If these misguided men could be induced, for one moment, to reflect upon the inevitable consequences of their conduct, they must see that no man would embark his capital under these risks; or submit its application to a control that nobody with capital would for a moment choose to endure. They would perceive the impossibility of their being left at liberty to pursue the career of violence in which they were now proceeding; and that they must soon cease to procure employment for their own subsistence. Capital must desert the districts in which they carried on their measures; and ultimately, unless the evil were arrested, must leave the kingdom itself. He would recommend those who employed workmen, not lightly to submit to such pretensions, and to feel assured, that the magistrates would give them their support. If that should be found inadequate, his rt. hon. friend would not fail to afford them such further assistance as might be necessary. In what state the law should be put—whether the last act should be repealed altogether, or not, he was not at present prepared to suggest. He should be sorry to see all the laws formerly in force, renewed; but it might be well worth consideration to ascertain whether something more definite and effectual than the existing statute could not be devised—something that might prevent the evil he had been describing from extending itself any further than the point to which it had already arrived. In the mean time, he felt that in submitting these matters to the house, he was acting conscientiously in the discharge of his public duty (cheers). He had trusted, that after the first ebullition, the good sense of the workmen would have pointed out to them the error of their proceedings. That anticipation he could now no longer indulge. It was, therefore, with the hope of doing justice to both the workmen and their employers—that he now moved "for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the effect of the act, &c., and to report their opinion as to how far it may be necessary to repeal or amend the said act" (cheers).

Mr. Hume having watched with great care the operation of the act, admitted the workmen referred to had very much misconducted themselves. But it should not be forgotten, that since the passing of that act, employment had been increasing, workmen had been more in demand: and it might be fairly argued that these causes had tended to the mischief complained of, more than the repeal of the former laws with respect to combination. The rt. hon. gent. stated that the act had gone too far in repealing the old laws, against the fact of combination: he thought him mistaken. Formerly, if two or three persons were found together with papers, they were liable to imprisonment, and many had suffered punishment for being so found. He would call upon the rt. hon. gent. to draw a distinction between two cases. There might be meetings of persons combining peaceably for proper purposes, and there might be meetings for disorderly purposes. The committee which sat on this subject, drew this distinction, that it might be lawful for men and masters to meet together to consult upon the rate of wages; but if three masters met to settle wages, or three men, they might be prosecuted. This was more than fair to the masters, when it was remembered, that out of the many cases of conspiracy against masters none were proved, from the difficulty of procuring evidence; while the convictions of the men were innumerable. The punishment inflicted for the offence of combining by 28 and 39 Geo. III., was imprisonment for two months. The question was, whether this or any other punishment was necessary, unless in cases where the men violently interfered with the property of their masters or fellow workmen. His opinion undoubtedly was, that both parties should be free to make what bargains, and to act in what manner, they should deem best for their own interest. He thought the law, as it stood at present, was as strong as it need be, and he should therefore oppose any increase of its severity upon one of the parties, while the other was left untouched. He was sorry to say that the Union Societies in Dublin had been productive of great evil; many persons had actually been murdered; but then he was happy to observe that although these Union Societies existed also in England, they were not attended with any of the dreadful evils which accompanied them in Ireland. In Dublin, if the carriers were offended with their masters, they applied to the carpenters, and marked out the objects of their censure; if the carpenters were offended with theirs, they applied to the shoemakers, or to some other trade, and then the individual, who was afterwards assaulted, could not bring any of the offenders to justice, for they were all unknown to him. These things, however, would never have been heard of but for the very defective state of the police of Dublin. To repress such a system, no law could be too severe; but his objection to the combination law was, that it punished the whole class for the offence of a few of its members (hear). He admitted that the seamen had acted with extreme impropriety; but they were not the only persons who had acted with imprudence and impropriety. In some cases the conduct of the masters was worse than that of the men. The first act of combination in Glasgow was the act of the masters. A few men of Mr. Dunlop's manufactory disagreeing with their masters, he believed, upon some point of wages, they declined to continue working for him. The masters immediately combined; for they called a meeting, at which the subject was discussed, and at which they came to a resolution to make a stand against the men. They published a notice, that "if the men of Mr. Dunlop's factory did not return to their work on or before a certain morning, they would discharge from their employ all the men, amounting in number to ten thousand, until Mr. Dunlop's men returned." The workmen who had gone away disclaimed acting in concert with any others, and said, 'Do not punish them for what we have done!' but their disclaimer was not attended to, and all the men in Glasgow of the same trade were actually turned out of their employment. Now he would ask, whether the mere declining on the part of the men to work for their masters was to be put in comparison with the enormity of that act of the masters? But that was not all. The property of the masters enabled them to get the better of the men, who were at last obliged to come in unconditionally. When they did so, the masters severely punished their resistance by deducting the loss they had sustained by this cessation of labour from the amount of the men's wages, the men being obliged to pay at the rate of ten per cent. per week, until the masters declared themselves satisfied. He asked whether the refusal of the seamen to sail might not have proceeded from some act performed by their masters—and whether it were comparable in mischief to the conduct of the Glasgow masters? Combinations were carried on by both parties; but the stronger of these were the masters. A person employing a great number of men in the tin trade in London, had occasion to find fault with one of his men for drinking, and he finally discharged him. He was told by the man, that if he did so all the others would leave him; but he persevered, and the consequence was, that all the men in the factory, amounting to 74, quitted him on the following morning. This gentleman put an advertisement into the papers, in which he stated that he wanted men, but that he would not engage any who belonged to the Union. His advertisement was answered, and he gradually filled his factory with men not connected with the Society. In this instance, therefore, the master was again triumphant. This case, too, proceeded on the principle which had been ascribed to the seamen; and that system was common with the masters. It was a regulation of the masters in many places, that any person who quitted one factory, should not be employed in another; and that object was effected by the masters sending round lists to each other, of the men who, from whatever causes, had quitted their employment; so that no man who happened to differ with his master, could succeed in obtaining employment elsewhere. If that were not a combination—an odious combination, among the masters, he did not know what could deserve the name (hear). For his own part he disapproved of such proceedings, whether adopted by masters or men. In his opinion, both sides had gone far beyond what he hoped they would have done, after the repeal of the combination laws. In making these observations, he wished to show that the fault in these cases, did not rest alone with the journeymen. This being admitted, there was no one who more heartily concurred with the rt. hon. gent. than he did, in the propriety of punishing any measures of intimidation, whether adopted by masters or men. If the enactment were fair and equitable it would be received with pleasure by both parties. But let not the house be too severe. The severe law against combination amongst colliers, was entirely inefficient. The Lord Advocate of Scotland expressed his readiness to try whether it would not be better to remove it. This proved that strong measures were not the best for putting down an evil of this description. Much depended on the conduct of masters towards their men; and especially on the way in which they treated their demands. If those demands were reasonable, they ought to be complied with; if unreasonable, the masters should make a firm stand, and punish every one who had recourse to violence, or intimidation.

tion with which the last act had been passed, ceased to observe that the 10th resolution of the committee set forth, "that it was necessary, in removing the combination laws, that measures should be taken to prevent the workmen from having recourse to threats, intimidation, or other improper means, for the purpose of interfering with the perfect freedom of trade or of compelling masters from the employment of their capital in any way they thought best." Now what was the security devised for carrying that resolution into effect? It was that a party convicted on the evidence of two witnesses, of having used threats or violence, should be punishable by two months imprisonment. This enactment enabled the guilty to escape; for what was said or done to intimidate, was generally in the presence only of the master. And why should two witnesses be required? He really could not tell; but that was a feature of this law which loudly called for alteration. The great evil of this system, so injurious to the freedom of trade, was the plan of delegation. At this moment a committee of delegates was sitting in the Thames. These persons were to find employment for those who were out of work—they were, in fact, to dictate to the master-shipwrights as to whom they should or should not employ. On one occasion four or five men went to the yard of a shipwright, and applied for work. The superintendent told them, that his master had hands enough already; and the parties were desired to quit the yard. They answered, that they were sent by the committee; and that employment must be found for them. What was the consequence? Why, because the shipwright refused to employ these men, all the other men, to the number of some hundreds, quitted the yard (hear, hear). The same system was carried on in many other parts of the country. He had received communications from various places, and he found that in many instances where artificers were receiving from five to six shillings a-day, they were not satisfied to proceed with their work, but set about stipulating with their masters, as to the number of apprentices they should entertain—as to the employment of old and young men—and a variety of other matters with which they had nothing to do. Such a system tended to bring back that worst of all doctrines, a maximum of wages—and was, in fact, most injurious to the workmen themselves (hear, hear). The able, active, and intelligent workmen had, unquestionably, a right to receive more than the old and incompetent; but such a system would place old and young, skilful and incompetent, on the same level. The hon. gent. (Mr. Hume) wished to show that all the blame in cases of combination did not rest with the men. Now he did not wish to argue that point. He did not want to establish the masters against the men, or the men against the masters. It was no satisfaction to him to say that the fault lay in this quarter or in that. If the masters behaved ill, let there be a law which should apply to them; and if the men conducted themselves improperly, let them be amenable also (hear). If the dangerous effects of conspiracy, the consequences which the continuance of such an evil must have on the interests of those who were most forward in support of the system were pointed out, such an exposition would have a strong effect on those deluded men, and would, it was to be hoped, put a stop to a course of proceeding which struck at the root of all freedom of trade (hear). It appeared from the evidence of a gentleman who had been examined before the committee, that in the course of the last three years, no less than ten lives were lost in Dublin, in consequence of transactions connected with the combinations of trades; and not a single person concerned in those murders had been brought to justice* (hear). But how was this secrecy preserved? They had been told by the member for Aberdeen. If the carpenters turned out, they employed the joiners to execute their vengeance; and if the joiners turned out, they called on the carpenters for assistance. By this course of proceeding, the perpetrators of murders and assaults were not recognized. It was horrible to think, that, by this union of trades, as it was called, persons who had committed no offence whatever were visited with the penalty of death (hear). One regulation, it appeared, was, that no master should have more than twelve apprentices; and another regulated the number of machines which a manufacturer should be allowed to use. He would relate the case of Mr. Robinson, an eminent iron-master, in the sister country. He had procured an engine, similar to that used in Birmingham, for manufacturing nails. The consequence was, that a meeting of 3,000 persons of different trades, took place, and they declared, that if Mr. Robinson persisted in manufacturing those nails, they would drive them crooked (a laugh). The work was given up; and Mr. Robinson was thrown back on Birmingham for a supply of nails. But for the misconduct of those people, the nails would have been manufactured in Ireland, and employment would have been afforded for themselves and families. He was not anxious to have the old laws revived; but he wished to see a remedy provided against the abominable system of delegation. Some persons wished, on occasions of insubordination amongst workmen, to have immediate recourse to the military power. This, he conceived, would be very improper, except in cases of actual violence. The only system that could be acted on under the existing law, was to turn away refractory workmen, and leave them to come to their senses. But this was not without danger. The case of a tin-man had been instanced, whose men, to the number of seventy, had left him, and who had refused to take any of them back. Now, he must say, it was twenty thousand chances to one that the life of that individual would not be safe in the streets after night-fall. The apprehensions of masters who were really afraid to act, strongly claimed the attention of the legislature; and he hoped that, having looked into the whole subject, an unanimous feeling would pervade the house to adopt some efficient measure to check the evil, which was at present only in progress, but which, if suffered to arrive at maturity, would produce more disastrous effects than any he had witnessed since he entered into public life.

Mr. H. Gurney defended the conduct of the last committee; and contended that the combination laws, so far from removing the evils attendant on combination, in reality, greatly aggravated them.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that some of the workmen believed that Mr. Hume had repealed all the combination laws; and, therefore, that they might just do as they pleased. The house was told, that the masters might easily put down combination; because, if they resisted, and stood firm, the public would stand with them. That was very true; but it should be recollected, that, in the mean time, their business went to ruin. He eulogized the miners and colliers of the north of England, and sat down by stating that he should vote for the committee.

Mr. C. Grant regretted that so much had been said of the last committee, for it would appear as if it were intended to cast some reflection on their decision (no, no, from Mr. Huskisson). He was one of the fifty members of whom that committee was composed, but he believed not more than half that number attended it. For his own part, after giving due consideration and inquiry as to the operation of the old laws, he conscientiously felt that their abolition would be advantageous. No one would palliate the excesses which had been committed since those laws were repealed; but he would contend, that the system which prevailed before did not produce tranquillity. It was, in fact, a system of terror; and it was proved before the committee that evils existed under those laws which it was necessary to put down. Their object had been to restore the proper feelings between master and servant. He was sorry to find that those kindly feelings did not exist between the parties which ought to characterize them. But he must say, that it was not the repeal of those laws which prevented their existence (hear). He was prepared to expect some re-action of feeling when the combination laws were removed—he thought that some effervescence might arise: but he certainly did not expect that those to whom considerable advantages were given, and for the protection of whom the new law was framed, would have acted as they had done. It was said, that the new act had revoked the common law on the subject of combination. He could not speak very scientifically on this question; but the result of his consideration was, that the act did not, generally speaking, put an end to the common law, though it did in one or two instances. This act surely did not exempt sailors who refused to proceed with their vessel from the operation of the common law. He believed that a seaman who refused to proceed with his ship, after having agreed to make the voyage, was utterly out of the provision of this act, and would be just as amenable to the law as at any other period (hear, hear). It was of great importance that inquiry should be made as to the effects produced by the act of the member for Aberdeen. Because, while they attempted to do justice to a particular class, they should not seem to lend themselves to the abuses which those individuals might commit. In all great measures of legislation it was impossible to arrive at once at perfection; and some evils must always be expected to ensue on the abolition of a long-existing system of injustice. He should, therefore, support the motion.

Mr. Lambton said that it was clear that the measure of his hon. friend had not answered the purpose which he had in view; and therefore he considered that the rt. hon. gent. was doing great service to the country by directing the attention of parliament to the subject.

Mr. Huskisson wished to say a few words in explanation before the question was put. He had stated no objection to the decision of the last committee; on the contrary, he highly approved of some of the resolutions, and especially the tenth. What he affirmed was, that the act growing out of those resolutions imperfectly executed the intentions of the committee, and in some cases had even produced a prejudicial effect. There was another point on which he was anxious not to be misunderstood, and desired that what he said upon it should go forth to the country. The hon. member for Aberdeen had called upon him not to visit the faults of a few workmen of a certain description upon the whole community, and had told them that there were certain classes that had not been guilty of excess. To that he entirely subscribed, and begged to disclaim all intention of proceeding with severity. His object was not to act by penal laws, but to attract the notice of the committee now to be appointed, to the interests of commerce, as connected with the relation between master and workman. So far from wishing to suggest severity, even towards those who had acted culpably, and been betrayed into impropriety of conduct, he was desirous of saving them from the consequences of their own delusion, and to shew them at once both their duty and their interest. He was quite as much a friend to the men as to the masters; and declared his satisfaction that gentlemen of all political opinions came to the consideration of this interesting question, without the slightest tinge of party feelings (hear, hear).

The motion was then agreed to, and the committee appointed.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15.—Mr. Hume presented a petition from the mariners of North and South Shields, complaining of combinations among the ship-owners, and denying the insubordination which had been attributed to them in the house. They alleged that the union among seamen was only for charitable purposes, and to counteract the oppressive measures of their employers.

Mr. Lambton said, that the union was not designed for charitable purposes only. One of the regulations of the union forbade any mariner to serve in a ship with any other mariner who was not a member of the union. A late instance would illustrate its effect. A ship arrived at Shields from the west of England, and the union required the owners to dismiss all the men on board, because they were not of the union. These poor fellows were left to beg their way back again on foot into the west of England, to make way for the mariners of the union. Another vessel arrived from Whitby, and it was with some difficulty that the lives of the men could be secured for a night or two from the violence with which they were threatened. This was a state in which parliament would not readily consent to place the property of any man.

Mr. Hume said that the magistrates had power to suppress any violence, that being clearly contrary to law.

The petition was referred to the committee, with another from the shipwrights on the river Thames.

TUESDAY, MAY 3.—Mr. Cartwright rose to present a petition from the master boot and shoemakers of Northampton, complaining of the insubordination of the workmen. They stated that, some weeks ago, the workmen struck for an advance, and remained out of employment for five weeks. The masters then complied, and all went on satisfactorily for a short time. Since that arrangement, however, the journeymen had struck for a further advance. The petitioners further stated, that if this system continued, they must, in the end, give up their contracts for the army and navy. They attributed their present situation to the repeal of the combination laws. The occasion, he observed, was extremely pressing—dispatch was necessary—and he thought something ought to be done in the present session.

Mr. Huskinson said, that the committee was pursuing their labours with proper vigilance, and would, he trusted, report to the house without any great delay (hear). He admitted that it was a subject which pressed for decision. It was not his wish to interfere with the meetings of individuals, so far as related to the amount of their own wages. Under circumstances of a greater demand for labour, or a greater expense incurred in the purchase of provisions, they might reasonably ask for larger wages; but they did not stop here. They combined to dictate to their masters the mode in which they should conduct their business, to regulate the hours of labour, and the number of apprentices—they combined for the purpose of preventing certain individuals from working—to enforce the principle that wages should be paid alike to every man, whether he were a good workman or a bad one—to prevent individuals who wished to work from getting employment unless under their own regulations (hear). He believed that at the present moment a great part of the woollen manufacturers were standing still, from combinations of this sort. He did not wish to resort to the old law; but it was undoubtedly necessary to adopt some efficient means for the equal protection of the master and the workman (hear).

Lord Althorp said, that in the law of last session it had been forgotten to define clearly what should be the nature of those threats, held out either to masters or to journeymen, that would enable the parties who conceived themselves aggrieved to prosecute. Some alteration should be made to secure from the effects of threats those workmen who were willing to labour, but who were prevented by an influence of which the present law did not take cognizance.

Mr. E. Ellice was happy to find that it was not intended to re-enact the combination laws; and he hoped that whatever measure might be proposed, the interests of the workmen would be well weighed and protected, and that they would not, as before, be exposed to the oppression of the masters (hear).

General Gaseoyne said, he was not quite satisfied with the statement of the rt. hon. gent. He said that no intention of renewing the combination laws existed; but a rumour had gone forth, that it was the intention of the committee to interfere with the "benefit societies." In many of the petitions which had been presented against the re-enactment of the old laws, the petitioners denied that they had taken any part in the illegal combinations that had been spoken of, and they very fairly called upon the house not to visit the errors of the few upon the many. Now was it not fair and justifiable, if men thought that they were entitled to larger wages than they received, to unite for the purpose of accomplishing their object, provided they committed no act of outrage or violence (hear, hear)? Thirty years since, so unjust did he think the system, that he brought in a bill to prevent combinations amongst the masters. In the town of Liverpool there was a body of shipwrights, blockmakers, ropemakers, &c. amounting to 12,000 persons; and he believed it was truly stated in their petition, that they knew not a single instance among them which called for the interference of that house in the re-enactment of those laws. He hoped that they were not to be re-enacted; but he would call on the rt. hon. gent. further to state, whether it was intended to introduce a measure that would operate in any way on the funds of the benefit societies? Those funds were appropriated to the support of those who subscribed to them in time of sickness; and in many instances they were appropriated to the purchase of tools for workmen, whose tools were not furnished by their employers, and whose finances did not enable them to supply themselves. The Shipwrights' Society, at Liverpool, had existed for thirty-three years. They were building almshouses; and scarcely a member of that society had applied for parochial relief. When so much good might be effected by such institutions, in the reduction of the poor rates, he trusted that due care would be taken not to interfere with them unnecessarily.

Mr. Maberly said, that the working classes had a right to ask for wages in proportion as the price of provisions was enhanced, or as there was a greater demand for labour; but they had no right to combine for the purpose of dictating to an employer how he should select his workmen, or what number of apprentices he might employ.

Mr. G. Philips said, that combination was injurious on both sides; but the continuance of combination was, in his opinion, much more likely on the part of the workmen than on that of the masters. There was no motive for separation on the part of the former, but the various interests of the latter presented many motives for separation.

Mr. Hume said, he believed what the house wanted was impartial information on this subject. They had as yet received tales from one party, and from one party only; and he would take upon himself to say, that so far as the committee had gone, every inquiry tended to do away with the impression which had been previously made on that house. No excesses had been committed, except in Dublin, and there, instead of twenty, as had been stated, only two lives were lost. It appeared that since the last act, combinations amongst workmen had changed their character, and that instead of outrage and violence, they were carried on with peace and order. He wished to see the workmen act properly, and therefore he condemned, in the strongest terms, their interference with apprentices, as being contrary to the principle of freedom which they themselves demanded, and had gained. Much had been said about the combination of the men; but was a combination amongst them ever heard of, without there being also a combination amongst the masters? Would not any landholder in that house, who was selling his wheat for 45s. a quarter, endeavour, if he could, to procure 50s. for it? Nay, would he not keep his wheat back, if he thought he was thereby likely to get 90s. a quarter for it? Why, then, should not the man who only received 2s. 6d. a-day keep back, if he thought by so doing that he could procure in 6d. a-day? If a contrary doctrine were maintained, they might pass laws to raise the price of corn, and to lower the rate of wages (hear). On behalf of the workmen, he called on the house to come to no hasty decision on alleged acts of outrage and violence. If acts of violence had been committed, let them be proved. Let not those individuals, on mere assertion, be deprived of that right which they now enjoyed, and which they ought to enjoy under the law.

Sir M. W. Ridley wished the labouring classes to get as much as they could, by proper means. It was fair that labour should have its just reward; but it was another thing, if the workmen proceeded by threats and intimidation. When they adopted that system, it was high time for the house to interfere (hear, hear). He would add, however, that those who demanded a quick decision on this subject should recollect that it was necessary, after they had heard those who were complaining, that they should hear the workmen in their own behalf (hear, hear).

Lord A. Hamilton was surprised when gentlemen declared that they had heard of no violence. One man was now at the point of death, in consequence of the beating he received from the colliers of Stirling, for no other reason but because he ventured, in his own right, to take lower wages than the members of the combination thought fit to accept. He could also state that a weaver of Glasgow had been sentenced to a public whipping, and to transportation for life, for an attempt at assassination. The learned judge before whom he was tried stated, that if Lord Ellenborough's act had extended to Scotland, he should have been sentenced to death. He was a friend to the workmen, and he now spoke in behalf of that large body of individuals, who had taken, or who were ready to take, less wages than the associations thought they should. He called on the house and the country to protect them in the right which was denied them by the combined workmen—of appreciating what their labour was worth (hear).

Mr. Baring said, that the consequence of the repeal of the combination laws was, that every description of trade had been dictated to in the most arbitrary manner; and, if proper measures were not adopted—if this system of combination were still suffered to extend—the consequence must be, that it would itself effectually destroy the manufacturing interest of the country.

The petition was then laid upon the table.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.—Sir M. W. Ridley presented a petition, numerously signed by shipwrights and mariners of Kingston-upon-Hull, against the combination laws, and praying that the petitioners might be heard before the committee.

Mr. Sykes heartily concurred in the prayer of these petitioners. It would, indeed, be great injustice, if the committee now taking a great deal of evidence from the masters, should take none from their journeymen (hear). At present, these shipwrights and seamen were in a state of the most cruel alarm. They complained of the high price of corn and provisions; at the same time that they expressed their alarm at a supposed intention of Parliament to fix the rate of their wages, so that it would be impossible for them to supply themselves with corn.

Gen. Gascoyne had seven petitions to present to the same effect. The petitioners amongst other things complained of the necessity which the high price of corn imposed upon them of demanding proportionate wages for their labour; and expressed an apprehension that Parliament intended to examine into their funds.

Mr. Denman presented a similar petition from the mechanics of the town of Walsall. He begged to call attention to that part of the petition in which the petitioners stated that they believed many of the allegations made before the committee now sitting were not true; and requested, even supposing that they were true, that the errors of the few should not be visited on the many. He conceived that a more just request could not be referred to parliament. On a former occasion he had stated, that the common law was sufficient to punish any substantive offence committed by the workmen against their employers. In the act of last session there was only one clause as to which he entertained any doubt: and that was the clause relative to summary convictions. He had formerly asked his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) a question on this point, and he stated, that it was the unanimous wish, both of the masters and the workmen, that this power should be granted. Now, he thought the house should have paused, notwithstanding the wish of these parties. When it was necessary to call for the interposition of the law at all, it should be through the medium of a judge and jury, according to the course pursued in the ordinary administration of justice. Another provision of this law was, that when a summary decision took place, the individual convicted should not be liable to punishment for the same offence under the enactments of any other law, or by the common law. But a workman committing an offence might bring it before a magistrate by means of a friendly informer. If he refused to give judgment on the case, great evil and confusion must follow; and if he convicted the accused party, that party would receive a slight punishment, for perhaps a very great offence. It was a mistake to suppose, as the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Peel) had done, that the act provided that offences could only be proved by two or more witnesses; that only related to summary convictions: for if the offence were prosecuted at common law, it must be supported by witnesses in the ordinary way. He meant to give no opinion with regard to the committee up stairs, but he entered his protest against the eagerness with which some gentlemen seemed to seize on any statements that were prejudicial to the character of the workmen. Those individuals had a right, and the petitioners, in this instance, prayed that they might be heard, before any measure affecting their interests was determined on.

Mr. Hume said that the proposition for summary process did not originate with him. But he must say, that with the exception of one individual, the whole committee was desirous that provision should be made in the bill for granting this summary power; and that with the express sanction and desire of the workmen.

Mr. Peel observed, that he certainly never inferred from what the learned gent. (Mr. Denman) had stated, that it was his opinion that the common law was sufficient for punishing any offence which the workmen might commit in endeavouring to control their masters. On that point, in his opinion, a very serious doubt might be entertained, and this was one reason for coming to a clear understanding on the question. The second clause of the act of last session enacted, that journeymen, or other persons, combining for purposes therein named, "shall not be subject or liable to any indictment for conspiracy, or any other punishment whatever, under the common or statute law." What, then, became of the position that the common law was sufficient to meet and to punish those combinations? The common law, as well as the statute law, was here repealed, without any modification.

Mr. Scarlett said, when his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) consulted him on this subject, he stated it to be his opinion, and to that opinion he still adhered, that the common law provided sufficiently for putting down combination, properly so called. But when he afterwards looked at the act which had been passed last session, he found that the common law was repealed; for he saw nothing there to which it could be applied, except in cases where a breach of the peace had been committed. There alone could the common law be brought into action. They ought either to restore the common law to its original vigour, or make some specific provision to meet this evil.

Mr. Baring repeated his opinion that combinations had been increased by the late act. He went on to say that many of the workmen who had been examined before the committee, were most respectable persons. More prudence, sense, and good conduct, he never saw displayed in his life than was manifested by them; and the manner in which they gave their evidence proved how far information had made its way amongst that class of the community. But they seemed to think it a praiseworthy thing to join in those combined bodies, and to direct their masters how to carry on their trade. The common law, it appeared, could only be resorted to where actual violence was committed; but the house must be aware, that many things might be done, short of violence, that were extremely injurious. Several of the witnesses were examined as to the means they employed for preventing men from working where any circumstance obnoxious to their displeasure existed. They were asked, "When you struck, did you use any violence against those who continued to work?" They answered, "No." But when pressed, the answer was, "We made their situations uncomfortable." This was elicited from them, and certainly such a course of proceeding was a great grievance to the persons thus treated.

Mr. J. Williams did not believe the statement that there was an increase of combination since the repeal of the laws. When hon. gentl. spoke of an increase of combination, they must have alluded to combination connected with acts of violence; because the ordinary system of combination—the carrying on of correspondence between different bodies of workmen—had long been prevalent throughout the country. If that were the state of the case, then, the law as altered left the power of punishing, under such circumstances, precisely as it was before the act of last session was passed. The evil must be cured by some good understanding between the men and the masters—by the adoption of good conduct and temper by both the parties (hear, hear). He had some experience in matters of summary jurisdiction in the country where combinations most prevailed, and his solemn belief was, that the habit of running to the magistrate on the heat of the occasion, where the act complained of was not of importance sufficient to allow the party to go into a court of justice, had not only done no good, but had produced much mischief, by increasing the irritation between the parties.

Mr. Scarlett, in explanation, agreed that none of the statutes, giving summary remedies, had answered the purpose for which they were intended.—The petition was then referred to the committee.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.—Mr. Baring presented a petition from about two dozen of the workmen employed in the service of Messrs. Young and Curling, of Limehouse. The petitioners were ship caulkers, and set forth that they had been long in the employ of Messrs. Young and Curling; that they were satisfied with their wages and treatment; that they did not belong to the Thames Union, or any other such association; that on that account they were exposed to great ill-will and insult from other journeymen who were members of such societies; that they began to apprehend personal ill-usage when they walked in the streets, by reason of the premises; and they therefore prayed that some measure might be devised on this subject, which should protect them from such molestation in future.

MONDAY, MAY 9.—Mr. Alderman Thompson presented a petition from certain shipwrights and sawyers of London, praying for protection against their fellow-workmen. The petitioners stated, that in consequence of their not belonging to the Union, they were exposed to insults and annoyance from the members of that society.—Referred to the committee.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.—Mr. Wallace brought up the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the effect of the act passed last session for the repeal of the combination laws. The committee had not recommended a renewal of the old laws, but proposed other means of checking the combinations which prevailed throughout the country, and they also called for the repeal of the act of last session. He thought it fair to state, on the part of the committee, that the different cases brought before them were minutely investigated. Nothing like partiality was shown; and in point of truth, the number of workmen examined was greater than the number of persons who complained of them.

Mr. Hume said, that no evidence had been given by any workmen of Dublin and Glasgow, the two principal towns interested in these proceedings. With respect to the latter city, the committee had acted on the statements of some one or two manufacturers, and a few police-officers. The individuals respecting whom that evidence was given, had petitioned the house, and that petition had been referred to the committee—but the committee had not gone into the examination. Petitions had been presented from Nottingham, signed by 9,000 operatives; from Sheffield, by 10,000; and from Birmingham, by 15,000. The petitioners stated, that since the alteration of the law, the most beneficial results had been experienced, and they all prayed that sufficient time should be given to enable the country to form a proper estimate of its real operation. A deputation from Sheffield had come up to town, but they were told to go back, and that if their evidence were wanted, they would be sent for. None had been heard except the carpenters from Shields, and some seamen, who had presented themselves to the committee, and could not with propriety be refused. In his opinion, the proceeding of the committee was highly objectionable in not allowing the workmen's evidence as to the consequence of the repeal of the old laws. But it appeared that little evidence was sought on that head. The committee examined into the mere present state of the working classes; what combinations existed, and to what extent they were carried. This was not, however, the idea on which the house had originally proceeded. The duty of the committee was, to inquire whether combinations were more general now than before the repeal of the laws—to examine into their nature—and to hear the statements of the operatives, as well as of the masters. With respect to the Glasgow operatives, it was surprising that no evidence was received from that body, after it had been asserted that they had suborned men to commit assassination; whereas the operatives would be able to prove that the act complained of had been done, not by the general body, but by a few men who were in a state of starvation, from a combination of the masters, relative to Mr. Dunlop's business, which he had before related to the house—a combination by which 10,000 men were kept out of work for nearly five months, until the community at large called out "shame." Here was a large body of persons charged with murder, and subornation of murder, not only without being heard in their defence, but having actually been refused a hearing. He therefore protested against this imperfect report.

Mr. Peel deprecated discussion till the report and bill were printed. He must, however, in justice to the committee, deny the statement of the hon. gent. as to the examination of witnesses. There was no refusal to examine any man whose evidence was necessary to the purpose which the committee assembled to effect—namely, the introduction of some measure to check the confusion which at present prevailed. If they had examined every man who presented himself, and put off any remedial measure until the inquiry was closed, the object they had in view would have been frustrated.

Mr. Wallace then moved for leave to bring in a bill "to repeal an act of the last session for the regulation of workmen, and to introduce other provisions in lieu thereof."—Leave given.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Mr. Wallace moved the order of the day for the house to resolve itself into a committee on this bill. He would briefly state the ground on which the present measure was founded. The statement made on a former night (by Mr. Huskisson) though not substantiated in all its particulars, yet was so far borne out, as to the general nature and effect of the combinations that existed throughout the country, from what had come to light, that some farther intervention of parliament was absolutely necessary. To form a practical opinion on the subject, it was necessary to examine the actual state of the combinations; to see if any alteration had taken place in the conduct of the parties, in consequence of the repeal of those laws, which it was confidently asserted had given rise to the combinations that formerly existed—and also to inquire whether the character of those combinations was in any degree softtened or mitigated. All those points had been considered, and it appeared that the character of those combinations were altered—that they were greater in extent, but more open in their proceedings than they used to be. No less than thirteen cases of combination were stated to the committee, and of these seven had grown up since its sitting. With respect to the character of those combinations, they had found it in some parts aggravated, in others much the same as heretofore. They were all under the superintendence of committees, composed of leading members in the trade. The manner in which they issued their orders, and the promptitude with which those orders were obeyed, sufficiently showed their influence. He knew that in the estimation of many gentlemen, these particulars were considered as unimportant. He was of a different opinion. It was said by Lord Bacon that in matters of council, there was this difference between a square and a long table; that whereas at a square one an equality of opinions might be expected; at the long one those at the upper end were likely to have it all their own way. This was the case in those combination meetings, where measures were generally carried by the worst and most violent characters. Not content with settling how and when the men should work, and for what wages, they had actually pointed out in some instances obnoxious masters for assassination. He had not overstated the case: he had confined himself to the evidence. In Ireland it was stated, that 70 or 80 persons had been wounded. Of these 30 or 40 had their skulls fractured; and two had been actually murdered, in the open day, without the possibility of bringing the murderers to justice. In Scotland, a still more organized system prevailed, and he begged leave to call attention to the oath which was said to be taken by persons engaged in combinations. It had been produced before the committee by a respectable manufacturer, and ran thus:

"I, A. B., do voluntarily swear, in the awful presence of Almighty God, and before these witnesses, that I will execute with zeal and alacrity, as far as in me lies, every task or injunction which the majority of my brethren shall impose upon me in furtherance of our common welfare; as the chastisement of knoaks, the assassination of oppressive and tyrannical masters, or the demolition of shops that shall be deemed incorrigible, and also that I will cheerfully contribute to the support of such of my brethren as shall lose their work in consequence of their exertions against tyranny, or renounce it in resistance to a reduction of wages; and I do further swear, that I will never divulge the above obligation, unless I shall have been duly authorised and appointed to administer the same to persons making application for admission, or to persons constrained to become members of our fraternity."

Could any thing be more dreadful than a combination in which vast numbers of persons were bound together by a tie like this? He would refer the house to the confession of John Kean, which stated that the combination committee had resolved to take the lives of four of the workmen, Wright, Dunlop, Lindsay, and Ewens, as soon as possible. This confession had been made by a man, himself convicted of shooting a workman of the name of Graham, who had not complied with the wishes of the committee. He believed that the same motives were common to all the committees, and that they all pursued the same course. The most innocent persons might be led, step by step, to become participators in acts of the most atrocious description, and from which, if left to their unbiased feelings, they would have recoiled with abhorrence.

It was very well known that to ensure success to the designs of a committee, numbers were in the first place necessary. To gain these, every inducement was put in practice. First of all, persuasion and the milder plans were tried; then money was offered to such as wanted it—then warnings, threats, and intimidation; and if these were found to be insufficient, then murder, or an attempt to murder, was resorted to, as had been seen in some recent instances. All these means had been lately practised. The shipwrights in the neighbourhood of London had quietly left their work, and withdrawn from the employment of certain masters. The shipwrights of Bristol had gone a little farther, and had resorted to threats. The coopers of London had made all the workmen who would not obey the rules they laid down, uncomfortable. It was difficult to say exactly what they meant by "uncomfortable;" but its effects were easily understood. The consequence was, that all the workmen who had been made uncomfortable became members of the association. The weavers of Yorkshire had proceeded as far as threats, and the workmen in Scotland had gone even greater lengths. An instance occurred a few days ago, of a man who had struck, with others, and who had received a small sum from the society; afterwards, conceiving that he had permission to return to work, he had done so, and was called to account by the society, and had his ears cut off. In Scotland there had been more than one attempt to murder, and in Ireland men had actually been murdered. For these reasons it was that he wished to see the law relating to combinations made stronger, that the people might be guarded against the possibility of running into excesses, which in the end must be dangerous to themselves. He was no friend to the principle of the laws which had been repealed; he did not wish to see them re-enacted, but he wished that the common law as it stood before should be again brought into force. This, he believed, would be quite sufficient for the purpose, and he conceived that in saying this he spoke the general opinion of the house. The principle of the bill now before the house was to make all associations illegal, excepting those for the purpose of settling wages. The bill of last year not only protected combinations for the purpose of raising wages, but extended to those for regulating the work, and the mode of carrying on manufactures. He did not believe these permissions necessary, and in many cases they were dangerous. With regard to the wording of the new bill, he thought it was safer to point out the description of association which was legal than to specify all which were illegal, in doing which there was great danger either of putting in or leaving out too much. The bill gave a summary jurisdiction to magistrates; it did away with the necessity of a previous information, and permitted a conviction upon the evidence of one witness only. These were its principal features. He was aware it would disappoint many persons; for there were some who, listening only to their fears, thought that the utmost vengeance of parliament should be called down upon these combinations. If any future necessity should arise, it would not be difficult to make the laws more strict.—If it should happen that the consumers were inconvenienced in consequence of these combinations, Government must take care to provide supplies at a reasonable rate, by admitting the productions of other countries. He felt all the disadvantages which such a measure must bring with it, but he felt also, that great as they were it was better to endure them than to submit to the tyranny of the workmen.

Mr. Robertson declared that the repeal of the combination laws would, in his view, be attended with the most mischievous consequences to the workmen themselves. Being enabled to extort from the masters any rate of wages they pleased, they would pass one half of their week in idleness, and contract the most dangerous habits of excess and intoxication.

Mr. Hume said, that the rt. hon. gent. had not given the workmen fair play. The rt. hon. gent. throughout his speech had betrayed a bias towards the case which the masters had endeavoured to make out. He repeated his conviction that the workmen's evidence had been rejected by the committee, and objected to many clauses of the bill, which he should endeavour to modify in the committee of the house.

Mr. Calcraft objected, generally, that sufficient investigation had not been given to the subject. It was farther a fault, in his opinion, that in the preamble of the bill there was no declaration against combinations of masters as well as of workmen.

On the reading of the clause which made it penal to induce any man to leave his work by threat or intimidation, or insult,

Mr. Hume: The word "insult" might be construed a thousand ways, and that which might be considered as an insult to one man, would not be so understood as applying to another. He thought the clause should be put in a more defined shape.

Mr. Hobhouse opposed the clause for the same reason. When magistrates are invested with summary powers of punishment, all vagueness is especially pernicious. Of this they had abundant evidence in many recent acts of the magistracy. If the word were inserted, he should make use of the forms of the house to impede the bill.

After a vague conversation between several members,

The Attorney-General said, if the word "insult" were thought too undefined, he would not press it; but he had precedent for the adoption of words in a penal clause, which admitted of full as great a latitude of construction. In an act then before him were the words "molesting or obstructing by threats, intimidations, or any other means."

Mr. Scarlett suggested that those words should be adopted in the bill.

The house again diverging into the general subject,

Mr. Peel hoped that the committee would proceed with the details of the bill, as sufficient time had now been consumed in attacking and defending the committee of the last and of the present year.

Mr. W. Whitmore contended, that as the magistrates in the manufacturing districts were generally masters, and as the persons who combined were generally workmen, this bill would give to the masters a power of oppressing the men with which they ought not to be intrusted. If there were a clause in the bill, providing that the magistrates in those districts should be paid by the state, and consequently should be directly responsible to government for their conduct, a great part of his objection to it would be removed. He thought that a power of appeal ought to be given to the men. If it were not, it would be found necessary in a very short time to propose, for the sake of justice, that in the manufacturing districts there should be none but stipendiary magistrates.

The committee then divided on the clause, as amended by the Attorney-Gen.—For the clause, 60—Against it, 18—Majority, 72.

Mr. Hume moved an amendment that no master manufacturer, or son of a master, shall sit as magistrate to enforce the provisions of this act.

The committee divided.—For the Amendment, 15—Against it, 60—Majority, 45.

The other clauses were passed without discussion, and the house then resumed.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29.—Mr. Hobhouse presented a petition from certain persons delegated by the operative classes to watch over the progress of the measures now pending in parliament relative to combination, and who had not been heard before the committee. So moderate were the views of the petitioners, that they determined to offer no opposition to the bill, if modified by two alterations. They objected to the word "solely" in the clause which stated the only legal object of combination—the regulation of wages—and the mode of serving and proving the service of summons, which placed them in a worse situation than that of felons. He looked on the provisions of the bill which prevented delegation, with great dislike. The practice of small bodies delegated to act for large numbers, and thereby rendering great meetings useless, he regarded as a safety valve to society.

Mr. Wallace said that it was impossible to hear the multitude of persons who offered original opinions on the nature and probable effects of the bill. The committee, therefore, proceeded upon a few cases of fact, which were more likely to satisfy the house. He would not discuss the merits of the bill until it came in a more regular way before the house.

Mr. Peel observed that, as to the hearing of evidence upon every particular case, it would have taken seven years. And to what purpose? The facts were the same; the principle had been admitted; the parties who offered new information did not deny combination; they only wished to justify their own combination.

Mr. Hume repeated that while, upon representations of alarm and danger totally unfounded, since not one case of real violence had occurred, this bill so formidable to the liberties of the operatives was to pass, all inquiry was denied to the millions who were chiefly interested. He would make such opposition to the bill as the forms of the house would permit.

Mr. Peel said, that the hon. genl.'s misrepresentation compelled him to repeat the substance of his former observations. If his intention to oppose was so strong, he begged to ask him why he had agreed to the second reading of this bill? This bill was in fact founded on the hon. member's resolutions. No longer ago than Friday last, the hon. genl. had expressed his acquiescence in the bill.

Mr. Crispie thought no weight ought to be attached to the number of petitions; he would undertake to get up ten thousand such in Gloucestershire in eight and forty hours. He denied that the mechanics were fit judges of the wages they ought to receive, or the effect of their refusing to work (hear, from Mr. Hume).

Mr. Whitmore expressed his intention, on the third reading, to propose a clause giving a power of appeal from the decision of the magistrates.

Mr. W. Smith thought that such a clause was highly necessary, and he would support it when it should be proposed. At the same time he thought it better that the bill with all its faults should pass, than that the country should be left without protection against the disgusting outrages which had lately taken place.

Sir F. Burdett said that no acts of outrage he had heard, seemed to call for any new enactment. The common law was quite enough to redress any evils that might arise, and the workmen would then be tried fairly by their peers, instead of being handed over to magistrates, who, ten to one, would have an interest against them. The old laws had the effect of keeping up a system of oppression against the poorer classes—that oppression which it was said would drive a wise man mad, and which would therefore, be likely to produce exorcises among the people exposed to it. Sufficient time had not yet been given to the experiment which had been tried, and he thought it hard, since the cases of the workmen had not been fully examined, that so precipitate a conclusion should be come to against them. He knew that the workmen had been grateful for the relief they had enjoyed, and he wished that it should therefore be tried at least one year longer. He thought that, considering the importance of the subject, and as the interests of a valuable and numerous class of the community were involved in it, a much more extensive investigation should have been gone into before the committee.—Evidence had not been taken upon any material points, and yet the bill went upon a presumption that all which had been alleged against the workmen was proved. A great deal was said about the violence they had practised, and attempts to assassinate, and other outrages, which, if they were really committed, could not be sufficiently blamed, but he denied that there was a tittle of evidence before the committee to prove them. He hoped, at this late period of the session, that the right hon. genl. would permit the bill to be printed, and then to stand over until the next assembly of Parliament.

Mr. Husbisson said, that he was convinced, from what the hon. bart. had said, that he had neither read the evidence nor the bill, which he recommended to be printed, and which had, in fact, been printed a week ago. If the hon. bart. had read the evidence, he would have known that the evidence of the assassinations to which he alluded, did not rest upon any statements before the committee, but upon the trial and conviction of the perpetrators before the highest legal tribunals. With the knowledge which the hon. member for Aberdeen had on these subjects, he was astonished at hearing him make use of the inflammatory language he had indulged in. His own course, when masters or workmen had applied to him, had always been to tell them to make their statements to the committee; who, if they thought fit, would then call witnesses. He would tell the hon. member that it would have been well for the men whose advocate he represented himself to be—it would have been well for the peace of the country—it would have been well for him.

self, if he had followed the same course. The hon. member would not then have done what he had this evening permitted himself to do—he would not have made statements which the subject did not justify; he would not have used inflammatory language, which could have no other effect than that of exciting discontent in the minds of the men, and for which he could not even give the hon. gent. the credit of originality, for he found the very same language, the very same sentences, the very same phrases, in letters which he had received from the committees of these combinations (loud cheering). The hon. bart. said he wished to have the operations of the common law restored. Did the hon. bart. know that all the complaints made before the committee, had been founded upon the injustice of that common law? and that the hon. member for Aberdeen had himself proposed a summary punishment, instead of that inflicted by the common law? that he had passed by the trial by jury to vest in the hands of a magistrate the power of punishing such outrages as might occur? As his only object was to provide a remedy for the disorders which had occurred, he would be content to accept the hon. bart.'s proposition, to repeal all the laws upon this subject, and to leave the common law in its former force; but he could tell him, that one consequence of that would be, that the hon. member for Aberdeen would make, if possible, a more inflammatory speech than he had done this evening (cheers).

Mr. Ellice had transmitted to his constituents copies of the bill, and they informed him that no inconvenience had been felt in their neighbourhood from the law as it stood. Still he had reason to believe that the bill before the house ought to pass, as a precaution against evils which would in all probability arise if the law were left in its present state.

Mr. Peel would inform the hon. bart., that it was the hon. member for Aberdeen who, upon all occasions in the committee, was most strenuous in objecting to the common law, and that it was upon his resolutions that the present bill was formed and founded. He would not refer to the speeches which the hon. gent. had been heard to make in that house, but to the resolutions proposed by himself. The 8th, the hon. member's favourite resolution was, "That the statute laws then in existence ought to be repealed, and that the common law, which made a peaceable meeting of masters or workmen an illegal conspiracy, ought to be altered." This was exactly what had been done; the course here pointed out had been exactly followed. But the 11th resolution went still farther, for it said, "That it was necessary, in repealing the statute, and altering the common law, to enact in their stead such a law as should, by an efficient and summary process (hear, hear), provide against all threats, intimidation, and acts of violence which should be in any case resorted to, for the purpose of interfering with the perfect freedom of each party to employ their labour or capital in such way as they might choose." He wished, that before any member gave his vote on this occasion, he would read the evidence respecting what had taken place, and then say whether this perfect freedom was enjoyed. In that evidence was contained the name of every individual who had been assaulted, with the particulars of the several outrages. He did not mean to say that those disorders had been the result of the hon. gent.'s resolutions; but that they had taken place was a sufficient reason for the house providing a protection against a tyranny which was unparalleled in the history of the world. For this reason he trusted the bill would pass; for he was sure that no man could be responsible for the tranquillity of the country, if the session were allowed to close without some enactment on this subject.

Mr. T. Wilson expressed his sentiments in favour of the bill, because it tended to protect the workmen against their worst enemies—theirself. It was unjust, that manufacturers who had entered into contracts for the supply of goods, should be obliged to forfeit the penalty attached to non-performance, or else to grant wages disproportioned to their profits, out of which the workmen in employ under these circumstances, accumulated funds to support others who had abandoned their employers, because the latter could not, in justice to themselves, comply with their demands.

Mr. C. Grant said, that the clause providing summary process, now so much opposed, was supported by the hon. member for Aberdeen in his bill of last year, and was in perfect accordance with the resolutions of the former committee. But he thought the house would do better to attend to the bill itself, than indulge in mutual recriminations. He then took a brief review of the mischiefs arising from combinations, and alluded particularly to the conduct of the workmen in 1814, when 400 master manufacturers were obliged to write to their correspondents, requesting time under existing circumstances for the completion of their orders.

Mr. Bennet: It was said, that oppression had been inflicted by workmen upon their fellow workmen, who would not come into their way of thinking, and it was then argued that the existing law was necessary to put down this abuse. This he denied. If bludgeons and vitriol had been used in the manner stated, the law already marked such conduct as illegal, and provided for its punishment. It was said, that they ought to protect the workmen against themselves; but he would also protect masters from the delusion produced by the introduction of measures manifestly in their favour, and which, he believed, frequently led them to act with harshness. He would not use irritating language—it was not desirable to use it (hear)—but he was quite convinced that those who objected to parts of this measure, were only anxious that no unfair advantage should be given to either side. If the bill were recommended, and all those parts which interfered with the common law struck out, it would be adequate to every purpose of justice.

The petition was then laid on the table. On the motion "that it be printed,"

Mr. Hobhouse said, he was not a member of the committee; but he had been informed, that when individuals came forward to contradict the statement relative to certain outrages, which had been so much exaggerated, they were not allowed to do so. Had any of them been heard? (Mr. Hume, "Not one.") It was most unjust to legislate against a whole body of individuals, who had not been fairly heard (hear). Complaints had been made of violent language, but no violent language could do mischief in this country, except where individuals felt that their wrongs justified it. All the workmen wanted was to be fairly heard; and if they were not, that violence was likely to ensue, which had been so frequently deprecated in the course of this discussion.

Mr. Hume said, as very serious charges had been made against him, he felt himself called upon to give such an answer with respect to them as the circumstances warranted. It was alleged, that his tone and manner had been inflammatory. He denied the charge. He had stated nothing but the truth. He was prepared to prove all that he had advanced. He had thrown no personal reflection on any man. It was a course of proceeding he had always avoided (hear), because no good could be expected from it. Gentlemen said, "Let the masters and the men be protected, and let the men be protected against each other." He would say the same thing: but this object would not be effected by the present bill. In every instance the masters were protected, and in every instance the interests of the men were neglected. It was asserted by gentlemen opposite, that every outrage which had occurred, was caused by the repeal of the combination laws and the enactment of the bill of last session. They were told that the common law was abrogated by that bill. Now the country was suffering under a delusion on that point, and no person had done more to create that delusion than the rt. hon. Secretary for the Home Department, and the rt. hon. President of the Board of Trade. The common law was still in force. It was only inoperative with reference to peaceable meetings of a few workmen, who might assemble to regulate the rate of wages; but it was perfectly in force where threats, intimidation, or violence occurred. The great object in view, appeared to be to prevent the workmen from exercising any judgment in matters of wages; than which a more absurd or preposterous doctrine could not be advanced. By a summary process, the master was now to have an opportunity of sending a workman for three months' to the tread-mill—a provision to which he could never consent, unless the workmen enjoyed an equal protection. He denied the necessity of this additional legislation. The country was peaceable, and did not require it. But it was said with much appearance of sympathy and candour, "that we must protect the men against one another." What foundation had the rt. hon. President of the Board of Trade for introducing any such provision? One solitary instance had been adduced—one solitary petition had been presented, by certain sawyers*, complaining of the treatment they had received from the Thames Union; but when two individuals came forward, and, on the part of the sawyers of the Union, prayed that they might be heard, as no such thing as that complained of had occurred, they were told to go and procure a counter petition. After a system which had so long continued had been swept away, of course it was to be expected that some little re-action would take place: but, surely, instead of adopting new measures, they ought to take time to see how the new system would ultimately work. Then, and not until then, could they correct its imperfections. More facilities had been afforded for restraining combinations in the last year, than in the ten preceding years. (Mr. Peel—That was the consequence of the summary process.)—That summary process was introduced last year, to meet the then state of the country. (hear). If they would leave the summary process as it stood last year, the workmen would be content to take it. But many alterations had been made, which completely changed the nature of the law. He proposed to shew, that combinations were greater, and their organization more complete, before his bill was brought in, than they had been at any subsequent period; and this, notwithstanding the imputations which had been cast upon it by the rt. hon. gentleman.

Mr. Peel on the present occasion did not ask the house to strengthen the hands of Government (cheers); neither did he care for the masters to the exclusion of any other set of men (cheers); but he wanted the house to pass some act which should effectually resist the lawless efforts and proceedings of those who had associated for most unjustifiable purposes—which should protect the poor and defenceless, but industrious man, from becoming the victim of combinations which sought by every species of vexation to prevent him from availing himself of that employment which they themselves declined. The house was not called upon to make provisions of that kind without proof of the necessity for their enactment. Mr. Archibald Campbell himself, the hon. gent.'s chosen witness, from whose testimony he had that evening read so largely—Mr. Campbell expressly declared, that the only remedy he could suggest for the practices that had prevailed in his part of the country, of wounding and disfiguring, and destroying clothes and property by means of throwing oil of vitriol over them, would be the enactment of some such measure as Lord Ellenborough's act (hear, hear). In the city of Dublin, it would appear by the same evidence, that in one division of the police-office, there had been 16 cases of such mutilation of person or destruction of property, in the short space of nine months. The next passage imported, that in the same department, and in the same space of time before that act of the hon. gent.'s was passed, there had been only three such cases, the other sixteen having occurred since. Again he implored the house before they separated, and hon. gent. returned to their homes, to give that protection to the defenceless and industrious poor which this bill was calculated to afford them; and which protection they deserved at the hands of the Legislature, in return for their loyalty and peaceable conduct (hear, hear).

The Attorney-General confessed, that the course which had been that evening taken by the hon. member for Aberdeen on this question, filled him with surprise; because after this bill was printed he happened to have some communication with the hon. gent. on the subject. The hon. gent. told him on that occasion, that he approved of the principle of the bill, but that there were some faults in it that he could wish to have amended. And he had now in his pocket a copy of the bill as corrected by the hon. gent. himself (cheers from the Treasury bench). The first of the alterations suggested was that informations should be on oath; and that clause now stood amended accordingly. The other regarded the clause relative to the absconding of witnesses; which clause, he admitted, was still retained in the bill in its original state. The only other objections, however, that was then urged by the hon. gent. was as to the word "solely," in relation to the objects of these meetings; and he remembered that the hon. gent. asked him—what if it should turn out that such meetings assembled not “solely” for the purpose meant to be adverted to? These were all the alterations recommended at that time by the hon. gent., who did not intend then, as he understood him, to oppose this bill (hear).

Mr. T. Wilson thought it right to correct a misrepresentation of the hon. member for Aberdeen. He had stated that the thirty-three workmen, whose names were affixed to the petition praying for protection, had disclaimed all knowledge of that petition. Now he had the authority of Mr. Beale, a gent. who witnessed what took place, for stating, that although three of the men expressed their dissent from that petition, all the others were called together in presence of their master, and having been asked whether they heard the petition, and were acquainted with its contents, one and all signed it, and declared that they suffered great inconvenience, and did pray for protection.

Mr. Hume said that the petition of the parties in question was on the table of the house (hear, hear). They prayed to be allowed to prove their allegations, which were to the effect that he had stated. Now, under these circumstances, he must leave it to the house to decide which of the two statements was the correct one.

Mr. Wallace then moved the order of the day for receiving the report on the bill.

Mr. Hume was decidedly opposed to bringing up this report. In regard to what had been stated by the Attorney-General, he had proposed, undoubtedly, that every offence not punishable under his own bill, but which it appeared expedient to punish, should be inserted; and he would support such insertion. But he would not support the creation of an indefinite power to punish individuals, for offences not specifically defined. With regard to the present bill, there was but one solitary explanation to which, so far as he knew, he had acceded. It was represented to him, that whereas under the former bill, two witnesses were necessary to obtain a conviction, and great inconvenience and difficulty were experienced in most instances in obtaining two witnesses; it was now suggested that one witness should be substituted; and to that he felt no objection. Upon the whole, opposed as he was to this bill, and despairing, after the manner in which his observations had been met, of inducing gentls. on the other side to take what he considered a proper view of the subject, his only course was that which he should now adopt—of moving that the house be counted.

On the house being counted, and 44 members being found present, the house proceeded.

Mr. Hume proceeded in his opposition, observing that the numerous petitions that had been presented against the combination laws since the appointment of the committee ought to have been duly examined. As it was, the petitioners might as well have kept their petitions to themselves. There had been 97 petitions presented to the house. Into those petitions—into all of them—it was the duty of the house to have entered. As the committee had refused to examine them, he had at one time intended to have read them all to the house (a laugh). A bill of such importance, affecting so many thousands of persons, ought not to have been introduced except after the most minute examination. The fact was, however, that his Majesty's Ministers had taken a partial and unfair view of the case, as it stood between the masters and the men; and had not acted towards the persons interested with the justice which was usually exhibited in a common turnpike road bill. He then read a petition from certain journeymen of Leicester, asserting their right to obtain what they considered a remunerating price for their labour. He agreed with the petitioners in the view which they took of the subject, although he had heard it said that low wages were a good thing. That he denied. Low wages tended to degrade the labourer. It was the high wages which the English artisan received, compared with those received by the Irish, which made the former so superior. He again protested against the power given to magistrates to punish men for what was called molesting their fellow-workmen. Any act, however innocent, might be considered molestation. The house, perhaps, might consider that he was molesting them at that moment (a laugh, and cries of hear). That cheer convinced him that his objection to that part of the bill was proper; for an act of right and propriety on the part of a workman might be construed to be molestation just as it was in the present instance with respect to him; for he unquestionably was performing a just action in opposing an unjust measure. The hon. gent. sat down by declaring his intention to resist the bill with his utmost endeavours through every stage.

The house then divided.—For receiving the report, 56—Against it, 2—Majority, 54.

Sir R. Wilson strongly reprobated the use of the indefinite terms “molestation or obstruction.”

Mr. Peel said, that those words were accustomed to be used in acts of Parliament from the days of Charles II. Courts of justice had long been familiar with its application, and accustomed to act upon it; and no other term would serve to prevent those practices which it was the object of the bill to put down.

Mr. Calcraft defended the words, without which he thought the bill would be a dead letter.

Mr. Stuart Wortley expressed the same opinion.

In reply to a question from Mr. Hobhouse, The Attorney-General consented to introduce two words into one of the clauses, which would make the bill apply to combinations of masters to reduce the rate of wages, as well as to combinations of the men to raise it.

Mr. Hume repeated his objection to the clause containing the terms “molestation and obstruction,” than which he declared that nothing could be more vague and uncertain.

Mr. Denman followed on the same side. The words “molest or in any way obstruct” were not found in any statutes, except those relating to the revenue. On a misdemeanor so vaguely defined, no court could ever pass sentence.

The Attorney-General contended that the words complained of as vague and indefinite were sufficiently precise for the purposes of legislation. They were found in more than twenty acts of Parliament, on which the Judges were acting every day. Such a clause was rendered necessary by the conduct of the journeymen shoemakers of the metropolis at the present moment. They surrounded the shops of their masters, and when any workman left it who did not belong to their confederation, they did not assault or threaten him, for they knew that to be contrary to law, but they followed and insulted him by every means in their power. Such scenes if not checked, must evidently lead to bloodshed, and therefore he maintained that the present clause was not only expedient, but necessary.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.—On the question for the third reading, the Attorney-General said, he had to propose two verbal alterations of some importance. The first regarded the limitation of time within which, as to the summary clause now in the bill, prosecutions could be instituted. He proposed six months as the period. Then as to the clause which enacted, that if witnesses did not, or would not appear, they should be liable to be kept in prison until they should answer the questions put to them. This, however, as the principals, in offences under this bill, could only be imprisoned for three months, would be rather harsh: he had, therefore, in respect of them, introduced the limitation of three calendar months. There was also a third alteration with regard to appeals. He had thought it necessary, in pursuance of the general practice in cases of this kind, to suggest another clause, to provide that convictions should be engrossed on parchment, and certified at the next quarter sessions; and after that, the party entering an appeal should bind himself in the penalty of 10*l.*, and two sureties in 10*l.* each, to appear at the court of quarter sessions; for in case of failure in his appeal, it was but reasonable that the appellant should pay the costs of such a proceeding.

Mr. Dawson thought it would be extremely hard to compel a poor man to give security of this kind against the event of his failure; and yet, in case of his success, to leave him saddled with the expenses of obtaining justice by such appeal.

The Attorney-General consented to modify his clause so as to give costs to the appellant in the case of his succeeding in his appeal.

Mr. Hume said, his objections to this bill had been greatly mitigated by the alterations introduced by the Attorney-General (hear, hear); but he still objected to the words "molesting and obstructing," and to permitting masters, who were magistrates, to decide causes in other trades. For instance, a magistrate master-hatter might be called on to decide in a case where a master-shoemaker was concerned. Could the journeyman-shoemaker, in such a case—could the House—imagine that impartial justice could be done?

On the motion that the bill do pass,

Mr. Hume said, that he wished to make a few remarks before the last question was decided. No man, high or low, ought to be coerced by combination; but he was satisfied that nine-tenths of the recent disturbances had arisen from a want of conciliation between the parties, often, he was sorry to say, beginning with the masters, and attributable, perhaps, to long habit, from the existence of previous laws. These laws it was intended now to remove (whether they would be removed, in fact, was a matter of doubt), and he hoped that nobody would have occasion again to come to the house to propose any alteration, unless it were to get rid of the remaining part of the system, which pressed unfairly on the operative classes. He hoped that, on the part of ministers, there would exist a determination to listen as well to the complaints of the men as of the masters, and that they would not hastily come to a conclusion unfavourable to those who had hitherto been unjustly oppressed. He had been anxious to protect them as far as lay within his power. He had done as much as he could to obtain free labour for the men, and if he had a request to make to them, it would be, that they would avoid interfering with regard to wages, by threats, or even molestation. He trusted that all magistrates who were called upon to sit in judgment upon cases arising out of this law, would act impartially between the accuser and the accused, and give the most favourable interpretation to a word so dubious in its import. It was, most unquestionably, the interest of the operative classes to submit, and if they did submit and were oppressed, they would be certain to receive the sympathy of the public.

Mr. Peel: Unwilling as he was to prolong this discussion, he must repel the insinuation that there had been any disposition on the part of Government to bear hard upon the working classes, or that there had been the least desire to favour the masters. If the hon. member for Aberdeen had continued to express the sentiments which he had formerly entertained on this subject, he would most cordially have concurred in them. In a letter dated the 26th of March, 1825, addressed by the hon. member to a shipwright of Dundee, named Allen, he found the following expressions:—"If the journeymen do not act with more moderation and prudence than they have hitherto displayed, the legislature will be compelled to retrace its steps, and to repress the demands which have been made in various parts of the country, too often accompanied with violence." The legislature did not, however, mean to go so far as the hon. member had threatened. It did not mean to retrace its steps, nor to re-enact the combination laws; and he trusted that the measures provided by this bill would induce the journeymen to return to a peaceable demeanour.

The bill was then passed.

LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 4.—The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for committing the bill in this house.

The Marquis of Landown had several petitions to present against the bill. He expressed his regret that the house should be called upon, within two days of the prorogation of Parliament, to pass a bill which was of so important a nature, that it ought to have engaged the attention of their lordships for a considerable time. In addition to this precipitation, their lordships were not assured that the information necessary to enable them to come to a decision was on the table of the house. Under these circumstances, it was with great reluctance that he gave his assent to this measure. Yet, as upon the whole he thought the measure necessary, he should not oppose it. The petitions he had to present prayed that counsel might be heard against the bill, and if there were time, it would be their lordships' duty to accede to this prayer; for they ought to give their assent to no law, however necessary it might appear to them to be, if any considerable body of persons thought themselves aggrieved by it, without first hearing what such persons had to say against it. At another period of the session he would have thought it his duty to support the prayer of the petitioners, and to move that their counsel be heard. In the present case, however, he could only move that the petitions do lie on the table.

The Earl of Liverpool thought there was sufficient time for any discussion of this bill which could be necessary. The measure arose almost entirely out of the bill of last session. Soon after it passed, disturbances and acts of violence took place in different parts of the country; and it became necessary to pass some act on the subject before the session closed. If there were any defects in the measure, the allowing them to pass could not be compared with the mischief which would follow if the law were left in its present state. This bill not only prevented the combination of workmen against masters, and of masters against workmen, but prevented the combination of workmen against workmen. This was a protection which the honest and good workman had a right to expect. The present bill repealed the act of last session, but in doing so it also repealed all the old restrictive statutes, which were repealed by that act, while it restored the common law to its former state.

The Marquis of Lansdown wished his opinion to go forth, that some measure of this kind was necessary, and more particularly that it was necessary to protect the workmen against themselves. He wished every facility to be given both to masters and workmen to consult about the rise or fall of wages, but it was obvious that no manufacture could be carried on if any persons could dictate to masters who should be employed, and prevent men from exercising their right of labouring on whatever terms they might please.

The Earl of Rosslyn concurred in the necessity of protecting workmen from the effect of combinations among themselves; but as the bill gave them the power of consulting about their wages, he thought it would be proper also to give them the power of consulting respecting such regulations in their respective trades as might affect their interests. There were in many trades regulations which affected the rate of wages in reality, although they might not appear to do so. He should presently propose a clause on the subject.

The Earl of Darnley expressed his surprise that the Lord Chancellor and His Majesty's Prime Minister should have been so ignorant on the subject of a bill which had passed in the course of last session, and that bill so important a one.

The Marquis of Lansdown thought the punishment inflicted by the bill too severe. He would move to leave out the words "hard labour," and he would consent, instead, to insert "six months" instead of "three" before the word imprisonment.

The Earl of Liverpool thought the punishment prescribed adapted to the nature of the offence: besides, another clause in the act gave a party sentenced to that punishment by a magistrate, a right of appeal to the quarter sessions, with intermediate suspension of the punishment.

Lord Lansdown's amendment was negatived.

The Earl of Rosslyn wished to have the clause for allowing journeymen to meet for certain purposes, extended and strengthened by the addition of a few words, which he proposed for that purpose, in accordance with his previous observations.

The Lord Chancellor said that the clause as it stood would bear the very interpretation which the noble earl desired; and if it were brought before him, sitting as a judge, against any party applying for his habeas corpus, in a more oppressive sense, he would discharge the prisoner.

The bill passed the committee without amendment. The standing order was dispensed with, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Cotton Mills.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 16.—Mr. Hobhouse moved the second reading of his bill, for regulating the working hours of children employed in cotton manufactures.

Mr. Hornby objected to the bill on account of its interference in the apportionment of labour, which he thought was contrary to the best principles of political economy. It was proposed by this bill to reduce the children's hours of working by one-twelfth. At present they laboured in the mills twelve hours on each of the six days of the working week; and this bill went to reduce the twelve to eleven hours. But it was to be observed, that if they reduced the labour of the children, they must reduce that of adults too; so intimately were their labours connected with, and dependent on, each other. The consequence of this reduction of the hours of labour would be a diminution in the value of the total production of the cotton manufacture of two millions and a half per annum (hear). He should move as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day three months.

Mr. Hobhouse observed, that, in 1819, Sir R. Peel had introduced a bill, to which he now only wished to add a clause to compel the attendance of parties before magistrates. The member for Preston had told them, that there would be a diminution if the bill now before them were to pass, of two millions and a half in the annual production; but would they allow any considerations of this kind to interfere with a question that involved the health, and the comforts, and the happiness of so many children? (hear). Those benevolent masters who, with a feeling superior to considerations of their peculiar interest, had petitioned Parliament in favour of the object contemplated by this bill, had candidly stated, that the increase of machinery furnished increased temptation to employ children over hours. The children in these mills, with the exception of those employed by the member for Preston, and a few others, were now worked twelve hours and a half in the day; and for three or four days in the week were not allowed to leave the mills to take their meals, which they were obliged to take off the floor of their mills. Their skins were like parchment, and they scarcely looked like human beings. With regard to the medical evidence that had been furnished before a committee, and on which some gentlemen had relied as proving that 72 hours' labour during the week, or 12 hours per day, was not too much for a child; what weight could the house attach to the testimony of witnesses, of whom, one being asked whether he thought a child could keep standing, without prejudice to her health, on her legs, for 23 hours successively, had answered "That may be a matter of doubt!" (hear, hear, and a laugh): and of whom, another being asked whether the being pent up in a temperature of 80 degrees, and inhaling the flogh or flew of the cotton, would not prove injurious to the lungs and the health of children, replied, "that they might expectorate it." As to the interference complained of, there were various acts of Parliament in which a similar principle was recognized. There were acts, for example, to limit the hours of labour of shipwrights' apprentices in Dublin; and yet Irish children, he believed, were quite as strong as those of Manchester. As for the losses of the cotton, or any other trade, in a case like this, he would rather give up the trade itself, than continue a system so injurious.

Mr. Peel could neither support the original motion nor the amendment. He thought that if Sir Robert Peel's bill were put into full operation the object of the hon. gent. would be attained.

Mr. W. Smith replied that he was ready to furnish the most convincing proofs that the act which had been just alluded to had been most shamefully evaded.

Mr. G. Phillips said, that the whole course of his experience induced him to believe that this bill would in no degree improve the condition of the labourers. He contended, too, that those who were acquainted with the management of cotton-factories were best able to judge of what regulations were fit to be adopted with respect to them; he was satisfied that the condition of the people working in the factories was much better than that of persons who worked out of them. He had heard only this morning that the weavers did not receive more than one-third of the wages paid to the persons in factories, and the latter were besides provided with more convenient and wholesome places to work in. It would be well to limit the hours of children's working, if it were possible; but that was not possible without limiting the labour of adults; and the only effect of the measures now attempted would be to deprive the children of work altogether. He was satisfied that no such number of hours as had been asserted were ever used for the employment of children. The evasions of the acts which had already taken place had happened, it was true, in the least respectable mills, where the owners were wholly regardless of public opinion. The provisions of Sir R. Peel's act had been evaded in many respects; and it was now in the power of the workmen to ruin many individuals by enforcing the penalties for children working beyond the hours limited by that act. It was a great mistake to suppose that the labourers of Lancashire were under the domination of their masters, or that they had no will of their own. To agitate the subject was at all times dangerous; and the effect of this and similar acts of legislation would be to keep up a spirit of hostility between the masters and the men. They had already produced this effect. The sale and purchase of labour by the workmen and their employers ought to be left wholly unrestricted. The best thing that could be done to effect this object would be to repeal all that had been enacted on this subject.

Sir F. Burdett agreed with his hon. friend who spoke last that no legislative interference ought to take place in merely commercial transactions. But this did not apply to the subject before the house. His hon. friend, and others, who like him were connected with the manufactories, did not like to be interfered with; and yet they could not deny that before the passing of Sir R. Peel's act, the greatest abuses existed in the manufactories (hear, hear). It could not upon any grounds be pretended that these helpless beings should be sacrificed to the necessities of their parents, and the cupidity of those by whom their labour was purchased. We heard of slavery abroad, but he had never heard of any such instance of overworking as had been published with respect to the labour of the children in the cotton factories (hear, hear). If these representations were true—and they remained as yet uncontradicted—it was impossible to imagine any case which called more loudly for the interference of the legislature. Whatever the house might resolve to do with respect to adult workmen, the situation and the sufferings of the children required to be immediately provided for (hear, hear).

Sir P. Musgrave protested against the bill as a needless interference. He had no objection to vote for that clause which tended to enforce the provisions of Sir R. Peel's act.

Dr. Lushington put it to the house, whether they were not called upon to support a bill which provided that no person under the age of 16 years should be employed for more than 11 hours and a half in every day. Adults might be permitted to do as they would, but he would never consent that children should be devoted to labours which unfitted them for the exercise of the duties of their more mature years, and in many instances brought on an early death.

Mr. Evans, as a proprietor of a large factory acknowledged that there was much in the present system which required amendment. He did not think that the manufacturers would be losers if the hours of labour were shortened, because the children would be able to pursue their work with greater activity than at present.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.—The house went into a committee on the Cotton-Mills' Regulation Bill.

Mr. Hobhouse said, that he had originally wished to reduce the labour of children in cotton-mills to 11 hours in the day, and when he said that there was no trade at which even robust men were so long employed—that persons who were actually sentenced to labour as a punishment, were not called on to work for so many hours; he thought this proposition was a reasonable one. But he was willing to modify it, in order to meet the wishes of those who had objected to the bill. He found that the number of hours during which different journeymen were obliged to work, were:—Machine-makers, moulders of cast-iron, house-carpenters, cabinet-makers, stone-masons, bricklayers, millwrights, wheelwrights, blacksmiths, &c. each only for ten hours and a half, and some only eight and a half in winter. Thus it seemed that the time of these children's labour exceeded the period assigned to men; independent of which they must take into consideration the temperature in which the children were compelled to breathe, and which was always higher than that of the atmosphere. The alterations he proposed to make were:—that the children, for five days in the week should work for twelve instead of eleven hours, as at first proposed—and that on Saturdays they should work only nine hours. He meant also to introduce a provision, giving power to the acting justices of the peace to compel witnesses to attend to give their evidence, when informations were laid under this bill.

Mr. J. Smith believed that the custom of making children work for so many hours was prejudicial to the interest of their masters. In the factory of one of the most respectable and influential cotton-spinners in the country, Mr. Owen, the hours of employment had been decreased from  $11\frac{1}{2}$  hours, to  $10\frac{1}{2}$ ; and as much work was done in the latter, as had previously been done in the former number of hours. He believed the state of the flax-mills called quite as much for investigation, as the cotton; and he should have proposed a clause respecting them, if he had not feared it would endanger the bill.

Mr. Huskisson agreed in the propriety of enabling magistrates to compel the attendance of witnesses, where the law as laid down in Peel's bill was supposed to have been violated; but he by no means put faith in a great many of the statements which had been handed to the hon. member for Westminster, nor believed that the children generally in cotton mills worked fourteen hours a-day. A great deal of the present complaint was got up by one of those combinations which would require the hand of Parliament to put them down. As to the labour in the cotton-mills which was so heavily complained of, if its duration was considerable, there was not much exertion required in it. In agricultural work, a plough-boy was at labour as many hours as a child in a cotton-mill; and if they investigated every species of labour, he feared they would find few which they would not wish to be otherwise than they are. But what would become of the children if their employment were taken away? Bad as their present state might be, this would only make it worse.

Mr. W. Smith said, that as to the necessity of this excess of labour, he denied it; the people at the Lanark mills worked only 10 hours and a half a-day; and those mills paid sufficiently, and gave employment to 3,500 persons. No one could reprobate the system of slavery more than he did; but the labour performed by our negroes in the West Indies was actually less than was exacted from these children at Manchester, omitting the fact that it was performed under circumstances far less detrimental to health.

Mr. Peel was of opinion that the most valuable part of the present bill was the power which it gave to magistrates to enforce the provisions of the existing one. He should not oppose the clause limiting the labour on the Saturday; but he should have been better pleased to have had no alteration as to the labour, without a commission to investigate the facts.

Mr. G. Phillips believed that the effect of reducing the hours of labour would be to throw the children out of employ altogether. The present complaints were got up by a most formidable combination, "the Grand Union of Operative Spinners."

Mr. Gordon said, he thought that the children should be defended, not more against their masters, than their parents (hear). The children were not free agents, and required the protection of the legislature as much as the slaves of the West Indies, who it was admitted were not free agents, and for whom regulations had been made, not only as to what work they should do, but what allowance of food they should receive.

The bill passed through the committee, and was afterwards sent to the Lords, where it passed without discussion.

Poor Rates.

THURSDAY, MAY 12.—Mr. Monck moved for leave to bring in a bill to prohibit for the future the payment of any part of labourers' wages out of the poor's rates. The hon. genl. observed, that this practice of rendering every agricultural labourer partially a pauper, went not only to annihilate all independency of principle among the lower classes, but, moreover, to incumber the country with a population which it had no means of providing for. The law, as it stood, amounted to a bounty upon idleness. A labourer who, by day-work, earned, say 8s. a-week, was unable, if he had a family, to live on this, and received, perhaps, 6s. therefore in aid from the parish. If he was a man industriously inclined, and by task-work, or other extra exertion, raised his 8s. earnings to 12s., what was the consequence? He had his toll for his pains; for then the parish gave him 2s. And even this was a slighter evil than the encouragement which this practice gave to early marriages. In his natural state, the bachelor stood better off than the married man; his gains might be equal, and his burdens less; and this comparative ease of condition formed the true and legitimate check to improvident unions. But our law now neutralized that check entirely; or rather, indeed, gave a bounty to a man for producing children which he could not maintain. The law said now, that a single man should not earn so much by his daily labour as a married man. While he was a bachelor, he must labour at so low a rate, that all hope of making any provision for matrimony was out of the question; but he had only to marry and the parish would at once increase his wages, and give a pauper's support, as fast as they were born, to his children. The hon. member, after commenting generally upon the oppressiveness as well as the impolicy of the existing system, sat down by moving for leave to bring in his bill.

Sir George Chetwynd did not believe that it was lawful, as matters stood, to pay the wages of labourers out of the poor's rate; and if he was right in that opinion, the hon. member's bill became unnecessary.

Mr. Monck believed that the statute of Elizabeth, which authorized the raising a rate to maintain the children of parents who could not maintain them themselves, would warrant such a practice. However the law stood, the practice was notorious. In many places the farmers paid mere nominal wages—4d. or 6d. a-day, and sent the labourer to the parish to make up the deficiency.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.
(This bill was afterwards withdrawn.)

KING AND ROYAL FAMILY. Buckingham House.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said upon this subject, that Carlton palace, as many hon. members might be aware, was at the present moment in a very dilapidated ed state. It was, in fact, so far unsafe to inhabit it, that, whenever a large assembly was held in the upper rooms, it became necessary to prop up the lower ones. As the expense attendant upon the necessary repair, under such circumstances, would of course be very considerable, it was conceived that it might be more convenient to abandon Carlton House entirely, and make Buckingham Palace the royal residence in future. On part of the ground which Carlton House now occupied, a new building for the Royal Academy might be erected, and probably it would also afford one for the intended National Gallery. It would be easy, upon other portions, as it was conceived at present, of this site, to erect a series of handsome dwelling-houses, the value of which would cover a considerable portion of the expense to be incurred; but, as this must be a matter for profit hereafter, and money was wanted immediately for the new residence, it would be requisite for parliament to take measures with respect to that supply. The rt. hon. gent., after stating farther, that it was not intended to cover the whole of the space now occupied by Carlton House gardens with buildings, and that he believed the plan proposed for the intended alterations at Buckingham House would give general satisfaction, sat down by moving the following resolution—that it was expedient to authorize the application of part of the landed revenues of the Crown for the repairs and alteration of Buckingham Palace.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day for the second reading of the Buckingham House Bill.

Mr. Banks expressed his regret that, instead of making those alterations in detail, something grand was not undertaken in the way of the erection of a royal palace suited to the dignity of the king, and proportionate to the opulence of the nation. He thought it was high time that something of the kind should be undertaken, upon a site adapted to the purpose, such as Hyde Park, or the Regent's Park, and that a residence should be established truly worthy of the kings of this country.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it could not be denied that it would be desirable to have a royal residence worthy the dignity of the king, suited to the convenience of the subject, and ornamental to the metropolis; and his Majesty, in conjunction with those who proposed the grant, were most anxious, as far as the object could be attained, to have all these desirable points conjoined. It was extremely easy for a man, walking about town, to fix his eye upon a spot, and to write a clever pamphlet about it, showing how a spacious place could be found for the erection of a royal palace, but he had never yet seen a site, free from all other objections, and embracing what his Majesty was so desirous to regard, namely, the public convenience. His hon. friend had not only objected to the present situation, but had pointed out another, namely, Hyde Park; but it appeared to him most objectionable to overload that park with a great building; for the idea of his hon. friend could not be confined to a mere comfortable residence, but he must mean a splendid palace for the accommodation of the sovereign himself and part of his family, for foreign ambassadors, and great officers of state (no, no, no! from Mr. Banks). Well, then, see how difficult it was to come at people's meaning. The designs of Inigo Jones, the noblest that had ever been devised by the skill of any architect, could not be executed without encroaching on a vast portion of that park, which was now open to be traversed by the public, and which was always crowded as a place of enjoyment upon whatever days the people of this country had leisure to amuse themselves (hear, hear). That situation, therefore, would not only be inconvenient, as far as regarded the public, but with respect to the comforts of his Majesty; for it was expedient that the royal residence should have the advantage of privacy as well as of publicity: you must of course have a private garden for the sovereign, and it would take twenty years before a plantation would have grown sufficiently high to conceal the garden from all the windows in Park Lane. It would be extremely easy to point out a beautiful spot in Kensington Gardens, but that situation would be injudicious for obvious reasons. The Regent's Park had also been mentioned, in which, no doubt, a delightful situation might be procured, but most inconvenient from the want of immediate access to the person of the sovereign, by those whose presence might be required; taking one part of the year with the other it would be a most inconvenient situation. Now, Buckingham House had all the advantage of convenience of situation and a commodious garden; for although some thirty years ago, had there been any houses in Grosvenor Place, they would have overlooked it, yet now that inconvenience was quite removed; and if the building was improved in good taste, with a handsome facade, although the front might not be extensive, it might still be made a magnificent building. He had scarcely ever known any set of men agree upon matters of taste, which made him very sceptical about the validity of objections. He was sure the house would agree that, in any arrangement, the personal convenience of the monarch ought to be consulted. It was not that his Majesty had any capricious inclination to leave his residence in Carlton House, where he had lived so long, but that the house seemed inclined to quit the king; for it was in fact in a most dilapidated state. That part of the house now inhabited by his Majesty, was formerly devoted to the use of offices, and was converted afterwards into rooms, the effect of which had been to weaken the building, and when it became necessary to have large companies in the upper rooms, it was requisite to resort to props actually in the rooms which his Majesty inhabits. And with respect to the interior, although it looked very brilliant by candle-light, it had not been furnished for thirty years, and any one who had had the fortune of loitering there on public business must recollect the fact of its being covered with London dirt, and have seen how unfitting it was in many other respects for a royal residence. He did not give any opinion, for the subject was not now before him, on the question of expending a million, or a million and a half, on a suitable palace for His Majesty; but supposing such a measure were to be proposed what was to become of his Majesty in the interim? And supposing the proposed improvements to take place, and that a royal palace were to be afterwards erected, the present buildings would not be lost to the country. It was not an improbable thing that we might have a Queen Dowager, or an heir apparent, each of whom would require a residence suitable to their rank in the country. It had been seen, before the late reign, that some of the Royal family were lodged in Leicester-house, and other places which were greatly below the exalted rank of the tenants. By the removal of Carlton House an open view would be opened from Regent Street to the Park and the Horse Guards; buildings might be erected which would be highly ornamental to the metropolis; and Government might so dispose of part of the ground situate in that neighbourhood, as to produce an income sufficient to defray the expense of some of the projected improvements. The site of Carlton House might be advantageously used in the erection of buildings for the accommodation of the Royal Academy and the National Gallery (hear). For the former, it would be admitted that the Strand was most inconvenient; and for the latter, the British Museum, which had been suggested, was not the most proper place. With respect to the Royal Academy, people had to ascend, at present, nearly one hundred steps before they came to the exhibition rooms. This, he regretted, threw the exhibition; in a great degree, out of the reach of the old, the asthmatic, and gouty. For his own part, he could fairly say, that it was with the greatest delight he had heard of his Majesty's intention of offering Carlton House to promote the comforts and conveniences of his people, in preference to his own. Acting upon that offer, he thought that Government had adopted the most judicious course under all the circumstances. But he had long given up the hope of pleasing every body (hear, hear). Some persons were of opinion that Buckingham house, in its present condition, would answer all the purposes of a Royal Palace; but they must be very little acquainted with its interior state. It was, in fact, very shabby inside, and desperately dirty (a laugh). But according to the present intention, whatever might be said of the site, it would give his Majesty one of the finest apartments possessed by any Monarch, and all this for a smaller sum than 200,000*l*.

Mr. Ridley Colborne was sorry that so large a sum of money was to be expended on such a wretched site as that of Buckingham-house. The money which had been expended on the buildings at Windsor, Virginia Water, and Brighton, would have been sufficient to form a splendid and magnificent palace for the sovereign of the country.

Mr. Dankes, sen., said, that when he knew that 800,000*l*. would enable the country to build a magnificent palace for the sovereign, he was averse to granting 200,000*l*. to the repairs of a paltry and insignificant palace.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed to-morrow.

Windsor Castle.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—Lord Lynedoch rose for the purpose, he said, of calling their lordships' attention to a subject which had strongly arrested his own, and which he could not allow the session to pass without noticing. He had lately been down at Windsor, and had seen the improvements there carrying on. But he was surprised to see that there were many little spots of property intruding on the castle, so as to make it almost unfit for a royal residence. He had mentioned this to some of the ministers, whom he had the honour to call his friends, though he sometimes differed from them in opinion; but they had said they could not interfere to purchase such spots of ground, on account of the great unpopularity of doing so. He was of opinion, however, that as private property was frequently interfered with, in making roads, canals, &c. a bill should be passed, compelling persons, for a liberal remuneration, to give up such property as might be a real nuisance to that ancient royal residence. He did not mean to make any motion on the subject, but he could not have satisfied his feelings had he not mentioned the subject.

Grants to the Duchess of Kent and Duke of Cumberland.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 26.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought down the following message from the crown, which was read in due form by the Speaker:—

"That whereas, since Parliament had made provision for the due support of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and his Royal Highness Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland, the Princess Alexandrina Victoria, daughter of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, and Prince George Frederic Alexander Charles Ernest Augustus, son of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, had attained such age as that it became proper provision should be made for their maintenance and education, His Majesty being desirous to grant an annuity to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, for that purpose, recommended the subject to the consideration of the House of Commons, and relied upon their attachment."

The message which was also received by the Lords having been read,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that it should be taken into consideration to-morrow.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 27.—This day the Earl of Liverpool having moved the order of the day, observed, that he would trouble their lordships with only a few words on His Majesty's most gracious message. The young princess, the daughter of the late Duke of Kent, had been left under the care of her mother under very peculiar circumstances, and no provision had yet been made for her support. Their lordships were aware, that the provision which had already been made for the Duchess of Kent did not exceed 6,000*l*. a year, and that that provision had been made without reference to any issue she might have. He was sure all their lordships would, therefore, readily concur in carrying into effect the recommendation of His Majesty's message. There never was a person whose conduct had in all respects been more commendable than that of this illustrious princess. With respect to the other royal person, for whose issue provision was proposed to be made, he wished their lordships to recollect, that since the present income of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland had been settled, he had had a son, who was now about seven years of age. He was unwilling to advert to what had formerly occurred, and had caused a difference of opinion on a former occasion, but though an increase of revenue had been granted to other branches of the royal family, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland had received no addition to his income. Under these circumstances, His Majesty's ministers conceived that they were only doing their duty, when they advised the sending down a message from His Majesty to parliament, recommending that provision should be made for the issue of the late Duke of Kent and the Duke of Cumberland. All that he had now to do was to request that their lordships would agree to an address to the King, assuring His Majesty that they would concur in carrying into effect that object of the recommendation contained in his gracious message. What would be proposed was an addition of 6,000*l.* a year to the income of the Duchess of Kent, and of 6,000*l.* a year to the income of the Duke of Cumberland. Less, he thought, could not, and ought not to be given. The noble earl concluded by moving an address to the effect he had stated.

The motion for the address was put, and agreed to nonnemine dissentiente.

COMMONS.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the house should resolve itself into a committee, in order to consider of the the King's message relative to a provision for the Princess Alexandrina Victoria, daughter of the late Duke of Kent, and the Prince Ernest Augustus, son of the Duke of Cumberland, and the message having been read, rose to bring forward a proposition upon the subject. As the House of Commons, the hon. gent. said, had never been found wanting in inclination to manifest its attachment to the crown upon occasions like the present, he should not think it necessary to preface what he had to offer, with any appeal to the feelings of hon. members upon that subject. In the year 1818, a message had been brought down from the throne, announcing the intention of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Kent to marry, and recommending that the house should take into its consideration what would be requisite for the dignity of the reigning family, and the honour of the country, upon such an occasion; and the house had then proceeded to make a grant of 6,000*l.* a year in addition to the income already enjoyed by the Royal Duke; with a further provision of 6,000*l.* a year for the Duchess, in case it should so happen that she remained a widow. That provision had been sufficient under the circumstances; but it had not contemplated the possible fact of the Duchess surviving her husband, and being left with children. Of course it would be obvious that, situated as the members of the Royal Family were, money—to use a homely phrase—would not go so far with them as it would with other people. They had a state to maintain which did not fall upon any other class of persons; and their charities, public and private, were considerable. Since this provision of 6,000*l.* a year for the Duchess of Kent had been made, the Duke of Kent had died, and a daughter had been born, who was now six years old. It could not be necessary for him, therefore, to point out to the house the propriety of giving a suitable education to a young person so situated. The position in which this Princess stood with respect to the throne of the country, could not fail to make her an object of general interest to the nation. He had not himself the honour of being acquainted with the Duchess of Kent, or her royal daughter, but as far as her education had proceeded, he believed the greatest pains had been taken with her. She had been brought up in principles of piety and morality, and to feel a proper sense—be meant by that a humble sense—of her own dignity, and the rank which, perhaps, awaited her. Perhaps it might have been fit to have brought this matter before Parliament at an earlier period; but the Duchess of Kent had been assisted by her Royal brother. That, however, was not a way in which a public question could regularly be dealt with; and, with respect to the Duchess of Kent, therefore, his proposition would be—that an addition of 6,000*l.* a year, for the maintenance and education of her daughter, should be granted to her Royal Highness. In the next place, he would call the attention of the house to the case of the Duke of Cumberland. At the time of the Royal Duke's marriage, a proposition similar to that agreed to for the Duke of Kent, had been submitted to Parliament, but had not been complied with. There had been, the fact was, some objection taken to the marriage. The Duchess, from some cause, had not been received at Court. These circumstances had probably influenced the conduct of the house, because the only mode in which Parliament could express its disapprobation of any Royal marriage, was by withholding that provision which should be given for its support. Whatever the motive had been, the subject had been pressed a second time in the year 1818, and had failed; but Parliament had then granted, as in the case of the Duke of Kent, a provision of 6,000*l.* to the Duchess of Cumberland, in case she happened to be left a widow. Since that time, however, a prince had been born—a son of the Duke of Cumberland—who was now six years old. His position was not certainly so near to the throne as that of the princess, the daughter of the Duke of Kent; but still the country was interested in giving him a suitable education. One thing above all was desirable, that the education of both these young persons, upon every account, both moral and constitutional, should be conducted in England. His intention, therefore, was to propose with respect to the Duke of Cumberland, that 6,000*l.* a year should be granted to him for the education of his son—intending that education to be given in England. And he moved, as his first resolution, that a sum not exceeding 6,000*l.* a year should be granted to His Majesty as a provision payable to the Duchess of Kent, for the maintenance and education of her daughter, the Princess Alexandrina Victoria.

Mr. Brougham believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did no more than justice to the house in the character which he gave of its general anxiety for the convenience and dignity of the Crown; and if there was one point connected with that dignity, upon which the house would be more anxious than upon any other, he believed it would be upon the education of the younger branches of the Royal family. This being his own feeling, he was quite sure that he should not be suspected of departing from it, if he did not observe, looking at the first grant made, that it was at least an extremely liberal one. He did not know that he should stand up to oppose the grant, especially if he found himself unsupported; but he did think that 6000*l.* a year was rather a large stipend for the purpose to which it was to be applied. With reference to the second proposition, however, of the rt. hon. gent.—that for the grant to the Duke of Cumberland—it became necessary for him to address a few words to the house. He by no means thought that it was on account of any circumstances in the Duke's marriage that parliament had refused to make the proposed increase, in 1818, to his income; and if it had been on that account, he should have held the vote to be one of the most indefensible that house had ever come to; because, at the time of the vote, the marriage had been contracted; and if there had been any objection, the King ought to have interfered. If the marriage was unsuitable, the Crown had power to prevent it; and that power not having been resorted to, it must be taken not to have been wholly improper. But he did not hesitate to say openly, that he believed it was not at all on account of his marriage, but on account of some dislike—well founded or ill-founded, but quite rooted in the minds of the people of England and their representatives—towards the Duke of Cumberland, that parliament had refused to sanction the grant demanded for him. Whether he himself shared or did not share in that dislike, it was not necessary for him now to say. But it was a feeling which pervaded the whole country—all classes—men, women, and children. It would be remembered that the Duke of Cumberland had already 18,000*l.* a-year, besides the 15th Dragoons. He had 19,000*l.* a-year from the country already—and he lived out of it. Why did he do this? He was not in any office; nothing called him abroad; and yet he did not live among his countrymen. Nineteen thousand a-year, let it be recollected, would go as far abroad as thirty thousand in this country; and he (Mr. B.) had no desire to grant the royal Duke 6000*l.* a-year more, until he came to show himself, with the rest of his family, in England. Why did he not spend his income here to maintain the dignity and splendour of the country from which he drew his funds (hear, hear)? What was there to prevent him? It seemed, however, that he was to send his son. How did they know that? What security had they, that after he received this additional grant, making an income of 25,000*l.* a-year, he would come and reside in England, or even send the young prince his son amongst us? We were now, it seemed, of a most plethoric habit with respect to money. It was difficult to dispose of it, and we must get rid of it in the best way we could. If such were our condition, he for one would prefer giving it to those members of the royal family who resided amongst us, and whose embarrassments seemed to require some such aid. It was well known that a certain illustrious member of the royal family was in such a state of pecuniary difficulty as to have had his carriage and horses taken in execution. Was this decent? Would it not be better, as we were so liberal of the public money, to bestow some of it on those who really seemed to stand in need of it—to give it to those who resided amongst us, and who, it appeared, could not go to a race-course without having that happen to them which would be reckoned a disgrace if it occurred to a private individual (hear, hear)? He thought the dignity of the royal family would be better consulted, by having such embarrassments removed, and such unpleasant accidents prevented in future. These were painful subjects to which to allude, but it was a duty to mention them when a grant was proposed for which he heard no one substantial argument.

With respect to the proposed grant for the due maintenance and education of the young Princess, the daughter of the Duchess of Kent, he gave it his support—not alone for the sake of the young princess, though that would be a sufficient ground; but for the sake of increasing the income of that illustrious lady, which it was admitted was too scanty. She was the widow of a prince whose loss all must lament—than whom no man possessed greater talents or greater habits of application. Those habits survived in his illustrious widow, who was eminently fitted to undertake the task she had imposed upon herself—that of the education of the infant princess.

Mr. Hume protested against the principle of the house being called upon to vote any sums for paying the debts of members of the royal family, who had already a sufficient allowance from the country. He did not object to the education of all the members of the royal family in that manner which befitted their high rank and the station they might hereafter be called upon to fill. He was sorry that the vote, as far as it respected the Duchess of Kent, had not been proposed three years ago. The grant should have been made at that time, and increased from year to year, instead of raising it at once from six to twelve thousand a year. However, he would support the grant. As to the proposed grant to the Duke of Cumberland, if he were to stand alone he would take the sense of the house upon it. After the two decisions to which the house had already come, upon the question of increased grants to his Royal Highness, after the discussions which they had undergone, and the opinions expressed with respect to his conduct, the present proposition was monstrous. Was the sum of 6000*l.* to be expended in the education of this young prince? He would undertake for 100*l.* a-year to give him a better education here than he would be likely to derive from the 6000*l.* a-year on the Continent (aye, at the new university, said Mr. Brougham in a low tone) Aye! at the new university, continued Mr. Hume. If, however, it was determined that this sum should be given, he would say, let the royal Duke come to England, and let him educate his son as an Englishman, under the public view. In foreign countries he might imbibe notions hostile to the British constitution. But the Duke ought to educate his children out of his 19,000*l.* a-year. Why, would it be believed, that the late King would make no allowance to the late Duke of Kent till he was 21 years of age, beyond 600*l.* or 1000*l.* a-year, which was doled out to him by his tutor at 1*l.* and 2*l.* at a time? The Duke of York was the first of the royal Princes for whom an allowance was granted. The Duke of Clarence did not receive any allowance till he was 18 or 19 years old. Looking at these precedents, he saw no reason why the present grant should be made.

Sir J. Cuffin said, that some allusions had been made to the embarrassments of the heir apparent. He thought it would become the ministers of the Crown to bring forward a proposition to the house for the payment of those debts. It was a fact that his Royal Highness owed a sum of 12,000*l.* to his tailor, one farthing of which he could not get. These debts ought to be paid (hear, hear, and a laugh).

Mr. Monck observed, that if what had fallen from the hon. member who had spoken last was correct, some inquiry should be made into the subject, and if the royal Duke had not the means of paying his debts, he for one would vote that they should be paid by the country, for he wished to support the splendour of the crown in a becoming manner. The vote for the Duke of Cumberland stood on a different ground. There, would, he believed, be found no precedent for such a provision for a younger branch of their family in the houses of Austria, France, or Prussia.

Sir C. Forbes gave his support to both grants. That for the young Princess of Kent he agreed to, because he thought it was a shame the Duchess should have been left hitherto in a great measure a dependent on her relative Prince Leopold. The allowance already enjoyed by her Royal Highness was niggardly for the widow of a Prince so nearly allied to the throne. He would also support the grant to the Duke of Cumberland. It should be recollected, that he had had no increase since his marriage. He had only the same income at present as when he was a bachelor. It was objected that he lived abroad; but why was he not allowed an income sufficient to maintain his rank at home as well as his royal brothers? He was astonished to find insinuations thrown out against the royal Duke, which would be scouted in that house if applied to any other individual in the country. If there were any fair ground of charge against him, let it be brought forward and proved, if proved it could be. He was a subject, and amenable to the laws; but it was repugnant to every principle of justice to condemn any person unheard, and not only to condemn, but to punish him. He would not only support the grant, but if the forms of the house permitted, he would move that the allowance should be dated back from the period at which the addition had been made to the income of his royal brothers.

Sir J. Majoribanks said, it would give satisfaction to the country if ministers would bring down a message to the house for a grant to his Royal Highness the Duke of York, which would enable him to get rid of his pecuniary embarrassments. His Royal Highness had proved himself the soldier's friend; and his great attention to the comforts of the soldier, as well as to military discipline, had been productive of most important advantages to the army of the country. He was convinced that the announcement of such a message from the King would give very general satisfaction to the country.

Mr. T. Wilson said, the example of Austria or France, which had been quoted, was not one which should have any influence with us. He trusted that in the mode of maintaining or educating our royal princes, we should not look for precedents in any of the royal families of the Continent. An hon. member had spoken of a message respecting a grant to another branch of the royal family. He would say, that if such a message came to the house he would support it. He conceived, from all he had an opportunity of knowing of the disposition of that illustrious individual to answer the many calls made on his benevolence, that he was entitled to the support of the country, if such a proposition should be brought forward.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it was too hard for those who held (what he did not admit) that his Royal Highness was unpopular in this country, to object at the same time to his residing out of it. The fact was, he believed, his residence abroad was occasioned by the delicate state of his duchess's health, which made a resort to some of the baths on the continent necessary. On the subject of the Duke of Cumberland's present circumstances, he would not say any thing. He was not exactly acquainted with his affairs. He believed, however, that some time ago they were in a state of considerable embarrassment. This, perhaps, would not be surprising, when one recollected that the habits of young Princes, destined to move in such high stations, were not those which led to the most prudent regard to economy.

Mr. Peel, alluding to the thin state of the benches opposite, observed that they were nearly empty, because hon. members felt that the proposition of his rt. hon. friend was a fair one, and ought not to be opposed. Upon the first proposed grant—that to the Duchess of Kent—there seemed to be but one opinion; but on the second, there was an objection—that the house had already refused a similar application. The refusal, he contended, was founded on objections to the marriage of his Royal Highness; but since then he had had a son born to him who might hereafter succeed to the throne of these countries. His case, therefore, was different now from what it was then. But the hon. member for Aberdeen, it seemed, was not disposed to allow any sum for the education of the young prince. At least, he would limit it to 100l. a year, and that in the intended London University, where he might share the education of mechanics. He was rather surprised that, as the hon. member was disposed to favour a cheap mode of education, he did not point out another university, of which he was the learned rector, and where it might be had on terms equally reasonable (hear, hear). As to the general question, he thought it would be but fair to place the Duke of Cumberland on the same footing with his Royal brothers who were married. They who objected to the residence of the royal duke abroad ought to support this motion, because the proposed grant would remove one objection to his not coming to live in England—namely, that his present allowance was not adequate to support his rank in this country.

Mr. Denman observed, that the house ought to pause seriously before they agreed to a proposition of this kind. It was an example which would be readily followed in other instances. They had already, even since the commencement of the debate, witnessed the effect of such a motion. No sooner was it proposed, than one hon. member stepped forward and declared, that he would not only vote the grant, but also vote it for all the years since an addition had been made to the income of the other members of the royal family. Another faithful guardian of the public followed up his declaration in support of the motion with another, in which he suggested the propriety of paying the debts of the Duke of York, whom he seemed to think the most popular man in the country; and, as one item of those debts, a gallant admiral informed the house that the royal duke owed no less than 12,000l. to his tailor; so that, because of this gross extravagance, which would not be countenanced in a private individual, the country was to be plundered, and asked to make good debts to he knew not what amount. An expenditure exceeding income was any thing but a claim to the favourable consideration of any man or body of men. Every man ought to be able to calculate his income, and to regulate his expenses by it; and an individual whose income from the country was exceedingly liberal, had no farther claim if he allowed his expenses to go beyond it. He could not consent to see the public thus plundered without mercy and without shame. He fully concurred in the vote to the Duchess of Kent, but when called upon to vote 6,000*l.* a year for the education of a young prince, whose father was receiving 19,000*l.* a year from the country, he was compelled to pause. He was not indifferent to the proper education of those princes who might hereafter succeed to the throne of these realms; but it did not follow, that the education was to be good in proportion to the thousands which might be paid for it. Even after this sum should be voted, what security had they that the object for which it was given would be attained, and that the young prince would be sent for his education to England?

Mr. Canning said it was unfair to introduce subjects not at all connected with the question before the house. It was unfair to argue hypothetical cases, and to say what answer ought to be given to applications never made, and which never might come before the house. For it should be borne in mind that the illustrious individual whose private affairs had thus been dragged into discussion, had not obtruded them on the house. Whatever they were, he kept them to himself. He had made no claim; he had not in any way pressed his circumstances on the notice of the house or the public (hear, hear). One learned gent. (Mr. Brougham) stated a case hypothetically, and said he would rather pay the debts of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, than consent to the proposed grant to the Duke of Cumberland. On this hypothesis other hon. members spoke, and introduced the character and conduct of the illustrious duke (of York) into the discussion. This, to say the least, was not fair dealing, and most certainly was foreign from the question before the house. There were two propositions before them. As to the first, it would almost be a waste of words to add any thing to what had been already said on it; for there was only one feeling,—that it was a tardy act of justice to the illustrious lady who was in great part its object (hear, hear). If there was any blame to Government, it was in not having introduced the subject before (hear). If any thing could be added to the praise of her Royal Highness, it would be, the notice of her mild, unassuming demeanour: she was never heard, never seen, but was constantly employed in superintending the education of that infant, for whom these realms might be destined (hear, hear). As to the vote to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, he wished to have it considered what it was in fact—a grant for the education of the young prince, his son. It was objected to it, that after the vote passed, the object of it might be defeated by delaying the return of the young prince to England; but ministers would have it in their power, to see that the money was applied solely for the purpose for which it was voted. It was said that the house had already twice decided on this question. They had decided on the proposition of a grant, but not a grant on the grounds now advanced.

The principal objection on the first occasion was to the marriage of his Royal Highness; and on the second occasion the same ground was taken. It was objected now, that the Royal Duke continued to reside in a foreign country, and it was at the same time said that there was a lurking dislike to him in this. Surely, if the latter assertion were true (which he denied), it was cruel to make his residence abroad an objection. But he did not reside abroad from any dislike to his country, or from a consciousness of being disliked in it. One reason why the Royal Duke resided in the country of his wife's relations was, that he had not the means of supporting himself and his family with comfort in England. The first pride of his heart, if he could have accomplished it with any degree of comfort to himself and his Royal consort, would have been to live in the country in which he drew his birth; but as he was not able to do so, it was not unnatural that he should seek in her country, among her relations, those enjoyments which his fortune would not enable him to obtain in his own. The Royal Duke had now a child who was six years old, and therefore of an age when his education became a matter of importance. If there were any reasons which compelled the Royal Duke to reside abroad, as was insinuated, it was only fit to rescue the child, who might be the future King of England, from the sphere of their influence. He contended that the contingency to which he had just alluded was a sufficient reason why Parliament should secure the education of the Prince of Cumberland in this country. With regard to the securities which had been demanded for the child's education in England, he thought that they were to be found in the responsibility of ministers, who were bound to see the grant applied as the resolution of the committee directed.

The first resolution—that of providing for the Princess Victoria of Kent—was then put from the chair, and passed nomine contradicente.

On Mr. Brogden's putting the second, providing for the education of the young Prince of Cumberland,

It was then proposed as an amendment that the words "in Great Britain" be added to the resolution.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer strongly objected to the amendment after the unequivocal assurance he had given on the part of government, that the money was bonâ fide intended for the education of the child in England, and in England alone. Unless the house had any suspicion that he intended to deceive them, the amendment was unnecessary. It would imply a doubt in the assurances of government. Besides, he wished to put it to the committee, whether the Duke of Cumberland, with a knowledge of what had passed on the subject, would risk the loss of this grant by educating his son abroad. Even if the Royal Duke should determine to educate the young prince on the continent, parliament would at all times hold in its hands the means of recalling him to his duty; it could either address the crown to withhold the grant, or repeal the bill by which it was placed at the crown's disposal (hear).

Mr. J. P. Grant had no doubt that the rt. hon. gentlemen opposite would fulfil the pledge they had just given to the committee, as far as they themselves were personally concerned; but then they ought to recollect that they were not quite certain of retaining their places as ministers for ever (hear). They were, it was true, very likely to retain them for the term of their natural lives (hear); but still there were circumstances which might by possibility displace them (hear). The committee ought not to be satisfied with the pledge of any ministers, however respectable, who had not a sort of prescriptive right to their situations. But they were told that it was in their power to retract their present vote, if the Duke of Cumberland did not give his child that education in England to which the ministers had pledged him. Now, supposing the Duke of Cumberland should refuse to redeem the pledge which ministers were making on his behalf, what proof of that pledge could any man find in the journals strong enough to form a parliamentary ground for the repeal of the bill which was to be brought in upon the present resolutions (hear)? He therefore thought that any words, declaratory of the intention of the committee to appropriate the sum of 6,000*l.* a-year to the education of the Prince of Cumberland in this country, would be highly proper and expedient, and ought to be inserted in the proposed resolution. If they were not so inserted, no words uttered by any minister in that house could be considered binding either on the Duke of Cumberland, a future minister, or a future and a different House of Commons.

Mr. Huskisson contended that if the amendment now proposed were agreed to, it would become part of the law of the land, and the young prince could not be removed for any purpose from the country without the leave of parliament. If he left England, the officers of the Exchequer would be no longer justified in paying to his father any part of this allowance. Now, suppose that it were thought an advisable object at some future period to send this prince abroad, either for the good of his health, for the benefit of his education, or for fleshing his maiden sword on the enemies of his country, that object could not be accomplished, if the present amendment were agreed to. It was said that the pledge of ministers was not sufficient, because there was no certainty that they would always continue the same. He thought that argument of little weight, when it was considered that though the ministers might be different, parliament would still continue unchanged. He had little doubt that if the prince were to reside long abroad, or that if his education were to be conducted there upon principles which the country could not approve, parliament would feel it to be its duty to interfere with promptness and decision to procure an alteration in such a system. Though he was as anxious as any gentleman who supported the amendment, to see the object of the grant faithfully executed, he thought the amendment unnecessary, after the pledges which had been given.

Dr. Lushington contended that this resolution was meant to give 6,000*l.* a-year by a side-wind to the Duke of Cumberland, when he could not obtain it by a direct measure from parliament. He begged the house to observe, that the Duke of Cumberland had now 19,000*l.* a-year; the Duchess of Kent only 6,000*l.* and they were both to have an additional 6,000*l.*, making the income of the Duchess 12,000*l.*, and the Duke 25,000*l.* But was not the Duke quite as well able to educate his son on 19,000*l.*

as the Duchess of Kent her daughter on 12,000*l.*, and this child nearer the throne than the Duke's son? He might continue to reside abroad, and not return to the country where he drew his breath, and whence he drew his revenue. It was probable that he wished to remain abroad, and he (Dr. L.) would not give one shilling to bring him back. He would vote for the grant if made to secure the education of the Prince in Great Britain: 6,000*l.* was the utmost extent of parliamentary liberality on such an occasion, and he thought parliament ought to secure its proper employment. If the words "in Great Britain" were not continued in the resolution, he would oppose it with all his might.

Mr. T. Wilson supported the amendment, as he thought that the committee ought to fix some determinate object to which the grant should be applied. If they did not, they would, in his opinion, stultify themselves; for they would act as if their former vote with respect to the Duke of Cumberland was wrong, without being able to produce any proof that their present vote was right.

Mr. C. Wynne thought that he was not inconsistent in rejecting this amendment, and voting for the original resolution, though he had opposed both in 1815 and 1818, the proposed augmentations to the Duke of Cumberland's income. At the time those propositions were under discussion, it was stated that if there should be any issue to the marriage of his Royal Highness with the Princess of Salms, parliament would be bound to make provision for it. That pledge, he conceived, parliament was now called upon to redeem. He contended; that the committee would not have any better security by inserting the words "in Great Britain" in the resolution than it now had without them; for a future parliament would be enabled to alter any bill they might now pass. The education of a child ought, in most instances, to take place under the eye of the parent. It would be wrong to weaken the tie between them, except under cases of strong necessity. He allowed that parliament had the power of interfering to dissolve such tie in the royal family; but he confessed that the exercise of it on this occasion appeared to him to be both unwise and unnecessary. After the debate of that night, could any man doubt that the education of this child would take place in England?

Mr. Peel suggested, that the object of securing the education of the child in England could be as well secured by inserting a declaratory sentence on the preamble of the bill, as by adopting the proposed amendment of the resolution, which would not be a respectful course to the crown.

The committee divided on the first amendment, when the numbers were—For it, 64—Against it 79—Majority against the first amendment, 15.

The committee then divided on the original resolution, when the numbers were—For it, 105—Against it, 55—Majority for the original resolution, 50.

MONDAY, MAY 30.—The report of the King's message having been brought up, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the resolution was read, "That there be granted out of the consolidated fund, a sum not exceeding 6,000*l.* a-year to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, for the purpose of enabling her Royal Highness to make a suitable provision for the education of her Highness the Princess Alexandrina Victoria of Kent."

Mr. Hume wished to ask, as in a former stage of this debate, whether, in the event of the death of this individual, the young princess, the vote just proposed would be continued to her mother (hear, hear).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was understood to answer, that from motives of delicacy he had not contemplated such an event in the vote.

Mr. Hume observed, that when upon a well-known occasion a yearly sum of 50,000*l.* was granted by a former Parliament, a proposition, he knew, had been suggested, but not regularly brought forward, to meet a contingency somewhat similar. He could not but think it would have been much better had Parliament so framed that grant, as to put the distinguished individual Prince Leopold, in such an event, in the same situation as any one of the other princes, instead of assuring to him the perpetual income of three (hear, hear).

The resolution was read a second time, and agreed to.

The next resolution proposed was—"That there be granted to his Majesty out of the consolidated fund, a sum not exceeding 6,000*l.* a-year, for the purpose of enabling his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland to make an adequate provision for the suitable maintenance and education of his Highness Prince George Frederick Alexander Charles Ernest Augustus (laughter) of Cumberland."

Mr. Hume proposed to negative the resolution (hear, hear). Of all the measures which had been undertaken by the present administration, none could possibly have given less satisfaction to the country at large than this was calculated to do—this shameful waste of the public money (hear, hear). Waste of the public money he must continue to call it, seeing what must be the ultimate destination of the money, and that at the same time it was asked for by his Majesty's ministers, even the stipulation for the education of the boy in England was refused (loud cries of hear, hear, and no). But he contended that the fact was so: it was evidently the intention that he should not be educated in England, for upon what other ground was the opposition made to the amendment of the rt. hon. bart. to be accounted for (hear, hear)? The amendment of Friday evening having been rejected, he conceived it was evident that this allowance was not intended for the young prince's education, but for the Duke himself (hear, hear). The Duke received an income from the public of 19,000*l.* a-year, the greater part of which he had for some time expended on the Continent; and an income of 19,000*l.* sterling per annum was equal in Prussia or Hanover to an income of 30,000*l.* in this country. Could there be on the part of the Duke or his Majesty's counsellors, who had advised an application like this, the least disposition to economize, when the public had been refused by them the smallest reduction of the taxes, because it was said they could not advise or sanction the diminution of the existing revenue by such reduction (hear, hear). And yet, in the same breath as it were, and by the same set of men, the house was now called upon to make an additional charge of 6,000*l.* a-year on the consolidated fund for purposes and interests of this nature. His Majesty's ministers had, on this occasion, come down to ask what had never been asked of that house before (hear, hear.) Let them point out when it was that for the education of a boy not six years old, 6000*l.* a-year had been asked for (hear, hear)? He could discover no such allowance to have been ever made to the late king's sons for such a purpose as that suggested by this resolution, even at periods when they were further advanced in life. The Duke of Gloucester formerly stood in the same situation with respect to the degree of his succession to the throne as the infant Prince of Cumberland stood in now. In the year 1767, in consequence of a message from the crown, Parliament granted to his late Majesty's three brothers, the Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of York, and the Duke of Cumberland, 8,000*l.* a-year each. But soon after the birth of the present Duke of Gloucester in 1776, in consequence of another message from the crown, Parliament settled upon him, then Prince Frederick, 8,000*l.* a-year; and on his sister, the Princess, 4,000*l.* a-year "upon the death of their father." The allowance of 8,000*l.* a-year each, that had been made to the King's three brothers in 1767, was increased, but not until 1785, to 9,000*l.* a-year. It was therefore clear that the late Duke of Gloucester had educated and maintained his son out of his annuity of 9,000*l.* a year, without any additional allowance; the 8,000*l.* a-year not having been paid until after his death to the present duke (hear, hear). When he (Mr. Hume) remembered the last divisions which had taken place in that house on the subject of the Duke of Cumberland he could not help asking what had that individual done since, to gain the good will of Parliament (hear)? Was it because his son stood sixth or seventh from the throne, that Parliament was to be called on to alter the wholesome precedent it had formerly observed, in its grants, of making every man support his own family out of the allowance made for him by his country (hear, hear); and of requiring that every man should shape his expenses according to that allowance, without coming upon the nation to ask for additional means (hear, hear)? It had been said, that to the late Princess Charlotte of Wales, this house had granted a separate maintenance. She, however, was at that time the heiress presumptive to the crown; and it was on that account Parliament made such a grant. Parliament was asked by the present vote to put the sixth or seventh in succession on the same footing with the presumptive heiress to the crown (hear). On all these grounds, it seemed the best course to him (Mr. Hume) to put a direct negative on the resolution (hear).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, if it had been the pleasure of that house, on a former occasion, to increase the allowance of the Duke of Cumberland in the same way as it had increased the allowances of all the other branches of the royal family, it would have been needless on his Royal Highness's part to have asked, now, for an addition to that allowance by reason of the birth of a son. It would be recollected, however, that the Duke of Cumberland did not obtain the same increased allowance when his marriage took place; and, therefore, his was quite a different case (hear, hear). His Royal Highness having since had a son born to him, there was, surely, nothing injurious to his character in the proposition now made for an allowance to him on account of the education of that young individual. But the hon. gent. seemed to be exceedingly displeased that government should propose for the education of the young Prince of Cumberland the same allowance as for the young Princess of Kent; and the hon. gent. contended that there ought not to be this equality of allowances, because the parties themselves did not stand in the same degree of relationship to the crown (hear, hear). This objection, however, was a little inconsistent in the mouths of the hon. gent. and his friends; because, when on a former occasion it was proposed to make some difference in the allowances to the children of the Dukes of Clarence and Kent, because of the greater proximity of the child of the Duke of Clarence to the throne, the gentlemen opposite would not allow that argument to avail at all; and either by a specific vote, or by agreement, they reduced the original resolution of 10,000*l.* on that occasion to 6,000*l.* In now proposing 6,000*l.* on the other hand, for the maintenance and provision of the Prince of Cumberland, it did not appear to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) that government were only following the example which had been already set them by parliament. With regard to what the hon. gent. had said about the education of the child, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had, on a former night, most unequivocally declared—not only that this 6,000*l.* a-year would be for the education of the boy, but that he would be educated in England (hear, hear). He now repeated that expressly; and though he did not feel justified in agreeing off hand to the amendment which was proposed by the rt. hon. bart. (Sir J. Newport); yet he had no difficulty in saying, that if an amendment were now proposed with the purpose of providing for the prince's education in this country, he would not object to it (cheers). On the former evening some hon. friends of his had intimated that such an amendment might be introduced into the bill to be founded on these resolutions by way of preamble. This seemed the only difficulty on this part of the question—how to bring it in? He would only say, that he would be quite willing to insert any words in this way which would give a positive pledge and assurance to the house that this young person should not be educated abroad, but in England. This was the real object of the bill (hear). But in bringing it forward it had not been considered proper to wound the feelings of the parents. Whatever impressions might be entertained with respect to that illustrious duke, hon. gentlemen would recollect that a resolution of this kind, accompanied with such a condition, involved the possible separation of father and child. Gentlemen talked of expatriating the Duke of Cumberland, as if it were quite a matter of course; and an hon. and learned civilian the other night had even gone the length of saying, not only that he would not do any thing to induce the Duke of Cumberland to return to this country, but that he would do every thing to keep him away (hear, hear). To hold language of this kind was really to display very little feeling for the illustrious party to whom it referred. Such a course of proceeding, indeed, might terminate in the actual and perpetual separation of the father from his child. If this money was to be granted at all, it must clearly be granted in the way proposed; because to say that the father should have nothing to do with the child's education, and no control over the application of the money proposed to be given, would be a course that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should exceedingly regret to see the house adopt. At the same time, he had not the slightest objection, nor could his Majesty's government feel any, to incorporate into an act of parliament any word that should be thought to comprise the surest guarantee for the education of the child in England (hear).

Dr. Lushington: On a careful consideration of all that had passed in the debates of 1815 and 1818 about the Duke of Cumberland, he had come to a decided opinion, that on those occasions the House of Commons was, in all its views and proceedings, perfectly correct (hear). He trusted, therefore, that this house would not now retrace its steps, and by consenting to this allowance of 6,000*l.* a-year for the education of the young person in whose favour it was said to be called for, deny, in reality, the principles upon which they had formerly acted; and carry into effect a proposition which on two occasions they had so properly rejected (hear, hear). He ventured to say, that never had an occasion presented itself on which the feelings of the country were more completely in unison with those of the house than on those occasions. If this were so—if the house were not prepared to retrace its steps—if they were not about to make a grant upon entirely new principles, and for as entirely novel purposes, let them first consider what grounds of necessity were laid for this grant. And when that necessity should have been ascertained, let them take especial care that the resolution, and the act to be framed on that resolution, were expressed with sufficient clearness to carry into complete effect that which was now stated to be the real object of the resolution. And first as to the necessity for the grant (hear). He protested that on the present occasion he did not think any satisfactory ground of necessity had been laid by the rt. hon. gent. opposite. Not that he thought the sum itself was matter of any very serious consideration. But the precedent of such a grant was in itself a very dangerous one, and it might lead to consequences mischievous in the extreme. The duke of Cumberland had already allowances enough to discharge all these duties of education, if he were disposed to discharge them (hear). Now let the house inquire what the Duke of Cumberland had done to merit this grant. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house had not denied, that the Duke of Cumberland meant to take up his residence abroad (hear). But he had a duty to perform in England (hear, hear), both to his country, and as a father to his child. He ought to have endeavoured to perform it; he should have seen whether it was not possible to maintain and educate his son out of the means he already possessed, without resorting to the house for further means; he should have honestly attempted to make his income meet his expenses; and then, if, after an experiment of this kind, fairly and honorably made, if after doing all that lay in his power towards the education of his child, he had found it impossible to go on without additional assistance, he might have come to Parliament with a strong claim, not to say on its generosity, but on its justice (cheers). But the Duke of Cumberland still remained abroad; until he should have returned to this country—until he should have shown himself willing to discharge the duties that he was bound to discharge, he (Dr. Lushington) must think it would be premature to come to any vote at all. How came it, that the Duchess of Kent, with her 12,000*l.* a year, would be able to provide for her young daughter who was so near in succession to the throne, to maintain her rank and state on their present footing, and to provide all the education suitable to that daughter, while the Duke of Cumberland was incapable of managing the same duties with 19,800*l.* a year (hear, hear)? Surely here was a gross inconsistency at the outset. But let them suppose the Duke of Cumberland to have made out his case, and the house to have voted the money, in whom would be the management of the young prince, and of this sum (hear)? Would it be in the Duke of Cumberland or in the King? The rt. hon. the President of the Board of Control, had stated on a preceding evening, that the King was invested with the guardianship of grandsons in succession to the throne; if the King were entitled to have the control and education of the young Prince of Cumberland, of what absurdity was the house about to be guilty, in voting 6,000*l.* a-year to the Duke of Cumberland, for the professed purpose of exercising that management which the law confided to the King. They would thus be separating the duty from the consideration paid for its discharge. Let the house take the reverse of this statement. Suppose the King were not entitled to superintend this young Prince's education, would it not be proper to give His Majesty power to do so (hear, hear). When the rt. hon. gent. opposite refused to say whether the Duke of Cumberland was about to return to England or not, was it not high time that Parliament should strengthen the hands of the King, and give them something like the ability to control the education of this Prince? Whether by the existing law the King could or could not exert such control, it was obviously of the last importance that this grant should be so worded as to enable the King to exercise so salutary an authority. Upon these grounds he would propose as an amendment, that the words "His Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland" be omitted; and that at the conclusion of the resolution there should be added these words, "the United Kingdom" (hear). He could see no reason, if the house thought proper to pass this grant, why they should not secure, to the utmost, the fulfilment of their own intentions. On referring to the discussions about the Duke of Cumberland in the year 1818, he found that the late Marquis of Londonderry used these very expressions:—"that as to that vote of 6,000*l.* per annum to the Duke of Cumberland, which had been negatived in the year 1815, he did not consider that the opinion of Parliament had been sufficiently recorded by it" (hear, hear). Now, if the late Lord Londonderry thought that the opinion of Parliament was not sufficiently evidenced by the vote just referred to, he (Dr. Lushington) called upon hon. gent. seriously to consider whether the opinion of the house could be sufficiently recorded by the mere assertion of the hon. gent. opposite, as to the object of this resolution, and of which assertion, sincere as it undoubtedly was upon the lips of the rt. hon. gent., the rt. hon. gent. himself could not possibly undertake for the strict performance (hear, hear).

Mr. Creevey could neither assent to the original motion nor to the amendment. During the whole time he had sat in Parliament he had never witnessed so gross an outrage upon the public as the present attempt to take 6,000*l.* a year out of their pockets. The Duke of Cumberland had twice applied to Parliament, and he had been twice refused: and this was nothing less than a repetition of the attempt to get the same sum for him under false pretences. It was a gross and scandalous outrage upon the public. Six thousand a year for the education of a child six years old! Was ever such a thing heard of (hear, hear)? The grant to the Duchess of Kent was brought forward for no other purpose than that of making the grant to the Duke of Cumberland somewhat more palatable. The Duchess was no party to the present proposition, nor had she expressed any desire that such an application should be made. The real object of this proposition was to obtain from that house what they twice before deliberately refused; and it would be a lasting disgrace to the house, if they assented to it.

Sir G. Rose said, that having lived for some years so near to the person of the Duke of Cumberland as to enjoy perfect opportunities of ascertaining his character, and observing his conduct, he could not remain silent during the present debate. With respect to the absence of the Duke of Cumberland from England, that, it must be remembered, was in consequence of the treatment he had received here. It was impossible for any person to find himself the object of universal dislike, and to be commonly treated with disrespect, and even insult, which he knew were undeserved, but which he had no means of preventing, and yet still to subject himself to the constant repetition of the insults which were directed against him. His acquaintance with his Royal Highness had continued for about four years and a half. He had never known any man behave upon all occasions in a manner more becoming his station, or with greater kindness and consideration to all who were about him. During his residence at Berlin he had opportunities of constantly observing the Duke in his family, and he must say that he had never seen a more affectionate parent, and that the child, the subject of the resolution before the house, as far as from his age he was capable of manifesting it (a laugh), seemed to return that affection.

Sir W. Congreve said the Duke of Cumberland was remarkable punctual in the payment of his debts.

Mr. Alderman C. Smith supported the resolution, and complained of the cruel insinuations which had been made against his Royal Highness, and which he said had driven him from his native country.

Mr. Peel could not concur with the hon. gent. who regarded the resolution before the house as an attempt to redress an injustice which had formerly been done. The proposition came simply upon its own grounds, and so material a change had taken place, that the house could consistently agree to this, even though it were convinced that the grounds of its former refusal were correct. The way in which it had been put by a learned gent. opposite was, go thought, a fair one. First, was this vote necessary—and secondly, what was the proper mode of making it secure? The hon. member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) said, that every man was bound to educate his own children. As applied to private life this was quite true; but in the case now before the house, the interest the state had in this child made its education a matter of national importance; and since we thought fit to take upon ourselves the burden of that education, we had a right to require, if we saw reason, that it should be carried on in England. It had been insinuated that as the Duchess of Kent found her allowance of 12,000*l.* per annum sufficient, that of the Duke of Cumberland, amounting to 19,000*l.* was more than enough. But when this came to be more coolly considered, it would be seen that the situation of the Duchess, being a widow, and leading a retired life, was very different from that of a prince, who had a wife and family, and a station to keep up which his habits and his rank rendered necessarily much more expensive (hear). It was asked why the Duke of Cumberland did not come home; but when the manner in which his name had been introduced into the discussions of that house in the year 1818, and the allusions which had been then made (and which he believed were now regretted) to the person who stood in the relation of his Royal Highness's wife, were recollected, it would not be wondered at that he should choose to reside abroad. It was in every way proper that his Royal Highness's son should be educated in England, and the house ought to require some more valid security than the word of a minister for that purpose. To effect this, the best means would be by some proviso to be inserted in the bill, to be founded on the resolution recording the sense of the house. For the words in which it should be expressed he was indifferent, provided they did not imply that the Duke of Cumberland was not worthy to be intrusted with the education of his own son, but merely that it was thought expedient that one who might hereafter be the monarch of England should receive his education in that country, the destinies of which he might one day be called to direct (hear).

Mr. Brougham could not avoid explaining the grounds on which he had given his vote on a former evening. In the first place, the observation which had been made, that a father had a right to direct the education of his child in the way he thought best, was only true when that father paid for the education of the child. The difference between that case and the one now under discussion was so obvious, that he was sure he need say no more about it. With respect to the terms of the grant, all were agreed to-night; and this good, at least, had grown out of the former discussion. If the grant were really to be made, he should not object to those terms; but he was prepared to oppose it altogether; and in this opposition he hoped he should receive some support. He had been told that such applications were matters of ordinary practice. Now this was of too much consequence to be passed lightly over, since it might hereafter be reduced to a general rule, that as often as any Prince or Princess should be born, to any one connected with the Royal Family, the house should be called upon to provide 6000*l.* a-year. The last instance which there had been of such an application, was altogether different. It was made on behalf of the Duke of Gloucester, whose life had been invariably respectable, and who had never been in any pecuniary difficulties; but that was a prospective provision made in the life-time of the late Duke, and no additional sum had been asked on the birth of the present Duke, or of the Princess Sophia of Gloucester. Was the house now to turn over a new leaf, and to provide a large annual sum for the education of the child of a member of the Royal Family, whose income at present was 19,000*l.*, exclusive of the emoluments which he derived from his military and other appointments? He would put it to the house, therefore, whether they were now to understand, that immediately on the birth of a child to any Princess of the Royal Family, they were to be called upon for a grant of 6000*l.* a year? The case of the Duchess of Kent had been alluded to as a precedent, but it was only a part and parcel of the present case. He understood that the Duchess of Kent, to her infinite honour, and with the assistance of Prince Leopold, who contributed out of his large resources, had no intention of making any demand upon Parliament; and that in point of fact, no proposition had been made from them (hear, hear). It was unfair that the Duchess of Kent should thus be put in front of the request, as if it had originated with her, when it was known that she did not ask it. He reprobated the abuse of confidence manifested towards the people, when that grant was set down as necessary to support the dignity of the Royal Family.—But the sure way for the Royal Family to preserve its dignity, was by preserving the respect of the people. For these reasons he should oppose the grant on general views—for however unpopular a Prince might be, until he did something to stigmatize his own character, he was to be considered in his relation to the State, and respected accordingly—he should oppose the grant, because he was unwilling to give indirectly what he had refused directly. One word he had to say with respect to the education of the child. He should be the last man that could wish to tear the child from its parents; it would be a gross inconsistency in him if he were to attempt to recommend it; for he had objected to the measure of tearing the late Princess Charlotte from the parent to whom she had been most attached; and as he had objected to it in that case, so would he in the case of the child of the Duke of Cumberland (hear, hear).

Mr. Canning said, that the vote now proposed was not for the benefit of the Duke of Cumberland, nor had it reference to any former decision of the house. It merely contemplated the fact of his having a child, who was now at a period of life when it became necessary to provide for its education—a question in which this country ought to be considered as having an interest. The whole house, he was sure, would agree that the Duke of Cumberland's child—in consequence of his relation to the throne—ought to be provided for, and educated in England. It was plain that the people of this country had a right and an interest in looking after the education of the child, and providing that it should not be a foreign one. If the grant were made upon that ground, it would afterwards be at the option of the parent to return to England with this child or not, as he might think proper. By leaving him that option they would avoid the unkindness of interfering harshly. The whole case appeared to him to rest in a very few words; and as for the Duchess of Kent, he particularly wished that mention should not thus be made of her, because to become the subject of discussion, would be repugnant to that unobtrusive delicacy, which rendered her an ornament to her sex and station.

Sir F. Burdett said that when he came down to the house, he supposed that the only question which was to be decided, was whether or not the Duke of Cumberland should have 6000*l.* added to his income; or, in other words, whether that should be now done indirectly, which the house some years ago refused to do, when it was directly proposed to them. Had that been the case, he should have been placed in the situation of running the risk of incurring the disapprobation of the rt. hon. gent., who seemed to think that to advert to the character and conduct of the Royal Personage in question, if not absolutely unparliamentary, was, to say the least of it, highly improper. As, however, the question was placed altogether on a different footing, he felt greatly relieved; and was very much satisfied to find that he could do his duty to the people and to the country, without any invasion of those feelings, which, had the case been otherwise, he should have been called upon to disturb. It was probable that the proposers of this grant, perceiving the reluctance of the house to assent to it as directly to the Duke, had the discretion to change the tone of their application, and to alter the object to which the grant was to be applied. Whatever might be the cause of the change, the house were now told that the grant was required not for the purpose of putting so much money into the pocket of the Duke of Cumberland, but on public grounds, in order to insure a proper and a domestic education to a young Prince, who at some future period might possibly be called to the throne. Now he could not comprehend how it was possible that 6000*l.* a year could be required for such a purpose, for an infant six years old. Nothing could be more injurious to that infant, and nothing could in its consequences be more mischievous to the public, than to surround a child of that age with all the folly and expence which an income of 6000*l.* would furnish. Such a proceeding (and history bore out the assertion) was calculated more than any other to render him unfit for the throne, should future contingencies call upon him to fill it. If this royal child were in the country, the best education that could be given him was merely that which was usually given to the children of persons of rank. To surround him with a kind of little state would be so injurious, that he (Sir F. Burdett) would rather consent to let the money go into the pockets of the father, than that the child should be spoiled by such a course of education, and rendered unfit to exercise the regal function. As to the delicacy about removing the child from the guidance of his father, he thought that the nicety upon that point was a good deal over-rated. If the law gave the Crown a power over the education of the King's grandchildren, and the child in question was treated and provided for in the same way, he could not see how the father could object. He objected, however, more decidedly to the vote before the house, because it had been introduced under the mask of a similar vote to the Duchess of Kent, who neither asked for such a grant nor needed it. In his opinion, the best course would be to negative the vote altogether.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that with reference to the Duchess of Kent, a question had been put to the late Lord Londonderry, immediately on his Royal Highness the Duke's death, whether it was proposed to make any addition to the income of the Duchess. The reply then given was, that at the time it was not considered necessary, as the Duchess was assisted by her Royal brother; but such a state of things, the house must perceive, could never have been contemplated as permanent.

Mr. Brougham rose, amidst loud cries of question, to suggest whether it would not be better for his learned friend (Dr. Lushington) to withdraw his amendment, and let the question be put at once to negative the grant. He suggested this, because he took all parties to be agreed as to the necessity of the education being in England, if the vote were carried.

The house then divided, when the numbers were—For the grant, 130—Against it, 97—Majority, 23.

While strangers were excluded.

Mr. Brougham gave notice to the house, that on the constitutional grounds which he had stated as well as because he perceived a disposition in the house to take advantage of a temporary and accidental coolness on the part of the people respecting questions of economy, and a tendency to spend the people's money as if they were never more to be in want of it, he should continue to give the measure his strenuous opposition (loud cheers).

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the second reading of the Duchess of Kent's annuity bill.

Mr. Lylester did not object to the substance, but to the manner and form of this bill. The Duchess of Kent had been spoken of during this debate, and he made no doubt, with the utmost justice and propriety, as a most exemplary and meritorious woman; in short, in the most respectful and honourable terms. But the bill itself, in that case, seemed wanting in respect to her Royal Highness. If it were as respectful as it should be, it would have given 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* a year to her Royal Highness, and 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* a year to the royal infant. It was, in fact, quite clear, under the circumstances, that after all, 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* of this vote, was intended for her Royal Highness; but why was not this acknowledged and rendered apparent on the face of the bill? Why was not so proper an object effected openly and undisguisedly (hear)?

The question was then put from the chair; and the second reading was agreed to without a division.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved the second reading of the Duke of Cumberland's annuity bill.

There being several dissentient voices on the proposition being put by the Speaker, a division took place, when the numbers were—For the second reading—Ayes, 59—Noes, 49—Majority, 11.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day for the house resuming itself into a committee of the whole house on the Duke of Cumberland's Annuity Bill.

On the motion "that the Speaker do leave the chair,"

Mr. Brougham rose to propose an amendment which rested on grounds so simple, so obvious, so evident, that it only required to be stated in the shortest possible way. They were not now called on to object to this grant, or to agree to it, on account of the adequacy or inadequacy of what was formerly voted (hear). The question stood upon its own substantive merits; those who thought the former grant too little, were not precluded from increasing it now, in consequence of the vote given on a previous occasion. But the mode at present taken to effect that object was one of which he never could approve. The liberal, frank, candid, and honest way of proceeding was, to move distinctly for an alteration of the former vote (hear, hear). No attempt had hitherto been made to alter that vote of the house. If any gentleman thought it an improper vote, why not move that it should be rescinded (hear)? If any member were of that opinion, let him, in God's name, stand up and say so (hear). He did not believe there was a gentleman in the house who entertained any such opinion (hear). But he would say, let no man now vote for the Duke of Cumberland, by a side wind, in opposition to his former vote (hear). Let him not, by voting a grant for the child of the Duke of Cumberland, negative his former vote, and make a provision for the Duke of Cumberland himself (hear). He felt he should be wanting in the duty he owed to that house, to himself, and to his country, if he did not, on this occasion, and on all future occasions, express these sentiments. He should, therefore, move—"That all the words of the original motion, after the word 'that' be omitted, for the purpose of inserting the following words—'this house will, on this day six months, resolve itself into the said committee'" (hear).

Mr. Coke thought it was most preposterous to come down to the house and demand an annuity of 6,000*l.* for the Duke of Cumberland's child, when it was quite evident that the grant was intended for the Duke himself (hear, hear). He looked upon this proposition as a direct insult on the house and the country (hear, hear).

Mr. H. Sumner opposed the grant. In doing so, he must say, that he felt a great degree of delicacy, because he was actuated by motives which he was under the necessity of withholding from the house—motives, the grounds of which he could not, with propriety, develop to those whom he now addressed: 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* a-year would be sufficient to have the young prince properly lodged and educated.

Mr. J. Bennett congratulated the house and the country on the burst of indignation which this grant had excited from the other side of the house. When he saw gentlemen of different political sentiments uniting on a question of this nature, it excited some doubt in his mind as to the necessity for parliamentary reform.

Sir G. Warrender said, that the Duke of Cumberland was very hardly dealt with. Much obloquy appeared to be levelled at this royal duke. But from the observations which he had had an opportunity of making, he owed it to himself and the country to declare that gross injustice had been done that royal personage, and that the accusations which had been scattered about, and in distant parts of the country too, had no foundation whatever. The duke and duchess were at present enjoying a degree of domestic happiness and comfort (a loud laugh) which few individuals could boast of (hear, hear). In depriving the Duke of Cumberland of this grant, they drew a most unpleasant distinction between him and the other royal dukes. He would contend, that a grant of this kind ought not to proceed on the individual merits of the party. They should recollect the lofty situation to which he was born—they should consider the necessity of providing for him and his family in a manner befitting that situation; and, considering these circumstances, he was prepared to say, that it was the duty of the house to accede to this proposition. The income which the Duke of Cumberland received was quite inadequate to the expenses of his establishment. Numerous applications were daily made to him, and large sums were annually expended in charity. He would ask, was it, or was it not, desirable, that a young prince, who was likely to come to the throne of England, should be properly educated? Would the house, from any feeling of irritation, prevent him from being educated here under the eye of his father? He was sure it was not in accordance with the generous feelings of the House of Commons to separate a father from his child. Would they teach the young prince, as his first lesson, that it was his duty to remain separated from his parents? He thought they would not. He thought they would make the necessary provision for the education of the child under the eye of the father. In stating this, he had only discharged the duty which he owed to the country, to the house, and to the royal family.

Sir J. Sebright had been informed that the Duchess of Cumberland received 3,000*l.* a-year from the King of Prussia. This, together with the income which was derived from this country, appeared to him to be amply sufficient for the establishment of the royal duke. It was very painful to say any thing that might appear disrespectful towards the royal duke; but it was a well-known fact, that a man could not go into society, of any kind in this country, without hearing remarks on the conduct of that royal personage. However attached gentlemen might be to the royal family, that attachment could not excuse an absolute waste of the public money. It was a waste, not only bad in itself, but it became worse under the peculiar circumstances of the case (hear). The royal duke appeared before them like a man applying for relief to a body of country magistrates—like an individual who requested the parish, in forma pauperis, to enable him to maintain his own child (hear).

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was not on the ground that the Duke of Cumberland was inadequately provided for on a former occasion that he had deemed it necessary to introduce this Bill. If the circumstances of the case were, at present, the same as those which existed when the former vote was proposed, then any proposition to grant the royal duke that which had been refused on two previous occasions, might have justified the harsh language which had been indulged in by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Coke) and reiterated by the hon. member for Hertfordshire (Sir J. Sebright). But the case was entirely altered. Parliament had given to the royal brothers of the Duke of Cumberland, a certain annual income on account of their marriage, and in the expectation that they would have families. A like allowance was refused to the Duke of Cumberland. Since that period the Duke of Cambridge had had two children, and yet he had not asked for any increase of income; because the 24,000*l.* per annum which was granted to him was considered to be sufficient. The Duke of Cumberland having now a son, naturally wished to be placed in the same situation as his royal brothers. It would not be a proper mode of proceeding if ministers came down to parliament and asked for a grant of this description, merely on account of individual character (hear, hear). He thought it was proper, on account of their exalted rank, that those royal personages should be placed on the same footing; and it would be an act of gross disrespect, if the House of Commons said, "We call on your Majesty to treat two of your royal brothers with particular marks of esteem, and to cast a reflection on the third (hear)." Although the hon. member for Hertfordshire did not place his opposition altogether on the ground of the personal character of the Duke of Cumberland, yet his hon. friend the member for Surrey (Mr. H. Sumner) had done so. Now, amidst all the hints and insinuations which had, from time to time, been thrown out on this subject, he never had been able, for the soul of him, to discover on what point it was that gentlemen really founded their opposition (hear). He could perceive no circumstance which could induce the house to refuse this grant, which might not also be put forward as an argument for depriving the Duke of Cumberland of that income which he at present enjoyed; or which might not be made a ground for reducing the grants which had been voted to the Dukes of Clarence and Cambridge.

Mr. T. Wilson declared he would vote for the grant, on the ground of his entire confidence in the Government.

The house then divided, when the numbers were—

For the amendment, 113—Against it, 143—Majority, 30.

In the committee on the bill,

Mr. Brougham said there was upon the face of the bill an evident inconsistency, inasmuch as it pretended to have one object, and proceeded to accomplish another. It proposed to provide for the education of the Prince of Cumberland, and it secured an annuity of 6000*l.* to the Duke of Cumberland for his life. The bill said nothing of the life of the young prince. The hon. bart. (Sir C. Forbes), who had addressed the house at a period when, of all others, it was most convenient for those who favoured the Duke of Cumberland to express their opinions (the hon. bart. spoke after the gallery had been cleared, and before the division took place), had thought that even this was not doing the Duke justice. Perhaps he would wish to make up for the cesser of so many years by increasing the annuity to 12,000*l.* The Duke, he had no doubt, would, without hesitation, accept the hon. bart.'s generous offer. But the ministers were not affected by the enthusiasm which had so far led away the hon. baronet. They proposed that the annuity should only be paid henceforth. There was a provision in the second clause, which limited the payment of the grant to the Duke on condition that the Prince should live in England during the period of his education, unless the King should give him licence to reside abroad. He, however, wished to put the business upon a fair and intelligible ground, and to give to the committee an opportunity of doing properly and fairly that which it was pretended this bill was to accomplish. If there was any man in the house who thought that the income of the Duke of Cumberland did not permit him to educate his son in a proper manner, and at his own expense, he (Mr. Brougham), whatever might be his own notion on the subject, would say then, give the Duke the means of educating his son, but let it be upon such terms as shall ensure to the people that their money is laid out for the purpose for which they have granted it. Give to the King, to whom every member of the royal family must be an object of the nearest interest, the power of directing the application of the sum which is voted for this purpose. Let that sum be quite ample, nay, more than enough, for the education of this very young prince. Let this little boy of six years old have 3000*l.* per annum devoted to the payment of his education, but let the King have the care of seeing that this sum be wisely and properly laid out. Thus the committee would do what they pretended. They would enable the prince to be educated, and they would provide a proper authority—that of the King—to superintend his education. Over the ministers, who were responsible for the King's acts, the house would have some control, while they had none over the Duke of Cumberland, who resided abroad and was irresponsible. If this were not a direct and liberal course of proceeding, he did not know what could be called so. It had besides this recommendation, that those who thought with him might agree to it, while those who thought that the son of the Duke of Cumberland ought to be educated at the public expense, would be enabled to give effect to that opinion without violating any constitutional principle. He would therefore move, as an amendment in the bill now before the committee, that the sum to be granted for the education of the Prince of Cumberland, son of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, should be reduced from 6000*l.* to 3000*l.* per annum, and that it should be paid to the King instead of to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland.

Sir C. Forbes said, that what he had to address to the house on this subject he was more desirous of saying to the house than to the newspapers (a laugh). He appealed to the house whether, if this mode were generally adopted, there would not be shorter speeches, and the business would be sooner and more satisfactorily disposed of. He repeated, however, that the arrears from the time when the house refused the grant, ought to be paid up.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that when he had stated at the commencement of this subject that it was bona fide the intention of Government that the Prince of Cumberland should be educated in England, as he had no intention, whatever the learned gent. might think, to grant, by means of a side wind, an annuity to the Duke of Cumberland, it would not be inconsistent with the intention he had then expressed to confine the proposed grant to the minority of the prince (hear). But it was impossible for him to agree that the prince's education should be under the control of the King instead of his father. It could not be imposed as a condition to the grant that the father should have no interference in a matter of such deep interest to him. It were better not to give it at all (hear, hear). With regard to the proposition that 3000*l.* should be granted instead of 6000*l.*, he was quite aware how difficult it must be to demonstrate to the house that 6000*l.* were necessary for the education of the prince (a laugh, and cries of hear), and so it must be as to any other sum. If the prince were to be educated in England, and his parents resided abroad, he would sometimes go to visit them. It could not be the wish of the house that the grant should be so small as not to allow the possibility of such a visit. He had, as he had stated, no objection to confine the grant to the minority of the prince; but he could never consent to deprive the Duke of Cumberland of that natural and lawful right which he possessed, of directing the education of his own children (hear).

Mr. Brougham said he was somewhat surprised at the objections of the rt. hon. gent. to the proposition of giving to the King the superintendence of the education of the Prince of Cumberland. It was no more than the law had already given to him. As the chief of the royal family, he was entitled to the care of those who were hereafter, it might be, to become the heirs to his throne: this had been held to be the law by the decision of ten out of the twelve Judges, in the time of George I.h., and that decision had been acted upon. The late King interfered upon this ground with the education of the late Princess Charlotte; and his present majesty had, at a subsequent period, insisted upon exercising the same power on the authority of this very case, which was opposed to the ordinary principle of law. The avowed object of this grant was, that an adequate, nay, a splendid provision should be made for the education of the prince, in such a manner as suited his rank and the probability of his one day filling the throne of this country. That object could not be accomplished in a manner more regular, more constitutional, and more safe, than was now proposed, by giving the money which was destined for this purpose into responsible instead of irresponsible hands—by giving it to the ministers of the country (for giving it to the King was to make them answerable for its application), who could not divert one shilling of it from its proper purpose. Those ministers could not devote it to the payment of the debts which the Duke of Cumberland might owe; but they would be answerable with their heads for the honest application of it to the purpose for which it was intrusted to them. Was not this a more safe, consistent, and constitutional means, than that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked the house to adopt, and by which the money must fall into the hands of the Duke of Cumberland, who was living abroad, and who, when once he had obtained possession of it, might do whatever he would with it.

Mr. Canning said, the amendment of the learned gent. and his speech, had three parts. The first was to limit the grant for the life of the young prince; the second, was to give the sum to the Crown; and the third, to reduce it by one-half. His rt. hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had stated, with regard to the first of these subjects, that he was prepared to introduce some words, which would confine the grant for the life of the young prince. But, with regard to the other two, though it was not possible to accede to them, it was difficult to find arguments against them. They were grounded on a degrading want of confidence in the Duke. It was a question of feeling, and depended on an opinion of character; for nothing explicit had been stated. Those members who were of the same opinion as Ministers—that this measure ought to pass, supported their opinion by the confidence they placed in his Royal Highness. Those Members, on the other hand, who entertained some undefined suspicions, would give effect to those suspicions by their vote. But it was not to be expected that those who avowed no such distrust of the Duke of Cumberland—nay, more than distrust, dislike—nay, more than dislike—persecuting detestation, should conform to the opinions of others (hear, hear). What might be the grounds for those hostile feelings he could not pretend to say, but those who voted for taking the education of the son out of the hands of his father, and for diminishing the amount of the allowance, furnished no test which would enable others to decide on the justice of their suspicions. The justice of those suspicions was not a fit subject for discussion here. Every man must act as he pleased, and it was in vain to attempt to combat by argument what had not been fairly brought forward as substantial objection. Beyond the concessions which the Government had already made it was impossible to go. His Majesty's ministers had no right to inflict an opprobrium on the Duke of Cumberland, which, if he could have deserved, they would have forgotten their duty to the country in bringing his name before the house (hear, hear).

The house then divided, when the numbers were—For the amendment, 114—Against it, 152—Majority. 33.

The Speaker rang again in the chair.

Mr. Brougham rose just to submit, that whatever might be the case with respect to the decisions of the house, it would be no breach of privilege to comment upon the conduct of a committee. Then, having a right to observe on what had passed, he felt himself bound to declare, that there never had been a vote in his opinion passed by any committee less calculated to raise that committee in the estimation of the country, than that which had been just declared. For it was nonsense to talk of this grant being made to the Prince of Cumberland—it was a gift directly to the Duke—an allowance, not of 6000*l.* annually for the education of the son, but of 5000*l.* annually for the expenses of the father. This was the true state of the transaction, and the only light in which the people of England would look at it. They would learn that a committee of the House of Commons, with its eyes fully opened by discussion, had, in its deep respect for the Duke of Cumberland—in its esteem for his high public and private character—an esteem, no doubt, perfectly well grounded, but which they themselves did not entirely share—preferred granting that illustrious prince 6000*l.* a-year—that was to say, 5000*l.* for his own use, and perhaps 1000*l.* for the education of his son—to giving him 3000*l.* a-year only, which, after paying for that same education, would have added 3000*l.* a-year to his existing lacombe. He wished the committee joy of its vote with all his heart; and he hoped that the members would live long—that was to say, the rest of the present session, and all the next—to take the benefit of it. When, at the expiration of that time, too, they returned to their constituents (hear, and great laughter)—he hoped that they would still further reap the fruits of their glorious triumph that evening, over constitutional principle, common sense, consistency, and honest, plain, direct, and manly feeling. One word more only, upon what had fallen from a rt. hon. gent. opposite, who, in the warmth of his eloquence, and the weakness of his case, had said something about a feeling of persecuting detestation, on his (Mr. Brougham's) side the house, towards the Duke of Cumberland. He (Mr. B.) disclaimed any acquaintance with, or personal animosity against the royal Duke, and begged to add, that his Royal Highness had so completely altered his feeling towards the Whigs, and had shown so much courtesy to several gentlemen distinctly introduced to him as of the Opposition party; that there were hon. members sitting round him (Mr. Brougham), who actually felt a doubt how far, if any personal question arose with respect to the Duke of Cumberland, they could, pleasantly, take part in it. From a sense of public duty, therefore, it was, and certainly not from any private reason, that he opposed the vote before the house; thinking, as he did, in his conscience, that it was the most absolute and unjustifiable job that he had ever seen attempted. In case the house should still feel inclined to take a more prudent course than it was now proceeding in, and to grant the 3000*l.* a-year, subject to the control of Ministers, he now gave notice that, on the coming up of the report, he would move an amendment to that effect. In saying this, however, he desired distinctly to add, that he considered the vote as unnecessary altogether, and that he should certainly oppose it in toto, in all the other stages through which it had to pass.

Mr. T. Wilson complained that the hon. member for Winchester acted unhandsomely in throwing dirt at the committee. If he thought that that hon. and learned member, or those who sat with him, monopolized all the talent and patriotism of the house, he might perhaps feel inclined to pay attention to them; but as it was, he felt perfectly justified in the vote which he had given.

Mr. Brougham protested that in what he had said he had no way alluded to the hon. member, who he did firmly believe to be the most wise and patriotic member of the side of the house on which he sat.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day for the bringing up of the report on the Duke of Cumberland's annuity bill.

The question having been put,

Mr. Brougham objected to the bringing forward of the measure at so late an hour, as it then was; 11 at night; and

Mr. Warre moved, as an amendment, that the report be received this day six months.

Mr. Brougham said he had heard a report, that in certain alterations to be made to the palace of Buckingham-house, it was intended to encroach upon the rights and enjoyments of the public, by making a road through the Green

Park, instead of that at present leading up Constitution-hill, and that the intervening space was to be added to the gardens of Buckingham-house. He took this opportunity of asking the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether these proposed alterations were really to be carried into effect?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer assured the hon. gent. that there was not, nor had ever been, the remotest intention of encroaching upon the Green-park.

The house then divided, when the numbers were—For the amendment, 60; against it, 106—Majority against it, 46.

Mr. Brougham then proposed, that the discussion on the next stage of this bill should commence at an early hour to-morrow. He recommended all gentlemen who were present, and thought with him, to renew their opposition in every stage of the bill; and he besought them to use their several influences with all who now happened to be absent. He did not consider the present defeat as any reason for being dispirited; for he reminded them, that on the former occasion, when this obnoxious measure (now a thousand times more objectionable, because then it was openly proposed, and now it was insidiously attempted to be carried by a side-wind) was brought forward, it had been unsuccessfully opposed time after time, and had yet been thrown out in its very last stage.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he was quite willing that the debate should commence as early as the learned gent. proposed.

The report was then received, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved, that the Duke of Cumberland's Annuity-bill be read a third time,

The Marquis of Tavistock could not refrain from taking this, the last opportunity which could present itself, of rising to state to the house, as shortly as possible, the grounds on which he objected to the grant which the present bill comprehended. He objected to it, first, on the ground that it was more than was necessary for the purpose to which it was proposed to be applied; secondly, on the ground that it would establish a very bad precedent; and lastly, and most strongly, on the ground that it was asked for on the most false and indirect pretences. In the first place, he called on the rt. hon. gent. to say, whether he really believed that the whole, or any thing near the whole of the grant would be required for the purpose which had been stated? If the rt. hon. gent. would lay his hand upon his heart, and say, that such was his belief, he should be satisfied that the money would be so applied, although he should still think it a most extravagant expense for such a purpose. But, he was quite sure, the rt. hon. gent. would say no such thing. Although he had not the honour of being personally known to the rt. hon. gent., he had much too high an opinion of his integrity to believe that he would say so. Nothing could be farther from his wish than to cast on him the slightest imputation. On the contrary, it was because he entertained the highest respect for his character that he was sincerely sorry he did not come down to parliament on this occasion, in his usual straight forward way, and ask the house at once to make an addition of 6,000*l.* to the Duke of Cumberland's income. Had the rt. hon. gent. boldly and manfully taken that course, he should not have objected to the proposition. For he had not heard of any direct charge against his Royal Highness. And although he feared it was very true that, some how or other, his Royal Highness had contrived to forfeit the good opinion of a large portion of the people of this country, yet, whatever might be the cause of that displeasure, his Royal Highness seemed to him (the Marquis of Tavistock) to have been sufficiently punished. But, although he should not have objected to the grant, had it been directly proposed as a grant to the Duke of Cumberland, he disliked extremely to be asked for money for one purpose, when he was very sure that it was to be applied to another (hear, hear). Such a proceeding he considered indirect and dishonest. It was a proceeding of which, in private life, he was convinced the rt. hon. gent. would be incapable. But he had another objection to the grant. It seemed to him, that by giving so large a sum for the education of so young a child, they were establishing a precedent that might be attended with great public inconvenience (hear, hear). He must apologize to the house for thus trespassing on their attention (hear, hear), but entertaining so strong an opinion as he did on the subject, he could not satisfy himself without expressing it. Some time had elapsed since he had been able to vote or to take any part in the proceedings of parliament, but he was anxious to declare, that, in the interval, he had witnessed with sincere and unmixed pleasure, the improved system in which His Majesty's government had been proceeding, and more especially the wise, liberal, and conciliatory doctrines which had been maintained by the rt. hon. gent., as well as by the rt. hon. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (hear, hear). He could not, therefore, but express the astonishment which he felt in common with many other members of that house that those rt. hon. gentlemen should risk the good name and the great popularity which they had justly acquired, by consenting to become parties to such a juggle as that under consideration (hear, hear). He thought that His Majesty's ministers were too honest for such a job as this (hear, hear); and he could not sit down without returning his sincere thanks to his learned friend, the member for Winchester, for the persevering opposition which he had made to the measure (hear, hear).

General Palmer was one of those who, in the former instance, had supported the motion for the same increased allowance to the Duke of Cumberland as had been voted to his brothers, and he had always considered the rejection of that measure an act of injustice to his Royal Highness, and an insult to the honour and feelings of the crown. It was, therefore, solely upon that ground that he must vote for the present bill, condemning it in all other respects. He declared his conviction, that the only real enemies of the crown were its own ministers. Had they only renewed the present bill in its former shape, with the simple statement that his Royal Highness, after ten years' absence, was desirous of returning to England with his family, in the only way that, consistently with his honour and interest, he could return—viz. by being placed upon the same footing as the other branches of the crown—the present objections to the bill would not have existed; instead of which, ministers, in place of a grant of 6000*l.* to the only party wishing it, called upon parliament for double the amount, for reasons false in themselves, or which, if true, were revolting to the sense and feelings of the people, and humiliating to all the parties brought forward, excepting that illustrious female, whose exemplary conduct had gained her the esteem of the country. But his chief object in addressing the house, was to defend the individual whose personal character had been the sole ground of opposition to the grant in a former instance. As to his politics, was it unnatural that, born and educated at court, with a bishop for his tutor, he should be a tory in his principles, and, like all other tories, whatever they might pretend, an enemy to civil and religious liberty? But in private life, he knew, and would answer for the fact, that his Royal Highness was in all respects a manly, open, honourable character—a most kind and affectionate husband;—farther, that he was neither a spendthrift nor a gambler; but from the liberality of his nature, had been led into difficulties which had compelled him to reduce his establishment and to live abroad, because the House of Commons, in the exercise of its discretion, had withheld that assistance which would have prevented the necessity.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer felt much gratified at the good opinion which the noble marquis opposite was pleased to entertain of his character. He must still, however, declare, that the only ground on which His Majesty's government were induced to advise His Majesty to send a message to that house, recommending a farther grant to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, was to afford means for the proper education of the young prince, his son. If that son had not been born, the recommendation for an additional grant would never have been made. But His Majesty's government felt that as parliament granted to his royal brothers an addition of 6000*l.* a year on their marriage, without any reference to the contingency of their having children or not, and that as the Duke of Cumberland had now a son, it was not unreasonable to furnish his Royal Highness with the means of giving that son the education in this country which, standing as he did in relation to the throne, it was natural for the people of this country to expect that he should receive. His Majesty's government also felt, that if it should prove conformable to the feelings of the Duke of Cumberland, and of his royal consort, to accompany their son to England, it would be exceedingly unjust under such circumstances to leave his Royal Highness under less favourable circumstances in point of income than his royal brothers. On those grounds he certainly thought, and, notwithstanding all that had been said on the subject, he still thought, that in making the proposition which he had made to the house, he did not do any thing unworthy of an honest man (hear, hear).

Mr. Tierney could not allow this bill to go through its last stage without explaining the reasons which influenced him in the vote he was about to give. He begged the house to understand that, in the first place, he put entirely out of his mind all that had formerly passed with respect to his Royal Highness. If his Royal Highness had experienced the greatest and most affectionate attachment from that house, he should still have opposed the present proposition, because he thought it founded on an erroneous principle, and calculated to furnish a mischievous precedent. Let the house consider how this bill had been introduced. He did not mean to impute any thing unfair to his Majesty's Government; but his Majesty's message, while it stated the education of the two royal children as calling for the assistance of parliament, omitted to mention the death of the father of one of them, and the consequent want of a proper provision, which was, indeed, an abundant cause why for that child a parliamentary provision ought to be made. That her royal highness the Princess Alexandrina Victoria of Kent had not required such a provision up to her present age of six years, had been owing solely to the liberality of her royal uncle, the Prince of Saxe-Coburg. It now, however, became necessary, that a parliamentary provision should be made for that royal infant; and to the grant for that purpose no objection was made by the house. But then came the consideration of the grant for the other child, which was altogether a different matter. They were now called upon to admit that the child of a younger branch of the royal family, four degrees from the crown, was entitled to apply to parliament for a provision; and that that provision should be 6000*l.* a year. He did not impute to the rt. hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer any mis-statement of his intentions. He believed he meant that grant not for the Duke of Cumberland, but for the Duke of Cumberland's child. That was his (Mr. T's.) objection to it. He objected to any grant, and still more to such a grant to a royal child under such circumstances. But he objected to the bill on various other grounds. In the first place no similar bill that he ever heard of for making a grant to any member of the royal family, was ever couched in such terms. Every other bill of the kind, founded on a message from the crown, recited that message in the preamble, in order that posterity might know on what it was founded. There was nothing of the sort in the bill before them. All they found in the preamble of the bill, was a declaration that it was expedient to make a provision for the honourable support and education of the son of the Duke of Cumberland. He denied that expediency. It was never thought expedient to make provision for any other branch of the royal family at so early an age. No application was made to parliament to provide for any of the royal dukes at so early an age. No parliamentary provision was made for the Duke of Sussex until he was 29; for the Duke of Cambridge until he was 23; for the Duke of Kent until he was 33; or for the Duke of Cumberland until he was 28. Then why were they to be called upon to declare that it was expedient to make a provision, and a provision of 6000*l.* for this little prince? They must always bear in mind, that the question was greatly narrowed by the assertions of his Majesty's Government. The proposed grant had no reference whatever to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland; it was solely and exclusively a provision for his child. Now, it was impossible that that child could need 6000*l.* a year. If it did, the fact ought to be stated in the preamble of the bill, and it ought also to be set forth, that its royal parents had no means of providing for it. Although in the first instance he was caught by a notion of the propriety of educating the young prince in England, he was, on further consideration, not very anxious to see him brought here. It appeared to him to be a cruel operation thus to tear a child from its parents. And for what purpose?—They all recollected that his late Majesty, whose memory they cherished with so much affection and veneration, so far from thinking it necessary to bring his sons from Germany, actually sent them to Germany (a laugh). Now, what mischief did that do? He could understand the principle on which it might be considered dangerous that an English prince should remain on the continent, when of an age capable of forming political opinions, lest he should be inoculated with all the vile doctrines of the holy alliance; but why he might not be permitted to remain in Germany until that period—why he might not be permitted to remain there, until he was twelve years old, for instance, was beyond his comprehension. Without any good reason assigned, therefore, they were called upon to make this provision. The terms of the bill were also well worth considering. In all similar grants—in all the grants to the present Princess, his Majesty had been enabled by warrant to direct issues to the amount of 12,000*l.* a year during his Majesty's royal will and pleasure. But here the money was to be paid by virtue of special letters patent; and there was nothing of his Majesty's royal will and pleasure in the case. Why was his Majesty to have nothing to do with it? Why was the right to this money to be vested by letters patent in the Duke of Cumberland, subject to no control on the part of his Majesty, who ought to be considered as the father of his family? But, it was said that this particular provision of the grant was to be null and void unless his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland should consent to reside in this country. He (Mr. T.) did not believe that his royal highness would refuse to do so. But what a shabby figure they made of him, when they supposed that the security they had for his residence here was the receipt of this 6000*l.* a year, instead of any constitutional anxiety for the education of the young prince in England! And if they did this, why did they not go on? Why did they not take from the Duke of Cambridge his child, and educate him? But it was clear that this was only a pretext for the measure. Again, however, he asked, why not make this grant as all former grants were made, to his Majesty, in the first instance, and subject to his royal will and pleasure? The rt. hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, such a proceeding would be cruel and degrading to the Duke of Cumberland. There was a strong case nevertheless in point; that of the late Princess Charlotte. When, in the year 1806, the princess received an addition to their incomes of 6000*l.* a year, in the form of a grant to his Majesty, enabling him by warrant to issue to them that sum during his royal will and pleasure, another grant of 7000*l.* a year was made to his Majesty, enabling him by warrant to issue to her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte that sum during his royal will and pleasure, and during his life, and that of his present Majesty, then Prince of Wales. His present Majesty never considered himself to be used cruelly, or to be degraded by such a proceeding. Let the same be done in the present case, and there would be an end to a great part of the difficulty which he now felt in acceding to the proposition before the house. Let them secure to his Majesty, under the superintendence of his responsible advisers, the disposal of this money, and most of his (Mr. T'a.) objections would cease. But as the bill now stood, he defied any hon. member to lay his hand on his heart and say it ought to pass, (hear).

Mr. Canning said, that among the topics introduced by the rt. hon. gent. who had spoken last, he had principally dwelt upon the form of the bill, and complained that it left His Majesty without that control over the application of the money, which had been established in all former grants to the Royal Family (hear). He denied that the rt. hon. gent. had put a fair construction upon the meaning of the bill, for he (Mr. Canning) apprehended that, as the bill was drawn, the house had a sufficient guarantee for the due application of the money to the purpose for which they intended it. For it was provided that two things should be ascertained before a single payment was made by virtue of the bill: first, whether it pleased his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland to reside with his family in England, and superintend in person the education of the young prince; for in that case there was no doubt the money was intended immediately to pass into the hands of the Royal Duke: But, supposing it did not please the Duke of Cumberland to take up his residence in England,—and really upon that point his Majesty's government were at present without any information, and there, perhaps it would be said, they ought to have waited to ascertain that fact in the first instance, before they proposed the grant, (hear)—but, suppose the duke should still remain abroad, then unquestionably it would be the duty of his Majesty's Government, before they issued the money, to take upon their own responsibility such steps as would ensure the application of it according to the conditions upon which the grant was made. So that in either alternative the house had the assurance that their intentions could not be frustrated. Why it now pleased the Duke of Cumberland to select a foreign residence, it was not their province to inquire; and while, on the one hand, it would be harsh to make this grant the positive condition of his return, so on the other they had every chance of tempting him to reside in this country. But in any view of the subject, whether he resided here or not, still they secured a British education for a British prince (hear, hear). Indeed, the rt. hon. gent. himself (Mr. Tierney) admitted that he was first struck with the propriety of securing such an object, though he had afterwards altered his opinion: so that the only difference between the rt. hon. gent. and his Majesty's ministers was this—that they maintained the opinions they had set out with, consistently, while the rt. hon. gent. had abandoned his (a laugh). The Government thought the young prince should be brought up here in England, and recorded that opinion in the bill. In looking at the subject merely in a pecuniary view, the house would see that the Duke of Cumberland would not obtain much benefit when they considered the great additional expense which would be entailed upon his Royal Highness by the removal of his residence to this country, or by the arrangements here for the education of his child. Whether the whole of this money would be pound by pound applied to the education of the Prince in the first year, or in the second year, he was not prepared to say; but as the grant was intended by his Majesty's Ministers to cover the public allowance for the whole minority of the Prince of Cumberland, he thought it no more than a fair average sum of the actual expenses of such a personage until he had attained his full maturity (hear). This was the more respectful and delicate course—to come at once with the general sum which was adequate to the general purpose, and not year after year be recurring to Parliament for fresh supplies to meet a growing expenditure in the Royal Family. He knew not why such a proposal should be stigmatized by the epithets of being dishonest, uncalled for, and unconstitutional. No man could deny the principle, that it was proper to have a British prince educated at home. Neither could it be asserted that, covering the whole minority, the proposed grant was more than enough for carrying that principle into effect. He denied the application of the rt. hon. gent.'s precedents to the case before the house. The younger branches of the Royal Family, in the last reign, were living under the same roof with their father, and were in immediate succession to the Crown. That made an essential difference in the cases. All the other royal brothers had sufficient means of maintenance, and the Duke of Cumberland was the only one to whom the house denied the means of defraying his own expenses, or of providing for his children. When motives were imputed, he could do no more than merely deny them. He was conscious of no such motives as had been attributed to those who brought forward and supported this measure. When the proposition was stated to him, it appeared fair and reasonable. The object of educating the young prince in England appeared to him of the highest national importance, and to forward that object of national importance they were providing the means, in as unexceptionable a manner as the difficulties of the case would permit.

Mr. Brougham gave the rt. hon. gent. opposite entire credit for their declarations that they were on this occasion uninfluenced by sinister motives: and it was due to them to say, that they had at length put this question upon its fair issue, and had frankly avowed that the only reason for conferring this grant upon the Duke of Cumberland, was because his Royal Highness had not obtained the 6,000*l.* a-year before (hear). In other words, that the object in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been frustrated in the years 1815 and 1816, was to be carried into execution in the year 1825. But though the ministers said this, the bill did not, for the bill said the money was to be given for the education of the child; and, said the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Canning), the ministers will take care and see the money so applied as to ensure the fulfilment of the object. But he differed with the rt. hon. gent. as to the power he thought he would possess over this bill when it passed through Parliament; he differed from him as to the construction of the law: and was sure his view would be sustained by the Crown lawyers and the Lord Chancellor, were the case referred to them as the legal advisers of the Crown. The act of Parliament was imperative; and from the moment it passed, the money became as of right invested in the Duke of Cumberland. It would be then too late to negotiate about its due application to any other purpose than that to which it should please his Royal Highness to appropriate it (hear). The right hon. gent. would recollect, that in a late bill, in which, not as in this, it was not their lot to differ, but one in which they had a fellow feeling—the Catholic bill, the omission of the two words “shall and may,” in the optional commission for regulating certain matters touching the question then at issue, had so altered the legal construction of that part of the bill, that they were obliged to re-cast it, and take from the Friday to the Monday before they could send it to that place where it met the fate of all other bills which had for their object a fair and liberal support of civil and religious liberty (a laugh). The present measure was more important in a constitutional than in an economical point of view; it went to establish the principle that the instant a grandson or nephew of the King was born, Parliament must provide for the child although the father was already provided for. It had been said that there was a difference between the case of this infant and that of the other Princes of the Royal Family who had been previously provided for; because they, meaning his late Majesty's sons, had lived under the paternal roof. If this were the fact, the royal roof was of no inconsiderable extent, for some of these young Princes were at Lisbon, Gibraltar, Halifax, and Quebec;—one was in command of a garrison;—another of a province. And the Duke of Gloucester's case was still more in point, for there the income was not to commence till the demise of his Royal Father. That illustrious Prince, the Duke of Sussex, except the allowance made to him by Parliament as one of the Royal offspring, had never received one shilling of the public money—no rank in the army or navy—no profits or preferments had ever been allotted to him; to the Parliamentary grant had his income been always confined. It was the lot of that illustrious prince to have married a lady in a foreign country: that marriage was illegal in England, and illegal by the very worst of all human laws—that royal marriage act, which had been well described by Mr. Wilberforce—as the very worst, the most unconstitutional act that disgraced the statute book (loud cries of hear), and for the violation of such an act had His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex suffered by a heavy diminution of his income. The actual income of his Royal Highness was no more than 13,000*l.* a year; and the Duke of Sussex had never applied for an increase. So had he regulated his domestic economy, affected as he was by the peculiar circumstances of his situation and alliance, that he never had made any pecuniary composition with any of his creditors—he always had ensured for each and every of them a course of payment for 20*s.* in every pound of debt which was contracted; and so well had that management of the reduction of claims occasioned by his Royal Highness been bereft of the advantages which had been conferred upon other branches of his illustrious family—so well had it been managed by the Duke, with the assistance of a learned gentleman who had superintended the business, that out of an accumulation of debt which nearly amounted, for the reasons he had stated, to 100,000*l.*, all had been reduced—at 20*s.* in the pound—to a small residue hardly worth mentioning (hear, hear). And he it carefully remembered, that never during that time had his Royal Highness been exposed to any circumstance which was calculated to compromise the Royal dignity in his own person, or to abate one shilling, or one farthing, from the claim of any creditor (hear, hear). He (Mr. Brougham) had now performed his duty in stating these circumstances as connected with the affairs of the Royal Family, and with the details and principle of the present bill; and no farther would he press upon the attention of the house, than to implore of them to consider how they stood as to this grant with their constituents—the country at large. He had redeemed his pledge by resisting that bad measure, to the utmost of his power, from the beginning to the end of its progress. The last stage was at hand, and he hoped to God that house might still do its duty—retrieve its character with the country, and act so as to look back on that night's vote with greater satisfaction than it could have experienced from a review of the former decisions. But be the event what it might, they on that side had done their duty; and they could both enjoy the rewards of an approving conscience, and look confidently to the people for their support. Nor had they any reason to expect that even the Prince, whose interests they had opposed, would misconstrue the integrity of their motives, or feel less respect for them than for those who had supported him. The illustrious house to which he belonged, was renowned for a magnanimous spirit towards fair and honourable adversaries. The Duke of York freely forgave—he corrected himself, there could be nothing to forgive in those who did their duty—he overlooked, both officially and as an individual, the part taken by those who in 1809 had the painful task to perform of censuring his conduct, and removing him from the command. Her late Majesty, the most persecuted of women (hear), was also the most forgiving that they had seen in any station of life (hear). The illustrious personage who still survived, closely connected by blood and affinity, was not inferior to the rest of his house in this magnanimity. The late Mr. Perceval experienced his forgiveness and enjoyed his favour. The same forgiveness was extended, and the same favour continued, to his successors in place; and a much less important person—the individual who addressed them—though naturally far removed from such conflicts, yet by the accident of the times and his fate, having come into what inferior minds might deem a collision with that higher quarter, when false rumours were propagated by interested malice, or by intrigue,—as if the faithful discharge of his public and professional duties had excited the personal displeasure of the Sovereign,—had the extraordinary satisfaction of knowing that a gracious, and the more gracious because a voluntary assurance (for who could have asked any question on such a subject?) was given by that illustrious personage that all such rumours were utterly without foundation. The Duke of Cumberland would, after that night's vote, he doubted not, show, by his respectful submission, and his candid construction of their motives, that he belonged to the same family with the Duke of York, the late Queen, and the Sovereign himself” (cheers).

The question being loudly called for, the house divided.—For the third reading of the bill, 170—Against it, 121—Majority, 49.

Mr. Brougham then moved to substitute 3,000*l.* for the sum granted in the bill.

The motion was negatived, but

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, agreed to adopt so much of the suggestions of the learned gent. as respected the application of the money, by inserting words which required it to be appropriated "in such manner and form as His Majesty shall see fit."

The bill was then passed.

ARMY AND NAVY. Increase of the Army.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.—Lord Palmerston, in a committee of supply, brought forward the army estimates. After pointing out the difference between the items of the last and those of the present year, he observed that government had thought fit to demand an addition to our army of between 11 and 12,000 men. He said, that he should first explain the grounds upon which this increase of force was asked; and next, the manner in which it was proposed to be effected. Upon the first point, he had one advantage; it could not now be urged, that additional force was wanted to terrify or coerce the country. In England, he saw nothing but prosperity, and confidence between the government and the people; and, even in the less favoured region of Ireland, there appeared rays of brighter omen than parliament had been accustomed to witness. He trusted that the vote of the other evening* had gone forth through the empire as a harbinger of peace; he believed that its principle, if carried into full effect, would do more than armies to maintain tranquillity in Ireland; and he admitted that the improvement which had taken place in the state of that country compelled him to say, that there was nothing in the aspect of that country which ought to weigh in favour of extending our military force. The grounds upon which this increase in our military establishment was meditated were purely external. Now, it might be a fair question, perhaps, how far it was for the benefit of a country to possess colonial establishments, and whether it would not be better to confine herself to the improvement of her domestic institutions and the cultivation of a commercial intercourse with foreign states. He was not, however, called upon to discuss that question. He should content himself with observing, that as far as civilization extended—from the most northern point in America to the southernmost extremity of Asia—British settlements and British wealth existed. To abandon possessions gained at the cost of much blood and treasure—many of them important outposts for the protection of our commerce, and the security of our dominion—would be a violation of public faith, and a forfeiture of national honour. In estimating the amount of force necessary for the service of our colonies, it was impossible to be guided in any degree by the force which had sufficed in any former period of peace. It was not only requisite that adequate garrisons should be provided for every station, but it was also necessary that we should have a surplus force, in order that we might have the means of sending reinforcements from time to time, to places at which they might be called for. In the present state of our army this could not be done. It was almost impossible, with such means, to furnish strength for the ordinary duties. On a recent occasion, when the East India Company stood in need of a reinforcement of 5,000 men, they were compelled to detain five regiments which were under orders for England, and which had already been on foreign service more than 20 years. And this fact led him to another consideration, which was, that the colonial service ought not to be converted into a perpetual banishment for all who were employed in it. When a man entered the army, he devoted his health—his hopes—his prospects to the service of his country. The feeling which carried him forward, rendered him superior to all considerations of fortune, of personal convenience, or death. If he were led to the bed of honour, or, still worse, to the bed of sickness—whether he fell in the field of battle, or became a victim to the climate, still his friends in the one case, and the sufferer in the other, had the consolation that he had fallen in the protection of all that was dear to man, and his fate was brightened with the lustre reflected from the applauses of his country (cheers). But the case was widely different, when men who had trod, perhaps, in every field of battle, whose names were inserted in every page that recorded the victories of England, were doomed to perpetual banishment in some obscure colony, wearing out the remains of their health in some unwholesome climate, undergoing all the fatigues of duty, without the slightest hope of distinction (hear, hear). The house would see that such a state of things could not be allowed to continue, and that it was a duty they owed to those brave men who suffered in the cause of their country, to place at the disposal of the Government the means to maintain, not only proper garrisons in our colonies, but to relieve those garrisons at proper periods, and, what was of great importance, at proper seasons of the year (hear, hear). Assuming then, for the present, that an augmentation was necessary, then came the question as to the manner of making the increase. There were three ways open to the Government. First, the augmentation might have been made by adding to the rank and file of each regiment; secondly, it might have been effected by raising entirely new regiments; or, thirdly, in the mode in which he proposed to accomplish the object—by adding new companies, and not rank and file, to the existing regiments. Now the first mode, that of adding rank and file, would have been the cheapest, because they could have been added without the expense of officers; but there was the objection, that we could not obtain a sufficient disposable reserve at home adequate to the proposed arrangements for local re-inforcements. The next would have been the most expensive mode, because the staff and regimental allowances would have been increased. Now the mode which he proposed, appeared to him to combine both advantages—namely, comparative cheapness and a disposable reserve. The army was formed at present of battalions of eight companies; the strength of each battalion being 576 rank and file. It was now intended to add two companies, so making each battalion consist of 10; and these 10 companies were to be divided into two distinct classes of force. Six companies were to form what would be the service battalion, and these would consist of 86 men each; the other four companies would be the battalion of reserve, or of depot, and would amount only to 224 men altogether. Thus, when the regiment was at home, the whole would be considered as one battalion, and quartered together; but when ordered on service, only the six strong companies would go abroad; the other four remaining at home to recruit, and to provide for casualties. At present, whatever the emergency, troops had to be raised and disciplined. This occupied a long time; and before one casualty was provided for, another had occurred. But the reserve companies would be always ready in case of necessity, from which draughts could be made, subject to none of the delays which hampered us under the existing arrangement. Another great advantage would be this. At present, if an officer were suffering from ill health, and were ordered home by the recommendation of the Military Board of Health, the Commander-in-Chief could only give him a limited leave of absence; in consequence of which, it constantly happened that officers were compelled to go on half-pay; but by the new arrangement, when an officer came home, he could take his duty at home, and some more efficient officer might be sent out, by means of which, many officers would be saved the inconvenience of personal service. The same way with the men: at present if a private came home invalided, he was discharged; but by the new arrangement, although unfit for foreign service, he would be employed at home in drilling and training the men. He would thus be saved compulsory service, and the country saved the expence of his pension (hear, hear). He now came to the subject of the veteran battalion—a force which it was intended to disband altogether. It was one of the conditions upon which pensions were granted to soldiers, that they should be forthcoming for garrison or veteran battalions, whenever the Crown thought fit to call upon them. When the veteran battalions now embodied had been called out in 1821, nobody had supposed that the necessity for keeping them together could have been of long continuance. These men had now been embodied between three and four years; and it was thought right, after so many years of service, to let them retire to their homes, to enjoy in peace the moderate pensions which their country had afforded them: should it be found necessary again to assemble them in arms, the present indulgence would not lessen their alacrity to obey the call. The grounds, then, on which the present increase was called for, he had already stated to be the service of the colonies; and he begged it to be distinctly understood, that Government had not the least reason to apprehend a breach of those friendly relations which subsisted between England and other powers. He should sit down by moving that a force not exceeding 86,993 regular troops, exclusive of forces in India, should be granted for the present year.

Col. Davies said, that if he could take the case to be precisely as the noble lord had described it, he certainly should refuse to vote the increase of force which was demanded; but as he believed that there were in our foreign relations abundant reasons to call for such a measure, he found himself reluctantly compelled to give his assent to it. He adverted to the unnecessary quarrel into which England had been forced with the Burmese, and complained that the force kept up in the colonies was needlessly large altogether.

Mr. Hobhouse objected to the grant in a time of peace, without a full explanation of the principle on which it was demanded. It ought to be known to the country that there were not one hundred members present, when the house was called upon to grant an addition to our standing army of 15,000 men. He did not feel disposed to divide the house on this motion; but before the votes were finally agreed to, he should wish to receive from the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, when he should attend in his place, an explanation on two points—first, whether the proposed increase in our armed force had any reference to the possession of Spain by the armies of France; and secondly, whether the present was to be considered as the last augmentation of our peace establishment. With respect to the augmentation of our forces in India, he would admit that, however the present contest there had arisen, whether we were right or wrong, it was necessary that our military operations there should be pushed with vigour; and if 25,000 men were not sufficient for that purpose, he would consent to an increase of 30,000 or 40,000. But he could not sanction such a large establishment at home.

Sir R. Wilson said, that looking at the situation in which we stood in relation to the powers of Europe—and at the results which might at no distant day follow from the present posture of affairs, he was of opinion, that the increased force demanded was not more than circumstances required. He had an opportunity some time ago of witnessing the state of the garrison at Gibraltar; and though it was kept up with that order and discipline which produced the greatest regularity, it was altogether insufficient in point of numerical strength, to perform all the duties of the place, without excessive personal fatigue to the men. He thought, too, that the great naval force which France had at that time in the bay, and its troops in the vicinity of Cadix, would require an increased force in the garrison (hear, hear). Besides, was it possible that we could permit the occupation of Spain by the French troops? Was it possible that we should suffer Portugal, our ally, to be menaced, for its disposition to adopt a constitutional form of Government? These were points of serious importance, which showed the necessity of our keeping up a force which would enable us to assume that attitude which our interests required. We had recently taken an important step, which must lead to the speedy and full recognition of the South American States. The steps to which this would lead on the part of England would cause great heart-burnings in particular quarters, against which we should be on our guard. Exigencies would arise which we ought to be prepared to meet at the moment; for it would be the worst policy to begin our preparations for a particular exigency, when that exigency had arrived. He would therefore give to the Government of this country the means of acting beforehand, and if they attended to the true interests of England, they would use them in that way which would draw down the approbation of their own countrymen and the benedictions of other nations.

Mr. Peel said, it was unfair to infer from the present comparatively thin state of the house, that the absent members were negligent of their duty. The fact was, they were fully sensible of the reasonableness of the proposed grant, and that it would not be opposed in that way which might require their personal attendance to support it. That such was the case, might be inferred from the state of the benches opposite, and even from the speeches which had been delivered on that side by hon. members who partially disoriented from the motion. The gallant general (Sir R. Wilson) had borne testimony as a military man, and a man of honour, to the situation of the garrison of Gibraltar, and had stated his opinion that it would not be for the interest of the army that it should continue in its present inefficient state. When the house heard from such a competent judge of military affairs as the gallant general, that this was the situation of the only garrison which he visited, it was fair to assume that similar defects existed in our other foreign possessions; and as the fact was, that an increase was required in most of them, he could not see on what grounds the motion could be opposed.

Mr. Calcraft said, that if the hon. members who usually sat on his (the Opposition) side had conceived the public exigencies did not require this augmentation, they would be found at their posts to oppose it. Looking at the situation in which we stood, he thought that Government ought to be put in possession of an effectual disposable force, and therefore he fully concurred in the vote.

Mr. C. Hutchinson said that there were two great objects which ought to occupy the attention of the Government and the Legislature at this time: first, the union and conciliation of the people of these islands; and next, the reduction of our expenditure. But, in a period of general peace and harmony, he thought we ought not to be called upon for any augmentation of our military force. If ministers had called for the present increase of troops—say, for ten times as much, and more than that—for the purpose of opposing that body misnamed the Holy Alliance, in any presumptuous interference with their liberal views towards the South American colonies, he would willingly support them. He would, for such an object, be ready to vote the last shilling of the country (hear, hear).

Mr. John Smith was glad to find that the army estimates for the present year were of such a nature as not to require much of their attention. He wished to draw the attention of the committee to the situation of officers who had received wounds in the service. If they had lost a limb, or received wounds which were considered equivalent to loss of limb, they received a pension proportional to their rank. Not one word was said in the grant that it was merely to continue during his Majesty's pleasure; and the consequence was, that it was generally understood to continue during the life of the person to whom it was granted. Now to his knowledge several persons who had received severe wounds, had been deprived of such pensions after receiving them for a considerable time, and had been reduced by such deprivation to a state of very great distress. He put it to the committee whether individuals who had received pensions without any limitation of the time of their continuance, should not be entitled to hold them for life.

Lord Palmerston said he had formerly been condemned for the extreme liberality with which these pensions had been administered; and the hon. member for Aberdeen, whose absence (a loud laugh)—yes, for a wonder, the hon. member was not present (a laugh)—the hon. member for Aberdeen, whose absence he regretted (another laugh) had considered him so prodigal of them, as to say that he would not be satisfied unless they were taken from him. He would merely state, that in granting those pensions, he had always sought to do impartial justice between the public and the officers on whom they were bestowed. The cases in which pensions had been discontinued were but few in number; and there was not one of them which had been discontinued until after the party had undergone the examination of the army medical board, and they had reported that the injuries for which the pension had been granted, had ceased to operate to the disadvantage of the individual. He could assure the hon. member that if he would bring any case to him, in which he thought injustice had been committed by discontinuing the pension, he would examine it impartially, and if the injustice were proved, would remedy it immediately.

The vote was then agreed to.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.—On the motion for bringing up the report of the committee of supply.—

Mr. Hume was sorry that he was prevented from attending on Friday, when the resolutions for the increase of the army were agreed to. He could not concur in the proposed increase. His gallant friend (Sir R. Wilson) said that the garrison of Gibraltar was not adequate to its defence. He found by the last returns, that we had 3,900 men in that fortress; and with such a force he considered it perfectly safe during a time of peace, when it was defended as much by the faith of treaties as by the force of arms. Another gentleman had said that additional troops were wanted in our colonies. In what colonies? Was it in the Ionian Islands, or in the Cape of Good Hope? He allowed that the condition of the Ionian Islands had been much improved since the accession of the present governor, but he still believed that if Greece were free, the inhabitants would shake off our protection, in consequence of the insulting regulations with which it was accompanied. At the Cape of Good Hope we had a governor, who was exciting discontent by the most arbitrary proceedings, and who was compelling the most valuable of the colonists to return home to England, to obtain shelter from his oppression. If fresh troops were wanted to confirm the authority of arbitrary governors, he for one should be unwilling to grant them. Instead of increasing the regular army to 86,000 men, he would reduce it to 68,600; and by so doing he would get rid of the window-tax, and have a considerable surplus to spare for other purposes. If there must be an excess in any part of our armed force, it ought to be in our navy, which was our best and most effectual defence. To put his sentiments upon record, he should move a resolution, which would meet the approbation of the people out of the house, whatever might be its fate with their representatives within it:—"Resolved that, in the opinion of this house, it is not necessary in a time of profound peace, to maintain for the service of the current year the number of 86,893 regular land forces, exclusive of those for India, and also exclusive of 9,000 royal marines, of about 7,800 of royal artillery and engineers, of 33,258 enrolled militia, yeomanry, and volunteers in Ireland; and of 55,000 militia, and 43,000 yeomanry and volunteers in England, and of 3,900 veterans; making in the whole 257,496 men actually in arms, or ready to be called out if necessary; exclusive, also, of colonial troops at Ceylon, the Cape of Good Hope, and in Africa, amounting to about 4,000 men, not included in the above number."

Col. Johnson seconded the resolution.

Mr. Wilmot Horton contended that the state of the West Indies rendered it necessary for us to have efficient garrisons in every island; and almost every governor had sent pressing requisitions to Government to increase the number of troops. The same was the case in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, where the military had to perform the duties of the police.

Sir R. Wilson was anxious to know whether the pensions of wounded officers would be in future paid quarterly instead of half yearly, the advantage of which shorter period he had hinted on a former evening.

Sir Charles Long thanked the gallant officer for calling his attention to this subject, and assured him of the anxious desire which his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had always evinced for the accommodation and comfort of this meritorious class of officers, and he (Sir C. Long) should take care to carry the recommendation into effect from the 24th of June next.

After some further desultory remarks, the house divided, when the numbers were—

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.—On the motion for the Speaker quitting the chair to go into a Committee of Supply,

Mr. Abercrombie said, that it was perfectly consistent with the forms of that house, for any member to take the opportunity of the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair, on going into a Committee of Supply, to state any matter, which having the appearance of a grievance, might still not be deemed worthy of the formalities of a specific motion. He acknowledged that every apology was due from him, for attempting to originate a discussion upon the subject to which he now invited their attention. He proposed calling the attention of the house to the case of one of its members—a person who had the honour to sit there as the representative of what he might consider one of the most important parts of this mighty Empire—one whose services were well known to his own country, and who had received from foreign princes the highest honours which admiration, gratitude, or patriotism, could prompt them to bestow, in reward for faithful services and great exploits. He alluded to his gallant friend the member for Southwark (Sir R. Wilson). In the first place, he distinctly and unequivocally declared, that he was not about to state any thing that could, in the remotest degree, call in question any portion of the conduct of his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief. He would be the last man in the house to originate any such discussion; nor was it his intention to call in question the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in relation to the dismissal of his gallant friend. They might differ very materially upon questions of prerogative, but he hoped that those differences would not be allowed any place in this discussion. Nor did he complain of the opinions formerly expressed by any gentleman against his gallant friend, much less did he ask for any retraction of such opinions. His object was to persuade the house to do honour to itself by expressing its sympathy for one whose eminent services and personal worth, whose noble and generous feelings, had endeared him to all who knew him, including a large proportion of that house. If, in the passages of his life which had been in the eye of the country and in the face of his enemies, some errors had been observed, even his enemies would admit that those errors resulted from the excess of a generous and ardent spirit, the transports of which merely wanted more control. His military career of 29 years was suddenly interrupted by a decree, which was not preceded by any court-martial. Looking at his whole career, his eminent qualities, his honourable and useful services, and his long military life, he would ask had not his punishment been more than enough? Was he less cherished by his constituents? Was he less esteemed by his profession? Was the career which best suited his gallant spirit to be forever closed? He was dismissed without the sentence of a court-martial. The house, being moved, refused to investigate his case. Many who now heard him could witness to the temper and moderation with which his gallant friend conducted himself on that occasion. It had been a source of gratification and pride to his friends who then supported him, ever since. Many who voted against him from a sense of public duty, were ready to express their kindly feelings towards him, and their admiration at his conduct in that trying period. Considering the age of the individual, and that this was probably the last session of the parliament, he wished to appeal to the house, and especially to those members who were now engaged in the profession of his gallant friend, for some declaration of their kindness towards him. He saw about him some of the companions in arms of his gallant friend—some who had shared in common with him his trials and his dangers. To them he appealed, if, upon the late promotion, his gallant friend had been restored to that situation which he had attained by his brilliant services, would not the army have been gratified—would not his brother officers have been delighted? He abstained from particularizing the brilliant feats in which his gallant friend had been engaged. In any testimony which he could give, he ought to warn the house that he gave it in the spirit of a warm and ardent friendship which he felt for his gallant friend. He only wished the house to listen to the opinion of those who knew, and could rightly appreciate the character and services of his gallant friend. If the expression of that opinion should be such as he confidently anticipated, then he knew the effect which it would have in its representation in the proper quarter. He wished not to be misunderstood. He was not suggesting to any member the performance of any thing which would not as readily spring from the exercise of their own free will—much less did he seek by this to shackle the exercise of those powers which were vested in the Crown and its ministers; but he spoke in reverence to the known kindness of a benign Sovereign, and his benevolent intentions to those who had faithfully and zealously served him. Such an act of grace and favour as that to which he alluded, would be most grateful to the house, highly satisfactory to the profession, and a matter of rejoicing to the country. He was not dictating any particular method for carrying this object into effect. He was only endeavouring to arm those upon whom the affair would devolve, with reasons for furthering the generous intentions of the Sovereign to all his meritorious servants.

If these suggestions should lead to the restoration of his gallant friend, it would make him happy to think that he had been the humble instrument for bringing about that object (loud and fervent cheering).

Mr. Littleton said, that the same motive which had formerly made him withhold his assent to a motion for inquiry upon the dismissal of his gallant friend, now induced him to express his gratification at the sentiments of the learned gent. To excite discussion upon the former errors of his gallant friend would be bad taste and bad feeling in him. However they might have demanded attention, they were forgotten. No other recollections were now preserved but the services of his gallant friend. His restoration would be received with acclamations by the whole country, and would be felt almost as a personal obligation by every member of the house.

Col. Wodehouse hailed this as a most welcome proposition. It was the more commendable, because it dictated no particular course to the Government. Looking to the Sovereign, and those in the probable line of succession, it was clear that acts of benevolence, of oblivion, of grace and favour, were most congenial to them all. He hoped for the best results from the expression of the opinions of the house.

Lord W. Bentinck said, that as the opinion of the profession was asked relative to the merits of the gallant member, he ventured to say, that it was the opinion of the army generally, that there was no officer in our service, whose bravery and conduct had shed greater lustre on the British arms, or had rendered more essential services to his country than he (Sir R. Wilson) had (loud cheers). It was not for him to enter into each of the errors, if any errors had been committed by the gallant officer; neither was it his wish to direct the Crown in the course which it ought to pursue, as he thought with the learned member who introduced the subject, that it was better to leave the matter in the hands of those Royal Personages, with whom resided the power of reversing what had already been done.

Sir M. W. Ridley had been long intimately acquainted with the gallant officer, and in no man had he ever met greater integrity, spirit, gallantry, or honour (loud cheers). If the gallant officer had committed errors, he was sure they must have been errors arising from the very best feelings, and from the wreckless gallantry and spirit with which he espoused any particular cause. But if such errors ever existed, they must be forgotten in the recollection of his former brilliant services; and if the royal favour should be in unison with the opinion of that house, it would restore him to that rank to which he was an ornament, and the honour and character of which he would never tarnish.

Sir Ronald Ferguson said, that he had often, and at a distant period, served with his gallant friend, and he would venture to say, that no man in the British army had so invariably distinguished himself for gallantry and bravery as he had (hear, hear). And he felt that the restoration of that gallant officer to a service of which he had been so great an ornament, would be received by the whole army, as well as by the House of Commons, with the greatest possible satisfaction. The conduct of his gallant friend required no eulogy from him, but he humbly hoped that some gallant officers opposite, one of whom (Sir G. Murray) was looked upon as one of the highest military authorities in the country (hear, hear), would not abstain from bearing their testimony to the military character and conduct of his gallant friend (hear, hear).

Sir G. Murray could not refrain from expressing the great pleasure he had in bearing testimony to the military character and services of the gallant officer. He had served with him abroad, and he knew no man possessed of more of those qualities suited to the military service than that gallant officer (hear, hear); and it would give him great pleasure to see the gallant officer restored to his rank and station in the service (hear, hear). At the same time, he could not help saying, that if his gallant friend would confine his abilities within their proper channel, they would be rendered the more valuable to the service and to the country (hear, from the ministerial benches). No one was more anxious than he (Sir G. Murray) was to maintain this opinion of the service, and to preserve the prerogative of the Crown over the army. That power must be placed somewhere, and no where could it be better placed than in the hands of his most gracious Majesty, and of the royal and illustrious Personages who acted under the controul of the Crown.

Mr. Brougham did not wish to detain the house—all parts of which, he was glad to see, were ready to bear testimony, to the fullest and most ample extent, to what had been said by his learned friend. He (Mr. B.) had been consulted by the gallant officer upon the subject of his removal from the army, and he could bear positive and solemn testimony of his having defended his conduct against certain political adversaries with the utmost human exertion of forbearance;—a forbearance, the more to be admired, because he was at that time in possession of certain important documents—but he nobly disdained to act upon them.

Yeomanry Cavalry.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.—Mr. Stuart Wortley wished to know, whether there was any intention on the part of government to give any additional allowances or pay to the yeomanry cavalry of the country?

Mr. Peel replied, that no man was more disposed than himself to consider highly the services of the yeomanry cavalry. Some of the regiments had lately resigned, however; others were inefficient. He had accepted their resignation, though he did full justice to their services and their merits. Among other propositions, it had been suggested that they should be allowed exemptions from the burden of certain civil offices, such as that of constable; but it was of great importance to the public to maintain the respectability of the office of constable; and it was especially important in country districts to fill it with prudent and respectable individuals. He, for one, would prefer making a direct settled addition to the pay of the yeomanry cavalry, to the granting them exemptions of this kind. He set a high value upon their services, but was not at present prepared with any measure of the kind alluded to by his hon. friend.

Mr. Littleton bore testimony to the very beneficial results of the revision of the yeomanry cavalry corps establishments, which his rt. hon.

friend (Mr. Peel) had wanted to be made last year.

Mr. Hume and Mr. Maberly concurred in this expression of approbation; the latter gent. recommending that every corps which was not in efficient state should resign.

Mr. Peel observed, that he intended, in future, to require these troops to go out on permanent duty for certain continued intervals; taking care not to make them so frequent as to be burdensome to the country.

Navy Estimates.

MONDAY, FEB. 14.—The house having resolved into a committee of supply,

Sir George Clark stated several reasons which had operated to swell the estimates of this year beyond those of the last. An addition of force was required, not only to repress the pirates at Cuba, but to protect the interests of British merchandize in the neighbourhood of the infant states, whose rights being but recently recognized, might still become subjects of conflict. An increase of expense had been created by the advance in the price of commodities used in the service, especially the article of iron, which had more than doubled since the parliament met. But the chief additional expense had been incurred in consequence of some wholesome and beneficial alterations in the victualling system. What were called the banyan-days were abolished: and it having been felt that the quantity of ardent spirits allowed was inimical to the discipline of the navy, a diminution had been made in the allowance of grog. Many experienced officers attributed the offences which usually led to a rigorous exercise of discipline to the second allowance of grog. The saving effected on this article was given to the men for pocket-money, paid monthly on the stations, wherever they might be, at 2s. per month, to petty officers and seamen. The warrant and commissioned officers took no additional allowance for the reduction. The men were also served with tea.—He then moved that 29,000 men, including 9000 marines, be granted for the year 1825.

Sir J. Yorks wished to hear from some of his gallant friends who had served, how the new plan of victualling worked in the navy. He had doubts as to the plan of commuting tea for grog. What could be expected from that herb which was little better than clover-dust? He feared that the objections to serving in the navy would not be done away among the old seamen by a diminution of their grog.

Sir G. Cockburn said, that the new system worked surprisingly well. The admirals and commanders on the stations found the greatest advantages from it. It was hailed with three cheers by the crews of many of the ships on receiving the information. The tea was not given instead of grog; the tea and the grog had nothing to do with each other. The men were paid in pocket-money all that was taken away in grog, and they had the tea besides. The portion of grog which had been stopped, was made up to the men in pocket-money: and one reason for this change had been, that when the men went into port without money in their pockets, they were apt to desert; whereas they might now amuse themselves without being liable to the same temptation. But nothing demanded more praise than abolishing the banyan-days. The sailor was entitled to a pound of beef per day. He used to receive, instead of six pounds of beef, two pounds of flour, and four pounds of pork, and then he was told that he had six pounds of beef. He now received that which was properly due to him under its right name. They had before been allowed a large quantity of peas, enough, in fact, to supply a hog-stye; but they never ate them, and the article, or at least its value, went into the pocket of the purser. No one could doubt as to the superiority of the present plan.

Sir I. Coffin was surprised that his gallant friend should object to that healthful beverage tea, and nickname it brick-dust (loud laughter).—not brick-dust, but clover-dust (laughter).

The resolution was then agreed to.

On the next vote, for 320,450l., for the wear and tear of His Majesty's ships of war for 1825,

Mr. Hum, said, he thought a more explicit account ought to be laid before the house, of the expenditure of the former year, so that they might compare it with what was proposed for the present. They ought to be informed what was the amount of articles made use of, and what was the expense of wear and tear for the number of ships employed.

Sir G. Cockburn said, the expense which might be incurred for wear and tear of vessels at sea was quite uncertain. The vote of last year having been found short, 2s. a-man additional was required by the present vote, which, it was computed, would cover the deficiency.

Sir J. Yorks observed, that the sweeping phrase of "wear and tear," meaning the wear of hulls, masts, and spars, and the tear of canvas, had been in use for a great many years. Now, he could see no reason why the commissioners at the dock-yards could not give a more detailed account of this sort of expenditure. They might state what had been the wear of hulls and masts, and the tear of sails, for any given period. He did not know why the particulars of this description of expenditure should be wrapped up and concealed in these old-fashioned words.

Mr. Croker said, the wear and tear included the consideration of the size of the ships, the service on which they were to be employed for the current year, and other matters of so high a political nature as to render it inexpedient to adopt the explanatory mode that had been suggested. This vote of wear and tear was, in some degree, a vote of confidence to government. The estimate of the last year was always made the foundation of the new estimate. But he submitted to the hon. member, whether, taking an enlarged view of the question, without any reference to the present pacific state of Europe, it would not be impolitic to disclose the state of our naval force.

Mr. Maberly never before heard such an explanation in that house. The hon. Secretary (Croker) stated that this was a sum voted in confidence to his Majesty's ministers. Now he thought it really was a vote for wear and tear; if so, why not produce a regular estimate? But the hon. Sec. said, there was something beyond that (no, no, from Mr. Croker). Certainly, no more would be expended than was absolutely for wear and tear; and should there be any surplus, that was, he supposed, as this was a vote of confidence, to be disposed of as ministers thought fit.

Mr. Hume said, that the hon. Sec. would not give an account of the wear and tear, lest the enemy should find out the strength and disposition of our naval force; although there happened to be a gentleman of the name of Murray, who printed a yearly statement under the hon. Sec.'s own auspices, so that any Power, by procuring that list, would know perfectly well in what part of the world our naval force was stationed, and in what amount. He protested against this as a vote of confidence. In the expenditure of money, he placed no confidence in any man (a laugh). The house would not do its duty if, in voting money for the army and navy, it allowed such confidence to lull its watchfulness to sleep.

Mr. Maberly agreed with his hon. friend (Mr. Hume), that when money was called for, the house ought to be satisfied as to the purpose to which it was to be appropriated. He hoped that in the next year a detailed statement of wear and tear would be laid before them.

The resolution was agreed to.

On the next vote for 94,250*l.* for ordnance for the sea-service,

Mr. Hume wished to know distinctly what the vote was for. Under the head of charge for ordnance, he observed an item "for boats hired at Queenborough, 23,000*l.*" Now it was notorious, that, of the persons employed in those boats, 160 out of 190 were freemen of Queenborough. Queenborough, it should be observed, sent two members to parliament, who were returned by those persons. Instead, therefore, of saying so much per head per man for ordnance, it would be more satisfactory to give the items of expenditure in detail—so much for gunpowder, so much for ordnance, &c. When 94,000*l.* was placed in one line, as the sum necessary, at 5*s.* per head per man, it looked as if every man in the fleet participated in it. He hoped that in future a specific account of the ordnance expenditure would be produced, that individuals might have an opportunity of checking every item.

Sir G. Clerk was sorry that the clerk of the ordnance (Mr. Ward), who could give a better explanation than he could, was not in the house. But he understood from him, that after due consideration, the sum proposed was found to be the lowest for which ordnance and ordnance stores could be supplied for the current year. With respect to the boats mentioned by the hon. gent., he should only say, that if boats were required to carry powder to the ships in harbour, it was necessary that they should be charged in the ordnance estimate.

Mr. Maberly said, every one knew that it was a complete annuity to become a freeman of Queenborough, for he was sure of getting one of these boats, to sail up and down the Thames in, half employed and half idle.

Mr. Hume said, the boats were not wanted: out of twenty-three that were at Queenborough, five only were used in the last year. The pay, however, went on as usual. The jurats of Queenborough were captains and mates of those boats, which, perhaps, explained the circumstance.

The resolution was agreed to.

LORDS, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21.—The Earl of Darnley presented a petition from Mr. John Burridge, praying for an inquiry into the state of the navy. He said that he presented it the more readily, as it would give his noble friend an opportunity to clear up a suspicion which very generally prevailed, of the navy not being in that state of efficiency in which it ought to be kept. There was a suspicion abroad that the navy was more or less affected with the dry rot.

Lord Melville said, that as far as regarded any general decay, he could most positively contradict such a statement. Some partial instances of decay there always must be; but beyond that it was absolutely untrue that there was any decay in the navy. The petition came from a person who had a nostrum for curing the dry rot. Cases of ships which had been pointed out in support of this allegation of dry rot, had been inquired into, and the state of those ships had been proved to be quite the reverse of the representation made. A strict investigation had been instituted, and the most ample details on the state of every ship in the navy had been obtained. The result was, that if they were to take any period of history, taking into consideration the number of ships, and comparing it with the present, they would select the latter as that period in which the greater number of ships were to be found in a sound state, and likely to last long. During the war, in consequence of the scarcity of timber, ships were occasionally built of timber liable to decay faster than that of which ships were built in ordinary times. But the Navy Board now guarded against the use of that sort of timber. Many propositions had been made for preventing a too rapid decay, but he set no value on any nostrum. The only effectual remedy was to use good and well-seasoned oak. In the want of good native oak, it had been found necessary to resort for a supply to the north of Germany, and other parts, where certainly enough was to be had, but of an inferior quality.

The Earl of Darnley was happy that he could corroborate what had fallen from his noble friend with respect to the present efficiency of the navy. He could speak more particularly with respect to one first-rate, the Howe, which had been represented to be in a state of decay. He knew the persons who examined that ship, on the opinion of one of whom he could place the most implicit reliance, and he had been assured that a sounder ship never was surveyed. With the exception of a plank or two, she was found to be in a perfect efficient state. The manner in which the British navy was now constituted did credit to the Admiralty; and he agreed with his noble friend, if the number and size of the ships were compared, there never was a period when it was in a better state. Having formerly had occasion to make remarks of a contrary nature, he was glad this opportunity for expressing his opinion had occurred.

COMMONS, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21.—The house having resolved itself into a committee of supply,

Sir G. Clerk in proceeding with the navy estimates, observed, that, on the extraordinary of the navy, there was an increase in the present year, as compared with the last, of 120,000*l.* This arose from the enhanced price of materials, and from the additional expense of wear and tear. On the ordinary estimate, there was an increase of 80,000*l.*, in consequence of a very considerable addition having been made in the wages of the artificers employed in the dock-yards. For the last four years they had been restricted to five days in the week instead of working during the entire six. They were now, however, employed throughout the six days, which sufficiently accounted for the increased expense. The sum voted last year was 476,000*l.* This year about 500,000*l.* would be necessary. On the half-pay, pensions, and superannuations, there was a reduction. A considerable sum was charged for carrying on several of the new works on the coast. Amongst these, one of the most prominent was the docks at Sheerness. Formerly the charge was made for carrying on works, which were nearly finished, and it was not intended by the Admiralty to have gone on any farther; but an offer was made to them by the architect, that if he were permitted to proceed more rapidly, and to use the materials and machinery he had on the spot, he would finish the new works in a short period, and at a reduced price. It was estimated that 50,000*l.* would complete the undertaking. The architect was to receive 400*l.* a year, and to be allowed  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on any money he might advance, should it be found necessary, beyond the 50,000*l.* The sum of 795,000*l.*, which stood in the first column of the estimate, might be considered sufficient for all the works. There was an increase on the estimate for the works in progress at Plymouth Sound. Independent of the ordinary works, they were building a light-house there, and it was necessary that that part of the break-water which adjoined the light-house should be built more substantially than the other portions of it. This was the reason why there was so large an addition to the sum necessary for completing this great national undertaking. It should also be observed, that the break-water had received some damage from the hurricane of November last. But it was satisfactory to be enabled to state, that the mischief was not of any very considerable extent; and it was proved, on that occasion, that it was perfectly suited to effect the object for which it was erected. It was now nearly completed, and, when finished, even with this additional charge, would come within the amount of the estimate of 1812. The estimate, before the injury from the gales, was 296,000*l.*, it would be now 295,000*l.* Some alteration would be made in the buildings connected with the victualling department, &c. at Plymouth. At present, those establishments stood at opposite sides of the harbour. The establishment at South Down, where the brewery and cooperage were situate, was very far removed from the ships, and was only accessible at particular times of the tide. This was an inconvenience which the Admiralty meant to remove. The establishment was not built on ground the property of the Crown, but was held by lease, which lease was now nearly expired. It was intended to purchase it, and to re-build the old houses, as had been recommended by Earl St. Vincent when he was at the head of the Admiralty. It was also in contemplation to build a sea-wall, for the greater security and convenience of shipping. The expense altogether would amount to about 40,000*l.* He concluded by moving for the sum of 54,886*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* to defray the salaries and contingent expenses of the Admiralty office for the year 1825.

Mr. Hume could not understand why so large an expense was incurred on account of the navy. If the promises held out in former years, were worthy of the smallest attention, that expense ought now to be sensibly diminished. The house might imagine, because there was only an increase of 300,000*l.* this year, and

200,000*l.* last year, that the matter was of no importance. But the real question was, whether the amount was really necessary. In 1816, a committee was appointed to examine into, and estimate the probable expense of the navy for that and subsequent years, and they made their report accordingly. And now, in 1825, instead of the aggregate amount of the expense being reduced, it was actually greater than it was in 1817. So that, though a reduction was made in one or two years, they were now increasing the charge very considerably. They had been told, and they had a right to expect, that a very great decrease would be effected in an important article—the half pay and allowances. But, so far from that expense being lowered to the extent to which hopes had been held out, from 5 per cent. to 7 per cent., it was now very nearly as great as when the proposed reduction was intimated. There was something extraordinary in the system of keeping up half-pay and allowances on so extensive a scale. Why did not ministers bring back to the service persons who were on half-pay, whenever vacancies occurred? Promotions were now as frequent as ever, unless at the conclusion of the war, when a great number of promotions were gazetted. The Sec. of the Admiralty had declared on a former occasion, that whenever a vacancy occurred, it should be filled up by individuals on half-pay. He hoped the hon. Sec. would lay on the table a list of the vacancies which had occurred during the last few years, and show how many of those unfortunate individuals, who were on half-pay, had been brought back to full-pay. He feared the number would prove very small indeed. Two years ago, the reductions effected by ministers seemed to be dictated by a proper spirit—that of giving relief to the country at large: but they appeared to have lost sight of that object, and no reduction had latterly taken place. He thought, therefore, that it was better for the house to look at the aggregate amount of the estimates, rather than to consider the details at the present moment. They ought to say, distinctly, “so much is sufficient for the service of the country, the remainder must be reduced.” He considered the naval force at the present moment as too large. The South American States were so firmly established, that they were deemed fit objects for commercial treaties. In that quarter, then, no fleet was necessary; and he should be glad to know where any extensive naval force was required. The salaries now paid in the public offices were quadruple—nay, quintuple those which had been paid in any former peace; and unquestionably there was no necessity for such an increase of emolument. The amount of money expended at this moment for building ships was enormous. No less than a million a year, was thus laid out. We had already no less than 500 ships of war, a greater naval force than all the states of the world could command—why, therefore, should they go on building? Instead of this they should apply themselves to keep the old ships in perfect repair. The newly-built vessels were destroyed by the dry-rot. The hon. Comptroller of the navy (Sir B. Martin) smiled at the idea of the dry-rot. The hon. Comptroller, and others on the opposite side of the house, had stated that this evil did not exist to any great extent. But their statements were by no means borne out. He would not go the length which some individuals old, and say that half the navy was useless, but he believed, from concurrent report, that more damage had been done to our ships of war since the use of unseasoned timber came into fashion, than was ever before known. Those who had the management of the naval department tried all manner of experiments to check the evil. At one time they smeared the ships with coal-tar; then they deluged them with thousands of gallons of oil; at another time they used salted timber; at another their experiment was to cover the ship in. They went backwards and forwards with their experiments, which afforded the best proof that they themselves did not know how to remedy the disease. A considerable sum was charged for the improvements in dock-yards and wharfs. The hon. member for Harwich (Sir G. Warrender) had stated, that if he had been aware, three or four years ago, that ships might be easily conveyed up and down the Medway, between Chatham and Sheerness by the means of steam-boats, which could tow them up and down, the sum expended on Sheerness should not have been laid out. Here, however, it appeared, that 795,000*l.* had been and was to be expended on the works now in progress at Sheerness. When they had such a dock-yard as that of Chatham, and when ships might be towed up and down without delay, by means of steam-boats, he could not but view this establishment at Sheerness as most gratuitously useless. If at a period of war, when they had a thousand ships, they could do without this establishment, what could they possibly want with it in a time of profound peace and with a navy of five hundred? There was also an enormous charge of 300,000*l.* for works at Plymouth, which deserved the attention of the house. When sums of this magnitude were called for, Parliament ought to have a little more detailed information than could be contained in a speech delivered at the table. He also observed a charge for the dock-yard establishment at Halifax. Why could not Halifax defray all its own expenses? There was no reason why the people of England should, from year to year, be burthened in this way. He wished to see the navy, which was, and deserved to be, the favourite service of the country, kept in the most efficient state; but he could not suffer what he conceived to be useless expenditure, which would go on increasing, if it were not checked, to pass unnoticed.

Mr. Robertson said, that the hon. member (Mr. Hume) had recommended the most mischievous policy, on this occasion, that could possibly be devised. Formerly our commerce was confined to Europe, the Mediterranean, and the West Indies; but now there was not a country on the face of the earth where our ships were not at anchor (hear, hear). If then, a new rupture occurred, was it not necessary that a great naval force should be ready to protect them (hear, hear)? He trusted his Majesty's ministers would not shrink from their duty, but that they would extend the navy as much as possible, not only to repeal the aggression of foreign powers, but to protect the commerce of Great Britain.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On the resolution for 157,176*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* for his Majesty's yards at home,

Sir F. Knatchbull complained that many shipwrights and other artificers were discharged from the dock-yard at Chatham while none were removed from Portsmouth or Plymouth. The consequence of this was, that as the men could procure no employment, many of them, with their families, were thrown on the parish.

Sir George Clerk said, that at the end of the war, it was found that there was not sufficient work for all the men employed in the several dock-yards. To avoid the necessity of discharging them, in consequence, it was offered to continue them at such work as there might be to do, at a lower rate of wages. The men received this as a boon, and were very glad to continue in the dock-yards upon the term offered them. In the course of last winter and the autumn, they expressed some dissatisfaction at the amount of their wages, and were told that they were at liberty to seek employment wherever they could obtain better pay. Some of them did so, and the reason why this happened to have taken place in Kent, more than in Plymouth and in other places, was because, on the men at Plymouth being told that they were kept in employment at the reduced wages only in order to keep them from the distress of being without work, they said they were content and continued their places. As to the families of the shipwrights discharged from the dockyards in Kent having become chargeable to the parish, that was their own fault; there was plenty of work for them to do in the private docks, but they had entered into a combination, and placed themselves under the direction of a committee who fixed certain prices, which the masters would not give. He could assure the hon. bart. that if all the shipwrights who were not absolutely wanted in the dock-yards should be discharged, the distress would be much greater, and more general.

Mr. Huskisson said he had reason to know, that there was at this time a great demand for workmen in the private yards, and that all the men who had left the public docks would have found employment there but for the mischievous spirit of combination which influenced them. Since the repeal of the combination laws, the workmen in this and other trades had committed such excesses as, if they were continued, would compel the house to resort again to the former laws, the repeal of which he feared had prejudiced some very valuable interests, and had in fact, been injurious to the workmen themselves. He knew that there were many persons now ready to give the workmen employment, and the statements of those persons placed the conduct of the workmen in such light as made him feel more indignation than he thought fit to express.

Mr. Hume was so far from blaming the Government for the course which they had adopted towards the shipwrights, that he thought it extremely humane to keep them at low wages, until the arrival of the merchant-trade should have furnished them with full employment. That time had now arrived. He was sorry to add to what had fallen from the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Huskisson) that the conduct of the workmen in all parts of the country, since the repeal of the combination laws, which he had laboured so much to procure, had been highly blameable. They had attempted to impose upon their masters, regulations far more arbitrary and degrading than those which they had themselves so much complained of. He hoped the recent successes of the masters who had withstood these attempts, would teach the workmen that this ungracious and impolitic conduct of theirs would drive their best friends in and out of that house, to wish for the re-enactment of the old laws (hear, hear).

The vote was then agreed to.

Discipline of the Navy.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.—Mr. Hume rose to submit a motion respecting the discipline of the navy. He had intended to move for a committee on the subject of impressment and flogging; but he was now induced to alter his plan, and to move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent impressment. If he could point out a mode by which the navy might be recruited by volunteers, like the merchant service, he trusted the house would concur with him in thinking that it would be most desirable that that practice should be dispensed with. He would, if the house gave him leave, bring in his bill, and have it printed, in order that it might stand over for consideration, to be taken up next session. His bill would prevent the practice of impressment, except in cases of great emergency. He had consulted with several naval men on this subject, and it seemed to be the general opinion that means might be devised for placing the navy on the same footing as other branches of the force of the country, as far as respected the facilities of keeping up the necessary strength by means of voluntary entry. One great cause which prevented this, was the power exercised of punishing seamen at the discretion of one man. That was a source of the greatest injury to the service. No man was ever flogged in the army until his conduct had been investigated by a court-martial; why was a seaman to be placed in a different situation? He could see no reason why the same rule should not be extended to both services. He understood that in some vessels containing from 300 to 600 men, as for instance the Bulwark and the Dictator, it often happened that there was not a single man flogged for six or eight months; but in other vessels he knew that men were flogged almost daily, with a severity which to him was inexplicable. If no capricious punishment were allowed to be inflicted in the army, by parity of reasoning there should be some security afforded to the seamen that no capricious punishment should be inflicted in the navy. Ministers very laudably issued an order in council on the 10th of March, 1824, limiting the number of lashes to be inflicted on any slave in Trinidad in one day to 25; declaring that even that number should not be inflicted until 24 hours after the commission of the offence for which he was punished, and awarding a definite penalty to any individual who should act in violation of those provisions. Why were not the seamen of this country placed under similar protection? Why were not the nature of their offences defined and punished by law? Why was not some enactment made to prevent them, not only from being unduly punished, but also from being punished at all until the irritation of the moment had subsided? He knew instances where officers had punished men contrary to the rules laid down by the Admiralty; and the Admiralty merely admonished them to be more cautious in future. To show how severe the punishments inflicted in the navy were, the hon. member read two statements, which he said the individuals who had sent them to him were ready, if they might be permitted, to make good at the bar of the house. The first related to circumstances which had taken place 20 years ago (a laugh), and the last to circumstances which occurred only last year. The hon. member then read a statement from a sailor, who said that he had joined the Howe, Capt. Cockburn, in the year 1803, at some port in the East Indies; that he had not been many days on board before a marine received four dozen lashes because his musket had hung fire; and a veteran seaman as many more, because he remarked in conversation to the master at arms, that in all the 35 years during which he had been at sea, he had never seen so cruel a punishment inflicted for so trivial a cause; that during all the time he had remained on board the Howe, similar punishments were frequently inflicted, and that the feelings of all on board were harrowed and disgusted by them. The hon. member then read another statement, containing an account of the punishments inflicted on board one ship in the course of the year, from which it appeared that by far the greater part of its crew had been personally punished in some way or other. He described the punishment of starting to the house, and the circumstances under which it was generally inflicted; and then asked whether it was too much, under such circumstances, to ask for the interposition of Parliament? It was his object to put an end to flogging, unless by the sentence of a court-martial, and to leave the seaman in the same situation that the soldier was in at present. It might be asked, why had he brought this subject before the house, when there were so many naval officers in parliament who must be better acquainted with it than he was? The reason was, that though few naval officers could be found to defend the present practice, none of them chose to put themselves forward to put an end to it. Some of them, from the habits of early education, were enamoured of the practice; others looked at it with a lenient eye; and many more of them durst not express the opinions they entertained regarding it, lest by so doing they should, as an hon. friend of his had said on a former occasion, be obliged to turn their stern upon the Admiralty. Another object of his bill was to limit the period of service in the navy to seven or ten years, according to the plan which Mr. Windham had introduced into the army, and to give to every seaman who had served that period, a certificate of such service to secure him in future against impressment, though, in the altered system which he wished to introduce, he thought that impressment would be unnecessary, as the navy would be always filled with volunteers. There was no difficulty in getting marines, though they were subject to the same laws, discipline, and punishment as the sailors, in consequence of their receiving a bounty on their enlistment, and of their being enlisted only for a limited period. Under such an alteration as he proposed, he anticipated that in future there would be as little difficulty in procuring seamen. The rate of wages in the navy was not commensurate with the rate of wages in any other service. Seamen at present received in the merchant service 3*l.* 10*s.* per month; but in the navy 8*s.* He thought that, even with these disadvantages, men would prefer serving in the navy to serving in the merchant's service, if the arbitrary power of flogging were taken away, and if the other measures which he recommended were carried into execution.

Sailors, owing to the hardships to which they were exposed, generally suffered under a premature old age, and he would therefore recommend that pensions should be granted to them proportioned to their length of service. If a pension of 7l. or 10l. a-year were granted to a man after he had served ten years, it would be received by the navy as a boon of great importance. Another thing he should recommend, was to alter the present distribution of prize-money. Was it right that when a prize was taken, the captain's share of the booty should be equal to that of the whole crew put together? The officers should not be taught to look upon prize-money as an inducement to enter the navy; but the men, he contended, should. Of all future prizes he would give six-eighths to the men, and would leave only two-eighths to the officers. The Marquis of Hastings, and the other officers of our Indian army, had abandoned the whole of their prize money to their men; and he would advise the officers of the navy to follow their bright example. If such alterations were introduced into the naval service, he would undertake to say that, let war come when it might, they would have as many seamen as they wished to man their fleet without impressment; but as an emergency might arise, in which it would be impossible to wait till volunteers were collected, he would have such a register kept of all the seamen in the country as had been prepared 150 years ago, and with this additional proviso—that every man at sea should be liable to serve for five years in his Majesty's navy, just as every man on shore was liable to serve in the army for the same time. He then moved that "leave be given to bring in a bill to amend the 22d of Geo. II. cap. 33, and to make provision for the encouragement of seamen, and for the more effectual manning of his Majesty's navy."

Sir G. Cockburn commenced his observations by complaining of the want of courtesy which the hon. member had exhibited towards him in bringing forward a personal attack upon him, without giving him any information of his intention to do so. Had he received notice of the hon. member's intention to make a direct charge upon his conduct, he would have brought the necessary documents from the Admiralty to refute it. The house would recollect that 20 years ago, the discipline of the navy was different from what it was at present; and yet at that very time, he had on board his own ship made an order against "starting," and a lieutenant had quitted the service, for "starting" the men without permission. If the hon. member would mention the name of the individuals who were said to have been punished as he described, he should in all probability be able to tell him the real offences for which they were punished (hear, hear). As it was impossible for him to make such statement at present, he would confine himself to this observation,—that he had never inflicted any punishment, while he was in the service, except in the presence of his officers, or without inquiring into the nature of the offence which had been committed*. With regard to the hon. member's bill, the reason alleged for bringing it in was, that the seamen were so ill treated in the naval service of the country that they had a strong dislike to it. The statement, however, of the hon. member went along to disprove his own argument, for he had told the house that sailors were now procured for the navy without impressment, though they received only 34s. per month in the King's service, and 5l. 10s. per month in the merchant service. He then explained what was the nature of the retiring allowances for seamen, and warrant officers, after their periods of service for 12, 14, and 21 years, which he deemed to be sufficient, and denied that the hon. member was borne out in his comparison between the army and navy. The army were enlisted for life, the navy for a limited period, and liable to be paid off every three years; and so far from the general tendency of the commercial marine being to induce a preference for that service to the injury of the navy, as the hon. member seemed to suppose, the fact was the reverse, for the Admiralty, on the application of the merchant service, had repeatedly written to their officers on foreign stations to discourage their enlisting seamen from the commercial marine, unless it became absolutely necessary, from the urgency of the public business, and, indeed, this was done by the Admiralty, contrary to an old statute, which, for the purpose of encouraging the navy at the expense of the merchant marine, abrogated their private articles upon entrance into the King's service. When the hon. member argued upon the analogy of courts-martial, between the service of the army and navy, and insisted that no punishment in the former could be inflicted without such court, he had omitted stating that when the army were actually engaged in the field, there was a proviso that punishment could be inflicted by the commander-in-chief's order to the provost-marshal. Now he would ask, whether the general service of the navy at sea did not resemble that of the army in the field, and whether the same power of discipline ought not to be allowed to the one, as to the other? A ship, for instance, sailed upon a three years' voyage round the world, and it was impossible to have a court-martial on board. What then was to be done? Was the offender to be kept in irons all that time, or even to be kept in custody; and what other alternative had the captain for punishing the want of discipline in his ship? This was the ordinary case of the navy, and did it not resemble the case provided for the army in the field? The captain must in these cases abandon the supreme command of his crew, and the necessary enforcement of discipline, if the hon. member's motion received the sanction of the house. Let it not, however, be understood that the Admiralty held out any encouragement to the infliction of corporal punish-of the Howe, while a gallant officer (Sir G. Cockburn) was commander. By a log-book of the Howe, which he had since had an opportunity of inspecting, he felt himself bound in fairness and candour to say that none of the severities which he had then spoken of belonged to the time of that gallant officer's command—he having never, in any instance, inflicted punishments of the nature then in question, without a previous examination.

Sir G. Cockburn declared himself to be fully satisfied with the explanation of the hon. member.

* On Monday, June 13, Mr. Hume rose to retract in the fullest possible manner, the statement which he had been induced to make to the house from misapprehension of the contents of a letter which had been forwarded to him. He alluded to the charges of cruelty in the discipline

ment: on the contrary, they called for returns of its infliction, and he could give no better proof of the moral discipline of the navy than to say, that these accounts were transmitted from the service as often blank as full; and he could assure the house, that the Lords of the Admiralty marked with peculiar approbation those officers who had maintained discipline without resorting to coercive means. But of the necessity of the principle he had no doubt: indeed, it was recognized by the courts of law in a recent case, in which a captain of a merchant vessel was declared justified in the infliction of corporal punishment, for the due maintenance of the discipline of his ship. Then, as to the hon. member's argument about impressment, all that the Admiralty wished was, to prevent as much as possible the necessity of resorting to impressment, but nothing would be more impolitic than to abrogate their power of doing so, considering the deep responsibility which was vested in the government. It was the commercial marine which kept up a nursery for the war service; and unless the house was prepared to keep up in time of peace a maritime strength, which the sudden emergency of war might call forth, he was at a loss to see how the public service could, at such a crisis, be adequately provided for. He could positively say, that the service of the navy was never upon a better footing than it was at this moment; and he could with equal confidence declare, that the principle of the hon. member's motion was calculated to interfere with the maintenance of due discipline.

Mr. Robertson declared his conviction, founded upon practical experience, that the discipline of the navy could be maintained without the infliction of degrading corporal punishment. He had himself commanded ships in the Indian trade as large as vessels of war, and had often navigated them with a mixed crew, sometimes with only three real sailors fit for their whole duties, and yet he had done this without resorting to so severe a punishment.

Sir Joseph York said, that his hon. friend who had last spoken was greater than all the great men that had ever flourished in the navy; he was the very Solom of the sea, and ought at once to change his clothes and put on a full admiral's uniform (laughter), for never did man deserve it better. To navigate a ship like a man-of-war, with only three good navigators among the crew, was the greatest achievement he had ever heard of, and to his hon. friend ought henceforth to be given the trust of wielding in the highest rank the thunders of the British navy (a laugh). Then, as to the mode of conducting naval courts-martial, or even the solemnity of inflicting punishment, he could declare that the business was always done with as much system, scrutiny, and form, as characterized civil proceedings at home. How, then, could it be said that men of valour and honour were prone to severity and oppression? Were naval officers, in general, men of an unfeeling nature, or less sensible than other men to the influence of reason and humanity? And how, but upon the notion of their insensibility, could such a question as this be supported (hear, hear)? As to the crews, he did not deny but some two-thirds were good; he would, however, from his professional experience declare, that so far from moral lectures about personal character operating upon them, they might as well talk to pigs (a laugh). Some of them were as insensible as brutes, and bore their floggings accordingly; indeed, they were classed as formerly the hard drinkers were—there were the five-dozen men as there had been the five-bottle men (a laugh). His firm persuasion, however, was, that the existing discipline, or, at least, the reserved power of inflicting it, could not be abrogated (hear, hear).

Sir F. Burdett said, that the subject before the house was one of a serious nature, involving matters of great national importance. However brilliant the faculty of wit might be which any member possessed, it could not be well displayed on so grave an occasion. To say the least, there was no good taste in showing oneself facetious upon questions which affected the sufferings of others, though it might be next to impossible among those who were listening to prevent the feeling of mirth. Now, as he understood the question, his hon. friend near him merely proposed to do that which had been the declared opinion of many able and intelligent men, who had written on the subject during a long time past; the alterations which he proposed had been over and over again recommended by captains, commanders, and other experienced persons; nor had one single statement of his hon. friend received the slightest answer from the gallant admiral who had undertaken that task. His hon. friend contended, that there was no necessity to engage force on the side of government to man the fleets, if they would only proceed by the known motives of human nature—by holding out sufficient inducements to sailors to encounter the perils which hung upon the lives of those devoted to the maritime defence of the country. Men taken by force and injustice into a toiling and dangerous pursuit, could only be kept down to the level of the discipline by other methods which were equally revolting to humanity. What then did his hon. friend propose? He merely said, "Let me, after well considering the subject, make one endeavour to show how you may get rid of all these evils, which every one of you must equally with myself deplore, by bringing in a bill." There needed no questions to be asked; the subject was fully known; all the world was acquainted with the shocking nature of the naval discipline and punishment. There was nothing wanting—there was nothing asked, but the liberty of bringing the propositions of his hon. friend before the house, for their adoption or rejection, as best suited themselves. The gallant admiral had treated his hon. friend as if he were incapable of comprehending these questions of practice—as if he could not be supposed equal to an opinion upon matters of fact. His hon. friend had proved too often his power that way, to make a formal justification necessary. Ministers knew, and so did the gallant admiral, that the head of his hon. friend was full of very useful facts; for he must have surprised each of them in their turn with the knowledge which he evinced of facts connected with their various departments. His hon. friend proposed to take from the officers of the navy the dangerous powers of coercion which they had hitherto held. How shocking was the idea of a beardless boy chastising a veteran seaman of a gallant and unquestionable character! His hon. friend did not propose to loosen the discipline; he only wanted to secure to the officers of the navy a time of reflection between ordering the punishment and executing it, that they might not do that in the heat and hurry of their feelings—an error to which the best as well as the worst minds were liable—which their cooler reason would condemn. For this purpose he had proposed more formal proceedings in naval punishments. He was reminded, however, of the power of the provost-martial, when he had adverted to the milder discipline of the army. The provost-marshal was authorized, in the march of an army to order any man who had flagrantly broken through the discipline, to be hanged up. But the difference of circumstances which could alone justify the exercise of that power, was left out of the question. A general, marching through a foreign country with an army, for the conduct and preservation of which he was answerable to his government, might be compelled to do that which nothing but the absence of all law and established regulations could justify. Besides, the offences, whatever they might happen to be, would be committed in the face, or within the immediate knowledge of the troops; no doubt of the facts, no question of justice, could intervene to do away with the paramount necessity of good order and obedience. But if the provost-marshal, under other circumstances than those, were to exercise that power,—if he put it in force when time might, without inconvenience, be taken to clothe justice with her proper insignia, who could justify the act of the provost-marshal then? As to the plea of the navy having a portion of wretches among them whose principles and conduct could not be subdued without the roughest discipline, the answer was plain—they ought not to let such persons into the navy any more than they were allowed to be in the army. For what was the effect of it but to degrade and subject the honest, honourable, gallant men of our fleets to the low and brutalizing condition of the discharged felons? God forbid that he should have any other view than that of giving equal advantages to the officers; the country could not find means to reward them in a way equal to their actions. He would have their age provided with whatever was befitting to their ease and comfort, and they should pass the remainder of their lives, after bleeding for their country, in honour and happiness. He was of opinion that the country was able to do all this, and provide men, also, without having recourse to that home slave-trade—the impressment—far worse, in his mind, than the African slave-trade, and, as his hon. friend was prepared to prove, with many able and experienced writers who had gone before, more costly to the country in real pounds, shillings, and pence, than would be the fair rewards and bounties, which would be necessary to render the service a desirable object to a certain class of the people. One thing was clear—the motion would do good whether granted or not. His hon. friend had laid his plan before the house, and the effect of all such motions was to diminish the evils. It was now admitted that formerly there did take place, under pretext of discipline, acts of a most unjustifiable nature. He gave the Admiralty full credit for the steps which they had taken in the line of improvement; but it seemed to be with ministers as with some other great philosophers—they required the diligence of flappers continually about them, Parliament might get a little good out of them, but they must not forget the flapper.

Sir George Clerk said, that there had been no case made out by the hon. mover to justify the house in allowing him to tamper with a subject so serious as the existence and welfare of the navy. The endeavour to assimilate naval with regimental courts-martial was obviously improper, because of the necessary authority which must be left, for safety as well as discipline, with the several officers of the ships. The idea of lessening the severity of the discipline by it was altogether erroneous. The inferior officers caused most of the punishments to be inflicted by the complaints which they found it necessary to make from time to time to the captain, who used his own discretion in remitting or moderating them. If this discretion were taken away, the punishments would be more formally adjudged, and consequently more positively enforced. As to giving the officers time, 24 hours or more, to reflect upon what was going to be done, in 99 cases out of every 100, much more time elapsed. The punishments were conducted with the utmost solemnity; the whole crew were called up to witness them. As to a strippling having the power to flog an old veteran, a gallant honourable seaman, undoubtedly if that were to happen, the young gent. would be sent home. The house must look at the delicate situation in which a captain was placed with the health, lives, discipline, and property which he had to protect. Then they must consider the nature of the offences by which that discipline was infringed—principally arising from drunkenness and theft. The number who must be kept in irons on some occasions, with others who must guard them, would make the hands scarce for navigating the ship. The captains were subject to the control of the Admiralty, who carefully examined into their books once a quarter. The first part of the plan of the hon. gent., for raising the wages, was unnecessary and impolitic. They could always get seamen at lower wages than the merchants could get them; so that the only effect of raising the wages in the navy would be to raise the wages of the merchant service. As to the argument which the hon. gent. derived from the fact, that there was no flogging on board the Bellwark for a certain portion of time, it would be just as good to say, that because in one assize-town there had been no execution, therefore the penal laws for inflicting capital punishments ought to be done away. As to limiting the term of service, and awarding pensions, that had been done 10 years ago; and a seaman who had served 21 years could claim his discharge, and 1s. 6d. per day for the rest of his life: a petty officer under the same circumstances, would be entitled to 45l. a-year. In altering the distribution of prize-money, the justice of the case was not so clear. A captain took a prize at considerable risk to himself, because if the vessel were not condemned in the Admiralty Court as lawful capture, according to the law of nations, he might be called upon for restitution. What captain, under more disadvantageous conditions, would encounter such a risk? The arguments of his gallant friend were conclusive—they ought not to tamper with a system under which the navy had prospered for so long a time.

Mr. Sykes had lived many years in a seaport, which had given him a correct knowledge of the horrors and crimes to which impressment gave rise. The town was commonly shaken with riots, growing out of this cause, though rarely by any other. Perjuries were multiplied, to except individuals from the hardships of the service. A little boy got three fingers chopped off, by accident, from his right hand. His father congratulated himself that his child, when grown up, would not be pressed into the service. It was a system, taken together with flogging, altogether loathsome, brutalizing, cruel, and impolitic.

The house divided.—Against the motion, 45—For it 23—Majority, 22.

LAW.

Courts at Westminster.

FRIDAY, APRIL 22.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked the learned member for Peterborough to postpone a motion of which he had given notice respecting the new courts of law. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was not aware till very lately that there existed any objections to the internal arrangements of those courts; but he had since learned that those objections were entertained by the members of the profession generally; and as he had every disposition to secure to the gentlemen of the bar every accommodation to which they were entitled, he did not doubt that upon the learned gentleman's entering into some communication with him upon the subject, some plan could be effected that might effectually accomplish the object which he seemed to have in view.

Mr. Scarlett stated, that the objection he had to urge against the court, had been laid before him by a number of gentlemen, who were highly competent to form an accurate opinion upon the subject. His objections were to the contracted size of the courts, and that, not only in respect of the accommodation afforded to the bar, but to the public generally. It was a fundamental principle in this country, that the proceedings at law were open to the great body of the people, and perhaps, no principle was more indispensable to the pure and impartial administration of justice. The size of the courts now erected was so exceedingly small, that in effect it amounted to an absolute exclusion of the people, and, excepting to the profession, trials would be perfectly secret. He should postpone his motion only on the understanding that the subject would be taken up with a proper spirit by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Judges' Salaries' Bill.

MONDAY, MAY 16.—On the motion that the house should resolve itself into a committee upon this bill,

Mr. Leycester said, this was not precisely the time for raising the salaries of the judges, when the hon. gent. proposed to make corn cheap and to take off a great number of taxes. He would not, however, oppose any measure which went to increase the respectability and independence of those learned persons, but he thought the house should avail itself of this opportunity of correcting many evils in the mode of administering justice. By a better distribution of the judicial power, the third circuit proposed might be made out without any additional labour to the judges. By putting three judges only, which would be quite sufficient, into the courts of Common Pleas, King's Bench, and Exchequer, three judges would be left to spare, and thus the new circuit would be provided for. He was also very desirous to see the Welch judges ships abolished altogether; nothing could be more inconvenient, or unconstitutional, than the having the same man one day a judge, the next day a barrister, and the next day a politician.

The house then went into the committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that all admired and felt the benefit of the manner in which justice was administered in this country, and it was ever an object with parliament that the important situations of judges should be filled by persons in every way competent to discharge the duties of those high offices. With this view the legislature had passed several acts from time to time, providing suitable incomes for the judges, and removing from their office every thing which could in any degree lessen their dignity or diminish their respectability in the eyes of those for whose benefit they were appointed to administer justice. It was to those two objects he would confine himself on the present occasion. His motion would not extend to the Welch judges. His first object would be to carry into effect a recommendation of the commission appointed to inquire into courts of justice in England—namely, to prevent the sale of certain offices in their patronage by the Chief Justices of the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas (hear, hear). This was a practice, which he would not say compromised the personal respectability of the eminent individuals who might hold those situations, but most certainly it did not tend to add any thing to the dignity of their judicial characters. It was true the sale of those offices by the Chief Justices was of great antiquity; for in an act passed under one of our ancient kings for the abolition of the sale of offices, the offices to which he now alluded were particularly exempted. But as he did not think that the antiquity of any practice was a sufficient ground for its continuance beyond the period of its utility, he should propose the abolition of the present as inconsistent with the high judicial dignity to which it was permitted as a source of emolument. He would state to the committee what were the situations, the sale of which he proposed to prevent in future, first observing that they formed part of the income of the situation of Chief Justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas. They were reckoned as income, but it was well known that the emolument to be derived from them was very uncertain. A man might come into office as Chief Justice at an advanced period of life, and find all the offices of which he had the disposal filled by persons much younger than himself: the chances then were, that during a long period, perhaps the whole of his life, not one of them might become vacant, while his successor, after a few years in office, might derive the advantage of having them all become vacant. This in itself was a strong objection to the sale of the situations, as it was contrary to every principle of justice that that which was considered as part of the salary and emolument of individuals of such high judicial rank should be left to depend on chance (hear). The offices in the gift of the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and which he was allowed to sell, were the office of chief clerk, a situation of great importance; the clerk of the treasury; custos breviarum, and clerk of the outlawries. These were offices of high trust, and of very considerable emoluments, which might now be sold by the Lord Chief Justice. Besides these, there were a number of minor offices, though still producing large incomes, in the gift of the chief clerk, and saleable by him; and if it were proper that the Chief Justice should not be allowed to sell the situations in his patronage, it was also right that the same principle should be extended to the chief clerk, who derived under him. The Chief Justice of the Common Pleas had also a number of offices at his disposal, a greater number, indeed, than the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. It was not necessary to trouble the committee with a detail of them, as they would all be stated in the bill which he should introduce. Suffice it then to say, that the same principle would be applied in both courts. Another object which he had in view was to prevent the fees received by the judges from being made a part of their salaries. This was wholly unbecoming the situation which those eminent persons held (hear, hear). It might happen that a suitor might refuse to pay his fees, and it would be absolutely necessary for the judge to take steps to enforce it, or else to forfeit that from which a portion of his income was derived. This, it must be admitted, was placing those learned persons in a painful and delicate situation (hear). With respect to the fees themselves, he did not propose to deal with them. He would say, let them be collected, as heretofore, by the present officers, and let them (after deducting the officer's salary) be paid into the Exchequer, to form a fund out of which part of the increased expenses of the new arrangements should be defrayed. The situation of the Puisne Judges was different from that of the Chief Justices and Chief Baron. They had 4,000*l.* a-year, part of which was paid out of the civil list, part from fees, and the deficiency, if any, was made up out of the consolidated fund. They were obliged at the end of three months to make a return on oath of the sums received in fees. So that, in fact, they were in some sort made public accountants, which he thought was altogether unbecoming their high judicial situations. These were the chief points to which he wished to direct the attention of the committee, for at present he did not intend to enter upon the other recommendations of the commission for inquiry into the courts of justice. As the sale of the particular offices he had mentioned formed part of the salary or emoluments of the Chief Justices, it was right that a fair compensation should be given for the abolition of that sale. At present, the fixed salary which the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench derived from the civil list was 4000*l.* a-year, liable to some deductions for land-tax, and some other fees and duties charged upon it. The remainder of his income was made up of fees and emoluments from various sources, which made in the gross about 9,500*l.*, and deducting the land-tax and other charges, it might be estimated at some few hundreds less than 9000*l.* It was hard to calculate the value of the offices which he had a right to sell, because to one judge they might produce an immense sum, and to another they might be wholly unproductive. Looking at the situation, at its high rank, and its laborious and important duties, he thought it would not be too high when he fixed the salary of the Chief Justice at 10,000*l.* a-year, in lieu of all present fees and emoluments. Next he came to the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. That office was, as every body knew, in rank and dignity, as well as in its judicial importance, in every respect inferior to that of Chief Justice of the King's Bench. However, as the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas would be called upon to give up the patronage of the valuable places he now held, he did not consider that 8,000*l.* a-year would be too much. It was certainly more than the present amount of the fees and emoluments of the office, but taking all the circumstances into consideration, there ought not to be too great a difference between the salaries of the two chiefs; for although he was not laying down the principle that no Chief Justice of the Common Pleas should be promoted at any time to the King's Bench, yet he thought it expedient to attach to the former office sufficient value to check too violent aspirations after preferment (hear, hear). Without going the length of saying such preferences ought never to take place, he would by no means wish it to be a matter of course. The next judicial officer to whose situation he should call the attention of the committee was the Master of the Rolls, who was higher in rank than the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and next to the Chief Justice of the King's Bench. The situation of that judge was peculiar in this respect—that his salary had not been raised when the last augmentation took place in the salaries of the other judges. This was owing to the unnecessary delicacy and disinterestedness of the then Master of the Rolls (Sir Wm. Grant). That eminent person had always declined applying for an increase, or even to state what the increase should be; and he must say, that his disinterestedness on the occasion had not met with the reward it merited. But if sufficient justice were not done to the situation at that time, there was no reason why it should not be at the present. The salary which that judge received, was not in all 4000*l.* a-year, partly derived from the civil list, and partly from Chancery fees: these he did not mean to touch till the committee appointed to investigate the subject had presented their report; and he laid no stress on the duties which the Master of the Rolls had to discharge in the Privy Council, or, if he happened to be a peer, by his attendance on appeals at the House of Lords: this application was not founded on particular circumstances, but on the ground that the present salary was inadequate: he should therefore propose to give to the Master of the Rolls a salary of 7000*l.* a-year. The same sum he would propose to the Chief Baron of the Exchequer. His office was one of great importance, the execution of which required great talents, not only in his capacity of equity judge, but the administration of common law upon circuit. The salary of the Vice-Chancellor he proposed to raise from 5000*l.* to 6000*l.* a-year. With respect to the Puisne Judges, he thought that the pecuniary emoluments of their situation ought to be such as to enable them to discharge their high duties in a manner becoming the rank they held. Their present salary was 4000*l.* a-year; but any one who knew what the profession of the law was, who considered its advantages, and the vast emoluments which men of talent and character were enabled to acquire, must feel that the worst policy was to make the judges' salaries so low, that men of eminence, character, and high abilities, could not, with a due regard to themselves and their families, accept the office until they arrived at a time of life when they required ease, or were afflicted with some bodily infirmity, which required them to retire from the ordinary labours of their profession. His wish was to make them objects of honourable ambition to men of talent while yet in the vigour of their age (hear). With this view, he would propose that their salary should be 6000*l.* a-year. It was true, they had nothing to give up: they had no fees to relinquish; but he thought it desirable that the advantages of the situation should be such as that those who were appointed to it should not be anxious to get out of it as soon as possible (hear, hear). From the manner in which his remarks had been received by the committee, he trusted that what he had proposed would be agreeable to the house. He hoped that no mistaken notion of economy would induce any hon. gent. to oppose propositions which, in his opinion, and in that of many others who had gravely considered the subject, would contribute so much to the dignity of the high judicial offices of the country, and to uphold the character which the English law enjoyed, not only among ourselves, but in the eyes of all enlightened foreigners who had had an opportunity of witnessing its administration. He had omitted to state that the sale of the offices of Chief Clerk, Custos Brevium, and other offices in the immediate disposal of the Chief Justices, should cease the moment the proposed bill became a law. There were, however, some offices at present in the disposal of the Chief Clerk, to which it was not for the present intended to apply the same rule, and on this ground, the chief clerk, and some other high officers, derived their authority to sell certain subordinate offices, from having themselves purchased their own situations. It would not be fair, therefore, to take from the benefits of the purchase which the law sanctioned. It was not, therefore, intended to interfere with their interests.

The resolution was then read. It embraced all the alterations which we have given above.

On the question being put from the chair,

Mr. Denman said, there was so much of the principle of the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to which he assented, that before he adverted to the points where he differed, he would state what those were in which he agreed. He agreed in that proposition which went to prevent the fees taken in courts of justice from forming any part of the salaries of judges. With regard to the abolition of all emoluments arising from the sale of offices and fees, there could be no doubt of its propriety. He was quite ready to make an adequate compensation to the Chief Justices for the loss they might sustain by the abolition of such emoluments, and of the sale of the offices, but beyond that he was not willing to go. He could not see any ground for giving the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas an increase of salary; the office was of much less importance, and its duties less numerous than those of the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and he saw no reason why the situations should be so nearly assimilated in point of emolument. With respect to the Master of the Rolls, the rt. hon. gent. stated the salary to be 4000*l.* per annum. That rate of salary arose solely from the distinguished conduct of one eminent judge; but if Sir W. Grant had chosen to accept a salary equal to the Vice-Chancellor, the house was at that time ready to grant it; and the Rolls Court should be placed on a footing at least equal to that creation of an act of parliament, the Vice-Chancellor, which was an office of inferior rank. With respect to the other judges, no case whatever had been made out. He was in the habits of daily intercourse with many of those learned individuals—an intercourse of great kindness on their parts, and of sincere respect on his. He regretted, therefore, that he felt himself bound to oppose any measure which might be intended to add to the dignity or advantages of their situation; but he had a constitutional objection to seeing propositions made from time to time for increasing the salaries of judges by the House of Commons, which was itself under the influence of the government. The judges themselves did not, he was sure, desire the increase. They had made no application for it; they had now 3200*l.* a-year, after deducting the expenses incidental to their situation; and this was more than they had in 1809; for when their salaries were raised on that occasion, they were subject to the property-tax, an impost from which they were now free. He objected to the principle of making the salaries of judges subject to such fluctuations; it would be more becoming the dignity of their situations to have a fixed sum, to be received at all times, without deduction, than to have a salary varied by particular circumstances. Where additional labour had been imposed, he could see the necessity for additional compensation; and he thought the judges would have acted wisely if they had refused to undertake the additional duties which were recently imposed on them, for, in addition to their own labours, by lengthening the terms, they had occasioned a division of the labours of the bar, which had led to the most inconvenient results to the public administration of justice. However, as that was done, it might be very proper to increase the salaries of the judges of the King's Bench, but he could see no reason why the increase should extend to the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer. For instance, perhaps at the moment he was speaking, being the last day of Term, the King's Bench were sitting, as the Court was so much in arrears of business, whereas the judges in the Court of Exchequer had all left the court at one o'clock, and indeed, in Term time, they generally came down to court between ten and eleven, and rose at twelve or one. It was said indeed that the object of the increased salary was to enable the judges to discharge the duties of their high office with propriety and dignity. But this they did at present (hear, hear, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer). If this were so, he could see no reason why the ministers of the Crown should make them this present. It was an invidious task for any man to oppose the grant; but if it were not resisted, the same practice might be repeated from year to year. If it was intended that the larger salary should be an inducement to men of great talent and in full practice to accept of the judicial situation, he thought it useless. He had never heard of any gentleman at the bar who had refused an elevation to the Bench on the ground of an inadequate emolument. It was not mere emolument that made men desirous to obtain the situation, but the dignity and elevation of the office; and besides that, the certainty of its continuance for life. The active man in full practice, who devoted day and night to the duties of his pro-

feision, was not a man who would refuse the Bench: he was making a fortune which might thereafter be adorned by the dignity of the Bench: in such a situation he should be inaccessible to every sordid feeling; but no mode was so effectual to produce this feeling as exciting constant hopes and fears. Let it be understood, that when once a Judge, he must not look forward to be a Peer; or if once a Puisne Judge, to be raised to the Chief Justiceship; in fact, that there should be no translations, which, in other pursuits, we had seen attended with such mischief (hear, hear). The third assize had certainly imposed additional expense on the judges, and as far as it had gone, was productive of benefits; but the judges were in a situation now in which he was sure they enjoyed the respect and confidence of every man in the country; and it appeared to him, that the salaries of the Puisne Judges would be raised one-half, without any proof that a single individual of professional eminence had refused the Bench on the ground of inadequate remuneration. No case had been made out for conferring on them this bonus of two thousand pounds per annum. It could not raise them in the scale of society; they must be contented to hold respectable stations in a middle class; they would still be much poorer than most of those who were then voting the increase, and they would be more respectable as they were than at the tail of a higher walk in society; they must still confine themselves to those purloins of the town which had recently been spoken of with so much contempt, that one hon. member had said, "he didn't know of such a place as Russell-square" (a laugh). But with their six thousand pounds a-year they would make but a poor figure in Grosvenor-square (hear, hear). On the whole, he could not conceive any arrangement more likely to place the judges in a situation which all alike were disposed to deprecate. He was ready to accede to the augmentation of the salaries of the two Chief Justices; but, with respect to the others, he felt it his bounden duty—and he need scarcely say how painful a duty it was—to resist the proposition, because he saw no good ground for its adoption.

Dr. Lushington regretted being obliged to differ from any of those friends with whom he was in the general habit of voting. He entirely differed from his learned friend, and it was because he thought that the dignity of the bench would be increased by the proposed addition to the salaries, that he supported the motion.—It was said that the judges had not complained of their present salaries. It was true they had never degraded themselves by a petition to the house or to government for an increase; but if it were meant to be asserted that they did not feel the inadequacy of their present salaries, he must from his personal knowledge give the assertion a direct denial. In order to ascertain whether or not the salaries were adequate, the house must estimate the quantity of duties to be discharged by the judges and the expense incurred by them. The labour and expense of the assizes had been materially increased. It was for the interests of justice that the government should be enabled to engage the talents of the most learned men at the bar at a time when those talents were in their prime, and when the corporeal faculties of those who possessed them were still vigorous and unimpaired. The consequence of pursuing a contrary system, was, that when the government appointed individuals to the situation of judges, at the miserable pittance which was now assigned to them, they often remained in harness until they were quite incompetent to discharge the business of the public. Such an occurrence was an evil of a very serious nature; and he would rather see judges appointed at an early period of their life, and retire when their bodily faculties began to decay, than see them promoted to the bench at the very moment when they were least able to perform the duties of it. But it might be said that there was no difficulty in getting individuals to undertake the office of judges under the present system. Allowing that to be the case, still it did not affect the view which he was taking of this question. The great dignity of the situation was calculated to render it an object of desire to many members of the profession; but was that a reason why an individual should be allowed by the public to sacrifice in its service that time and that talent which every man ought to render profitable to the interests of his family? It was an unjust barter to make any man give up to the public, without adequate remuneration, that time and those exertions on which his family had a powerful, and he would also add, a legitimate claim (hear). For this reason, and many more, he greatly approved of the addition which the rt. hon. gent. opposite proposed to make to the salary of the Puisne Judges (hear); nor was he convinced by the arguments of his learned friend (Mr. Denman) that a difference ought to be made in the salaries of the judges of the different courts. His opinion was that a more desirable method than that of apportioning the salaries of the judges to the quantity of business transacted in their respective courts, would be to make the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Exchequer share the business of the Court of King's Bench; and instead of overloading that court with a quantity of business which it could not well perform, to provide for such a general distribution of suits among the two other courts as would ensure to them all a fair equality of labour. The obstacles to such an arrangement were not very important. There was a difficulty in the way of throwing additional business into the Court of Common Pleas, because no person could plead in it who was not a serjeant. He for one could see no reason why that monopoly should not be broken up (hear). There was also a difference between the amount of the costs paid in that court and in the Court of King's Bench. With regard to the Court of Exchequer, all its business must be transacted by a certain number of privileged clerks; and in consequence of the suitors having to pay, not only the fees of their own attorney, but also those of the clerk of the court, very few actions were commenced in it. Now, if all the courts could be placed on an equal footing, and could be made equally economical to the dispendants, he could see no reason save one, why the business of the country should not be equally distributed among them, not only with benefit to the country, but also with benefit to the judges who presided in them. There was also another reason why he thought the salaries of the judges ought to be altered, and that was the great increase of the criminal business of the country. The assizes of the Old Bailey now took up twice as much time as they did some 20 years ago. The business of a third assize had become a matter of imperative necessity in the counties near London; for though that measure had been tried as an experiment for the last three years, the criminal business had been so great at the last Lent Assizes, that the judges had been unable to dispatch the civil business of the home circuit. He saw no reason why the jurisdiction at the Old Bailey, which now took cognizance of offences committed in London and Middlesex, should not also take cognizance of similar offences which took place in other parts of the metropolis which lay within the bills of mortality (hear). The rt. hon. gent. had said, that he should raise the salary of the puisne judges to 6000*l.* a-year, in order to give them a fixed and settled situation. He considered that as a point of the very last importance, especially when he recollected—and he could not mention the practice without bestowing on it his severest censure—that puisne judges of the Court of King's Bench and also of the Common Pleas, had been elevated to the situations of Chief Justices of those Courts in no less than seven or eight successive instances. Such a practice he for one should ever deprecate; it was keeping judges in the constant expectation of preferment, and unless they could divest themselves of the ordinary feelings of men, was leading them to the hope of obtaining promotion, by conciliating the favour of those who had promotion to bestow. In making these remarks he had no intention of alluding to any particular case; he stated that which every member must admit to be fact, who knew any thing of the feelings of human nature. It was detrimental at once to the respectability of the judges, and to the pure administration of justice, that judges should become accustomed to look for preferment to the ministers of the Crown. He did not say that any act should be passed, or regulation entered into, to prevent the Crown from exercising its prerogative in promoting a puisne judge of great virtue and exalted talent to the highest situation in his court—such a power should be rarely exercised, and instead of being a matter of daily practice, it should only be resorted to on extraordinary occasions (hear, hear). There were one or two subjects, not altogether unconnected with the present question, on which he would say a few words. He would give the judge liberty to pass sentence at the Assizes, upon any person convicted before him of misdemeanour, reserving, however, to the Attorney-General the right, if he thought proper to exercise it, of bringing the individual up to London to receive the judgment of the Court. Such an alteration in the law would be beneficial to every party. For what was the consequence of the present system? On the one side the time of the Court of King's Bench was occupied—and this was notoriously the case in all offences against the revenue—in hearing numerous affidavits in mitigation of punishment, and very often very long speeches in support of the facts sworn to in such affidavits; and on the other side, parties were frequently brought to town, and kept there at a great expense, to receive sentence, or remained imprisoned in the country for six months, in the interval between verdict and sentence, which was in itself no inconsiderable punishment. The existing system was, therefore, detrimental to the judges in overloading them with business, and in wasting their time in many instances upon trifling offences, and to the culprit in drawing him from his usual avocations, and in depriving himself and his family of those exertions which he might otherwise have been making to procure his subsistence. He therefore thought, that without deviating from the effective administration of justice, it might safely be left to the discretion of the judges of assize, to pass sentence in the country upon such persons as were there convicted before them of any ordinary misdemeanour. He would now say a word or two on the proposition of the rt. hon. gent.—that all fees now received by the officers of the different courts, should be paid into the Exchequer, and thence be transferred to the consolidated fund. Now that proposition, he thought, must depend greatly upon the nature and extent of the fees received. He therefore trusted that the rt. hon. gent. would keep his mind open upon the subject. In some cases, it was clear that an adequate remuneration ought to be provided for the officers who received them, whilst in other cases, where they went to swell the funds of officers who held sinecures, it might be matter of consideration how far they ought to be continued. He thought that in all cases the fees ought to be reduced to such an amount as would give a fair remuneration to the officer who received them for the duties he performed, and that whatever exceeded such amount should be abolished as impeding the due execution of justice. He concluded by stating his general approbation of the scheme proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. John Williams expressed his regret that the rt. hon. gent. opposite, in the measure he had just detailed to the committee, had not proposed any amendment of the evils of the present system. His learned friend (Dr. Lushington) had proposed several important alterations in our judicial system, which he should have been most happy to have seen countenanced by the rt. hon. gent. opposite. The unequal distribution of business in the three Courts—the late period of life at which the judges were appointed—these and many other points deserved as much attention as the mode of paying the judges. With respect to the salaries proposed to be given to the Chief Justices of the King's Bench and of the Common Pleas, it appeared to him to be extremely reasonable, that an ample compensation should be made to those two magistrates for the loss of the emoluments they now received from what was thought an objectionable quarter. That compensation should be measured by the loss which they absolutely sustained by the deprivation of the fees to which they had hitherto been entitled. The addition which it was proposed to make to the salary of the Master of the Rolls, and of the Vice-Chancellor—and for the last no reason whatever had been given—was so trifling that he would pass it over without further notice. The addition it was proposed to make to the salaries of the puisne judges, he considered the most important part of the scheme then before the committee. He had listened with the greatest attention to the rt. hon. gent. in the expectation of hearing him mention some instance of an individual refusing the situation of a judge on account of the inadequacy of the remuneration; but he had not heard him mention any such instance (hear). He had likewise listened in vain for any mention of the time of life at which the judges were either to commence or resign their functions. The opinion that a man was not qualified to be a judge till he had become an old man, was now exploded; it was almost as absurd as that which represented a man not fit to command an army until he had served five-and-twenty years, and was obliged to be carried in a litter from station to station. A judge, besides possessing learning and judgment, should also possess those corporeal qualifications, which a critic of old deemed essentially necessary to the orator—a quantity of latus et mirum. Now he would appeal to all those who had the experience of the last five-and-twenty years, and those who had more must be almost as old as the hills (a laugh), whether the Judges who had been appointed during that time, had not upon the average been 60 years old at the time of their appointment. That was a period of life at which the mercer, the tobacconist, and the sugar-baker, were accustomed to retire from their respective occupations, because their minds were as unequal as their bodies to undergo the labours of them; yet at that very period, the learned Judges of the land were put upon an arduous duty, which compelled them to undergo fatigue of the severest nature, at a time when, to say the least of it, their mental and corporeal faculties were both waxing to decline. In other words, the public was to be served by men who, if they remained at the bar, would have been deemed incapable of serving individuals. He had not heard that the time of a judge's service was in future to be from 45 to 60 years of age; yet he thought that such a limitation would have been better than letting it run from 60 to 80, or even 90 (hear), or whatever later age was deemed the perfection of judicial wisdom (hear, and a laugh). In his opinion some such limitation was necessary, since no judge, in his experience, with the solitary exception of Sir W. Grant, who was above all eulogy, had ever retired, or evinced the slightest inclination to retire, before the decay of his faculties. He then proceeded to notice the great disproportion of business which existed in the three courts at Westminster. He had that day heard from a learned gent. who practised in the Court of Exchequer, that all the civil causes which that court would have to try at its sittings after term would be about seven, and certainly not more than ten. Now, in the last sittings of the Court of King's Bench the causes entered for trial at Westminster alone amounted to 250; while in the sittings of the Court of Common Pleas for the same place the number was only 25. Independently of the fashion, which led clients into that Court where the most popular advocates practised, there were two obstacles to the admission of business in the Court of Common Pleas and in the Court of Exchequer, which had been noticed already by his learned friend below him. In the Common Pleas there was a closure as to the counsel; in the Court of Exchequer as to attorneys. The consequence was, that an overwhelming weight of business was flung upon the excellent magistrates who presided in the Court of King's Bench. His learned friend had suggested a mode of distributing it more equally among the other judges; but upon that as upon many other points, the rt. hon. gent. had carefully refrained from uttering any expressions which could lead the committee to anticipate any amendment of the existing system.

Mr. Peel said, that at present the whole clear amount of the emoluments of the puisne judges did not exceed 3,200*l.* a year; and the consequence was, as the learned gent. opposite had stated it, that during the last 25 years no judge had been appointed to the office until he had turned 60 years of age. Was not that circumstance conclusive proof that there was something faulty in the present system? And was it not also a strong ground for conjecturing that if the proposition now before the committee were adopted, the country would soon acquire the services of judges with those latus et mirum which the learned member for Lincoln deemed so necessary to the just performance of their duties? If a suitable remuneration were offered, there would be no difficulty in procuring the services of men of talent whilst they were yet in the prime of life and in the full vigour of their understanding (hear). The salaries of the judges ought to be adequate to support the dignity of their station, and it should not be compulsory upon them to defray part of their necessary expenditure out of the fortunes which they had previously acquired. Let the salary be fixed at 5,000*l.* at 6,000*l.*, at 7,000*l.*, or at any other sum which the committee might deem sufficient for the maintenance of their dignity; but let it not be said that a man must possess 60,000*l.* before he is qualified to sit on the judicial bench (hear). The learned member for Lincoln had complained that this resolution was not accompanied by any details of proposed improvements, but as the house was in a committee for a pecuniary grant, the present was not a fit opportunity for entering into a detailed statement of projected improvements; the committee however would see that the carrying this resolution into effect would give the Executive Government great facility in making any such improvements, if they should hereafter be deemed necessary. At present it was impossible to reduce the fees of several of the officers of the different Courts. They had given a pecuniary consideration for their offices, and the fees therefore could not be reduced without injustice to the holders of them. If, however, it should seem good that those who now received them should have a remuneration in lieu, the amount of those fees might easily be regulated. He agreed that the future amount of them ought to be proportionable to the service performed, and that if the purposes of justice would be promoted by the reduction of them, they ought to be reduced without delay. The learned member for Ilchester had mentioned another circumstance, which was a strong argument in favour of the present measure. He had stated that in seven or eight successive instances puisne judges had been promoted to the chief justiceships of their respective courts. Might not that circumstance arise from the inadequate remuneration which those learned personages received? Might it not originate, nay had it not originated, in the circumstance that individuals of great practice at the bar had refused to give up their emoluments for those belonging to the bench? He assured the committee that the circumstance had not arisen from any wish on the part of the Government to exercise an undue influence over the judges, but from the reluctance of the leaders at the bar to undertake those offices with their present inadequate salaries (hear, hear). With regard to the remuneration to be afforded to the Chief Justices of the different courts, the committee ought rather to consider the amount of salary which was adequate to the office, than the loss which the individual holding it was likely to sustain. The amount of fees belonging to the Chief Justice of the King's Bench was 9,250*l.* a-year. Now, the Chief Justice, by the present resolution, would not only lose the amount of these fees, but also the advantage of selling different offices in his court as they respectively became vacant. It would be difficult to calculate the exact amount of that loss; and therefore it became necessary to fix in an arbitrary manner upon some determinate sum for his salary. He (Mr. Peel) thought that 10,000*l.* was the lowest sum which the committee could fix; but if he were asked to demonstrate why that was the exact sum to be fixed upon, he would own that he was incapable of doing it. He protested against the principle of making any distinction between the Judges of the different courts. As they had all to administer criminal justice at the assizes, the difference in their salaries might lead to a general belief that there was a difference in their dignity; and that might give rise to a jealousy between counties, when they found a judge with a higher sent to one, and a judge with a lower to another. He looked with favour upon some of the propositions of the learned member for Ilchester, particularly upon that of throwing open the Court of Exchequer to all attorneys. Whether it would be equally right to throw open the Court of Common Pleas to all the rank and file of the profession, he would not at that moment pretend to determine; it was a question of some importance, and required greater consideration than he had yet given it.

Mr. Scarlett thought that 10,000*l.* a-year was an inadequate salary for the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and below the average emoluments which he received at present. The committee ought to take the gross receipts of a certain number of years, and to regulate the salary, not by the annual emoluments of any one individual Chief Justice, but by the general annual average of them all. If such a calculation were made, he believed that 10,000*l.* would be found less than the average annual amounts of the receipts of the office. He had heard that night for the first time, what the office of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was worth; and he thought that any body who knew the duties of both offices would prefer being Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, with a salary of 8,000*l.* a year, to being Chief Justice of the King's Bench, with a salary of 10,000*l.* a year. Government ought always to have in the situation of Attorney-General an individual qualified to discharge the office of Lord Chief Justice; and that being admitted, the salary of the Lord Chief Justice should be raised to such an amount that no Attorney-General, when called upon to become Chief Justice of the King's Bench, should hesitate to do so, on the ground that his emoluments as Attorney-General were superior to the emoluments of the Lord Chief Justice. With regard to the salary of the puisne judges—and he cautiously abstained from giving any opinion as to whether the salary of 6,000*l.* now proposed was too high or not,—they ought not to be raised to such a sum as to render them the objects of political favour and intrigue. No man ought to fill the situation of judge who had not previously had considerable practice at the bar—first, because that practice must have procured him, unless he were an extravagant man, a considerable fortune; and secondly, because it must have accustomed his mind to the technicalities of law and to the complicated questions which sometimes arose out of them. When James I. wished to decide a legal argument and said to Lord Coke “Why am I not as fit to decide on such a question as you—you say the law is the perfection of reason, and surely I possess as much reason as any subject?” Lord Coke replied, “Your Majesty is not fit to decide upon it. The reason of the law is a technical reason, which can only be acquired by experience; and that experience your Majesty wants.” If only those men were made judges who had considerable practice at the bar, it was probable they would have acquired such competent fortunes as would render any very large salaries needless: those salaries ought not to be such as to make the situation a good provision for the younger sons of noble families, without respect to opposite qualification. In ancient times more than one instance had occurred of the appointment of a judge because he was a near connexion of a possessor of boroughs. It might therefore be not desirable to raise the salaries of the puisne judges so much as was now proposed. When the salary was only 2,500*l.* a year, such men as Lord Kenyon, Mr. J. Buller, and Mr. J. Ashurst, were not deterred from accepting the office; and he remembered a judge not above thirty-six years of age who disposed of five or six and twenty causes a day satisfactorily at Nisi Prius. He denied that the business of the Court of King's Bench had increased of late years—on the contrary, it was not of late as great by a good deal, as it had been 9 or 10 years ago. But by a late act of Parliament one judge in his turn quitted the court at three o'clock, to take upon himself business which used to be transacted in the evening; this departure of one of the judges was felt excessively inconvenient for the business pending at the time in full court, for it interrupted the argument in progress, and led to a postponement, when probably the full sitting until four o'clock, would have finished it. With respect to the proposed arrangements regarding fees, there were some of them which he deemed bad, and would not maintain, while there were others, the continuance of which would be thought beneficial. Of the former, were those taken for offices, such as the sealing writs of error, that were done by deputy—all those he thought bad; but those which he proposed to maintain, were the fees, however small, taken for acts done by the principals themselves; these he had always found conducive to the dispatch of business.

The Attorney-General remarked, that his learned friend (Mr. Williams) had, when he spoke of the judges of the Court of Exchequer, forgotten that they had other and heavy business besides revenue causes to adjudicate; such as the sittings in equity in Gray's Inn hall after term. The bill which had altered the mode of doing business in the Court of King's Bench, originated in the following circumstances. In Lord Ellenborough's time, there was a great accumulation of business in arrears, and the judges of the court felt it their public duty to sacrifice their private comfort and convenience, and to sit out of term in Sergeant's Inn hall, to keep down this arrears. Notwithstanding these efforts, the arrears continued during the whole time of Lord Ellenborough's chief justiceship, and was found in that state by his successor. The subject was then reconsidered, and it was found, that the judges during these sittings out of term, could only hear arguments, and not give judgments; to remedy which inconvenience the bill alluded to was brought in. It was therefore a little hard after this sacrifice made by the judges in giving up their vacation to the public, to complain that they did not as before continue their evening sittings in chambers: it was not just to the judges so to speak of their labours, when day after day, questions of difficulty often arose, which from their very nature, required that the judges should have their evenings to themselves for the purpose of reflection and consideration; and when one of the judges left the Court at three o'clock, the public business was not retarded, for the remaining judges still went on with other business equally necessary to be transacted in full court. As to the general question, the proposed alteration would not give the Chief Justice of any of the courts a higher income than he had at present, including fees. The pecuniary emoluments of the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench were said to be 9,000*l.* a-year, besides the appointment of his chief clerk. This clerkship he had either the power to dispose of, or to sell. Lord Ellenborough kept it, and added its amount, which was 7,000*l.* a-year, until he gave it to his son, so that he must be considered as having had it for two lives, and as enjoying from his Chief Justiceship an income of 16,000*l.* a year. These circumstances must be considered when they estimated the income of the office, and took from it all fees and patronage. It was known that Chief Justice Eyre had, during his time of filling the office, received 30,000*l.* for places he had disposed of; so that the same observations applied to the situation of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. As to the puisne judges, let it not be supposed, as some gentlemen seemed to think, that they had puisne judges from members in that walk of the profession who had had previous opportunities of amassing fortunes for their families. Those who thought so were not acquainted with the details of the law—they overlooked the expensive nature of the education required for such a profession, and that there was no prospect of any return arising from it, until the individual had at least passed 30 years of age. Then suppose such a person to be made a judge when 40 years old, what opportunities could he be reasonably supposed to have had in amassing a fortune for his family? Very few judges in his time had found such opportunities. But it was said, where is the instance of any person having refused a judicial office upon the ground that he could not afford to support the dignity of such a station? One of the most learned judges on the bench, Mr. Justice Dampier, when offered a puisne judgeship, declined it on that account; but a few years after, when ill-health had befallen him, applied for and obtained the office, in the administration of which he shortly after died. There was a case in point. Then, as to the amount of salary: what was 3,200*l.* to support the rank, and station, and expenditure of a judge? If a man at the bar had that income, it was possible for him to lay by 2,000*l.* a year of it by the economical regulation of his expences: but a judge could not do this without lowering the dignity of his office; neither could he appropriate any part of such a sum for the ulterior provision of his family. An alteration in the incomes of the judges had therefore become absolutely necessary; he would not say whether this was, or was not, the precise scale upon which the alteration should be fixed, although he thought the proposed addition sufficiently moderate. As to what had fallen from some of his learned friends opposite, respecting other arrangements in the administration of justice, he could assure them, that he would direct his attention to their suggestions respecting the arrangements of the Court of Exchequer; at the same time, he felt it to be a difficult question, as the Exchequer was a Court of equity as well as law. Besides, it by no means followed that if that Court were thrown open to more general business, the business of the King's Bench would diminish; for wherever there was a favourite Court (as the King's Bench was), there the rush of business would still continue, and merely leave, at particular times, its overflowings to pass into the other Courts. When gentlemen considered what was the situation of the office of judge, he called upon them to see how they were often borne down by the pressure of their professional business, and to reflect how much better it would be were they able to devote themselves occasionally to the cultivation of the science and literature which formed a part of the studies of their youth, and to become more identified with the pursuits and business of the world. He was disposed to give every facility to the suggestions for altering the mode of business in the Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas; and he saw no reason why the latter should not be open to the King's counsel and juniors of the profession, in the same manner as the Court of King's Bench was to sergeants.

Mr. Hume had listened with great attention to what had been said during this discussion, and never recollected a question which seemed so little ripe for decision. The gentlemen of the profession were all at variance upon it, and the supporters of the measure had failed in showing that for half a century, except in one solitary instance, any member of the profession had refused the office. Where, then, was the difficulty of getting able men to fill the bench? And without that difficulty, where was the necessity for this motion (hear)? Why should they give large emoluments to public servants who made no complaint of their being insufficiently remunerated? But it was said that a judge ought to have time for scientific studies. How would increasing his salary give him more time for such acquisitions, or afford him any relief from that mass of business with which it was alleged he was now overwhelmed? If they began in this manner, they would be called upon to go on augmenting the salaries of public officers, until the Government would have an excuse for refusing the people that reduction of the public burdens which the condition of the people so imperiously demanded. Were they to legislate on the single exception of Mr. Justice Dampier's refusal—that was, upon one occurrence in 50 years? There was, he contended, no ground before them for the motion, which at all events ought to be preceded by a commission, or a committee, to inquire into the duties and emoluments of the judges. They had a right to know the value of the 40 offices which were understood to be in the patronage of the chief justices of the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas. It was an enormous step to increase at once the puisne judges' salaries from 3,200*l.* to 6,000*l.* a year. Now that money was finding its proper value, the Government might think of reducing, not increasing, the burdens of the people. The measure was ill-timed; and if any amendment were offered, he should support it.

Mr. Denman then said that he would adopt the suggestion of proposing an amendment. No reason had been given for altering the salaries of the puisne judge, except the single exception of Mr. Justice Dampier's case. It struck him (Mr. D.) as extraordinary, that while the Government avowed such a desire to encourage men in the prime of life to undertake the office of judge they should have so recently appointed a chief baron who was seventy years of age. The learned gent. then moved as an amendment, "that no part of the emoluments or salaries of the two Chief justices of the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas should in future be paid out of the fees or the sale of offices; and that a reasonable compensation should be allowed the same in lieu thereof; and also that the office of Master of the Rolls should be put in point of salary upon the same footing as the Vice-Chancellor."

Mr. H. Drummond thought that he might well recommend the Scotch judges to the liberality of Parliament. He spoke the sense of his constituents when he declared that nothing would be more grateful to them than a reasonable addition to the salaries of those very useful public officers. He gave his cordial support to the motion, though there was nothing in the amendment which he felt disposed to oppose.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, there might be very good grounds for increasing the salaries of the Scotch judges: the circumstances of their case differed so materially from those of the English judges, that they were not necessarily connected with the deliberations of the house. The salary of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, for example—had been augmented since the increase of the salaries of the English judges.

Colonel Bagwell urged the necessity of improving the salaries of the puisne judges in Ireland.

Sir F. Burdett said, from all that he had heard, he was convinced of two things—that he was not competent to form an accurate opinion upon the whole of the subject; and secondly, that the house was in possession of no information on which they ought to act in a measure of so much importance. The arguments of the advocates went to show, that the Judges had more extensive duties to perform than they were able to perform; and this, it appeared, was to be remedied, not by an increased number of Judges, or by any other mode of doing business, but by what?—an increase of salary. The whole of Europe agreed that our laws required revision, but this was not the mode chosen by Government to decrease the mass of business. If any increase of salaries to the Judges would enable the people to come into Court and obtain justice with little expence and with little delay, this would indeed be a great national benefit; but nothing of this sort was even pretended.—It was said that the present salary was not sufficient to induce men of talent and learning to accept of judicial situations; if so, he was ready to make the emoluments of such officers equal to the expectations of men of talent and ability. He could not, however, agree with those who entertained such an opinion.

Mr. Scarlett moved an amendment upon the amendment, for fixing the salaries of the chief justices by the average of the emoluments of the last 20 years.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the plan was not so fair as it appeared to be. Some of the judges in the succession profited largely by the sale of the offices under them; with others none fell vacant during their whole public life. The present chief justice had as yet made nothing of his office, and if infirmity should require him to resign, he would have no benefit from his long service.

Mr. Hobhouse objected to enlarging the salaries. It was characteristic of human nature, that a man might be tempted from his honesty by 6,000*l.* a-year, whose integrity would not be shaken by 4,000*l.* There were 650 barristers in practice, and no less than 500 places to divide among them. In one court there were 125 places. In this court one person connected with the first office in the state held four offices. These were cases far more worthy of the labours of the rt. hon. gent., than the raising of the salaries of the judges.

The amendments were severally negatived without a division.

Sir John Wrottesley then proposed as an amendment, in respect of the salary to the puisne judges, to substitute 5,000*l.* instead of 6,000*l.* per annum.

Mr. Denman remarked on the inconsistency of which the framers of these resolutions would be guilty, if they left the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland with a less salary than one of the puisne judges of England.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

FRIDAY, MAY 20.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the order for receiving the report on the resolutions relative to the increase of salary to the judges be read.

The order was accordingly read.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in moving that this report be received, took occasion to notice certain observations that had been made on a former evening respecting the proposed increase to the salary of the judges. Understanding it to be the wish of the house that the retired allowance of the puisne judges should be reconsidered, he had devoted his attention to that point, and it had led to a modification of the full salaries (hear). His object, as he had already explained, in proposing 6,000*l.* a year to the puisne judges, without any proportionate increase of the retiring incomes, was two fold—1st, to induce younger men of eminence in the profession to undertake such offices; and 2d, to make the income such as would be worth the acceptance of men of great prospects in the profession—neither of which considerations had been, he thought, sufficiently attended to in the existing state of things: He had also considered the subject of promoting judges from one situation to another, but had not come to any fixed conclusion upon it; for though he thought it a highly prejudicial principle that promotion on the bench should be made a reward for the discharge of particular duties in that high station, yet he felt it would be going too far to say that in no case should it be competent for the government to make such promotion (hear). With respect to the retiring allowances, and the consequent modification of the full salary, he proposed to deduct 500*l.* a-year from the original proposition of 6,000*l.* a-year to the puisne judges, and to add the 500*l.* so deducted to the retiring allowance of 2,500*l.* a-year; so that the full salary would be 5,500*l.* a-year, and the retiring one 2,500*l.* This arrangement could not, he thought, be reduced without compromising the double object of securing men for the office at an earlier period of life, and of that class of eminence which the duties of the bench required. The question of the retired allowances could not be regularly modified, on the bringing up of this report, but he would propose it on a re-committal of the particular resolution which embraced that branch of the subject.

Mr. Scarlett could not forbear noticing the proposed arrangement for retiring allowances. When it was considered how few did retire, economy could hardly enter into the consideration of the amount of the allowances. If a judge, then, were to receive 5,500*l.* a-year while on the bench, 2,800 a-year appeared to him too little, for a retiring allowance, and hardly enough to enable the individual to maintain that station in society which his previous office required. The effect of being too economical in the retired allowance, might be detrimental to the public service, by compelling a judge to remain longer in office than his health and faculties warranted. He remembered, indeed, an instance of this: the late Baron Wood, who was an excellent judge, a profound lawyer, and a person of great sagacity, at a very advanced age retired from the northern circuit: and instead of quitting the profession altogether, was offered the seat in the court of Exchequer, which he could not, under the circumstances, well refuse. The Baron's infirmities, however, grew upon him so fast, as to render it most unpleasant to himself, to the bar, and to the public, to have the administration of justice conducted by him. To remedy such inconvenience, the retiring allowance ought to be 3,500*l.* a-year. It ought to be remembered that a judge could not retire when he pleased—the Government had always the option of requiring his full services, as long as it was obvious that he was capable of performing them. An expedient might be devised for rendering those learned persons useful even after they had retired; he meant in the Privy Council (hear). The subjects in the British colonies, which, be it remembered, comprised the whole Indian empire, had only the Privy Council to appeal to, and the judgment there was final. Of what importance then was it that the Privy Council should be so composed as to be enabled to adjudicate with true legal precision! He had known in times gone by (for he spoke not of the present), the greatest ruin occasioned by precipitate decisions of the Council. How could it be expected that gentlemen not in the habit of administering justice, and unavoidably destitute of technical knowledge, should be able always to decide correctly upon the complicated questions that came before the Privy Council? This cause of complaint did not always arise: for while Sir William Grant attended the Privy Council, they were sure of the aid of a lawyer of the most perfect constitution, but the public had not always the benefit of his great knowledge and talents; for he remembered, that at the time when Sir William Grant for some reason declined attending the Privy Council, he (Mr. S.) had on one occasion to attend there; and he recollected that seven appeals were at that time decided contrary to the way in which all the lawyers present thought they should have been. Now, would it not be well to call upon retired judges to assist on these occasions, by making them members of the Council? The labour would be much less than that on the bench, and the duty such as a retired judge could generally discharge without oppressive fatigue. In this view he wished to be liberal in the retirement allowances.

When the report was brought up, on the resolution respecting the salaries of the Judges being put from the chair,

Mr. Brougham agreed without a single exception in all that had just fallen from his learned friend, whose great experience, varied opportunities, and profound knowledge upon such matters, justly entitled him to great weight in this discussion. It was, he could assure the house, the universal opinion at the bar, that the retiring salaries of the judges ought to bear a nearer proportion to their full emoluments; he therefore was one of those who thought the proposed scale was a bad one, and particularly respecting the arrangement for the chief justice, who was to give up so much valuable patronage for so inadequate a compensation as 300*l.* additional a-year. There was no comparison between the duties of the chief and puisne judges, and it was of the utmost importance that the former should, from the dignity of his station, be enabled to exercise that proper sway which the due discharge of business required, and which could not be practically effected, if the four sitting judges were to be nearly of co-ordinate influence. Where much business must be done, a great deal depended on the lead which should be taken by the chief judge. Whatever therefore diminished the emoluments of the chief justice, must pro tanto diminish that sway in kind and station with which for the good working of the business of the court he ought to be clothed. Besides, a chief justice had a quantity of business peculiar to himself, and beyond all comparison greater than that of the other judges. Lord Ellenborough had gone to Guildhall with a paper containing 368 causes, which he disposed of to the astonishment and admiration of the profession. The business was not now so great as it was then, but still it was five times greater than in the time of Lord Mansfield. The puisne judges had the whole adjournment from the 24th of November till the 23d of January. The chiefs, it was true, did not go the spring circuits; but then they had their sad prius sittings from nine o'clock every morning till four o'clock, and the constant taking down of evidence was much more laborious than merely hearing arguments at the bar. As a proof of the superior sway which attached to the chief justice in proceeding with business, he remembered that shortly before Lord Ellenborough retired, one or two of the puisne judges were in the habit of sitting for him by turns, at sad prius; but, vexed one morning at the accumulating arrear of business, his lordship, as if by a sudden illumination which was to shine out before his mental light became eclipsed for ever, resumed his place in court, and swept away in the course of that single sitting 17 causes, which stood in the way of the regular and quick dispatch of business. It was this consideration of the value and the great additional labour of the chief justice, which induced him to say that 800*l.* a year additional was no remuneration for the proposed transfer of its patronage, containing, among others, two offices which sold for 20,000*l.* His next objection to the scale was regarding the office of Vice-Chancellor—now filled by Sir John Leach, who was really the ornament of the equity courts. The Lord Chancellor was of course a learned man—a very learned man—he must be deemed the most learned of the lawyers; but still the value of all these acquisitions must be measured by their public utility, and that almost entirely consisted in their application to the dispatch of business; it was there that the Vice-Chancellor shone conspicuous, and he at least of the Chancery judges, absit invidia, thought that the duty of a judge was to adjudicate: the Vice-Chancellor was no political partizan, he did nothing else but decide causes. He sat in his court, not like a political judge, from eleven till two o'clock, but from ten to four—ay, and he used to come down while suffering excruciating torments from indisposition, and when his physician said that he was fitter for his bed than for the bench—nevertheless, the Vice-Chancellor was in his court, and dispatching business. He was therefore to all intents and purposes a judge, if the person deserved that name who was really a judge (a laugh). He knew many who would rather run the risk of having their causes hastily decided before the Vice-Chancellor, than never have them decided at all elsewhere (hear, hear). And yet this was the judge whose salary in the scale was to bear no adequate proportion to that of others in the same line of rank. This able judge, who got through ten times more business than the Master of the Rolls, was to have only 6000*l.* a-year, just the salary of a puisne judge, although he ranked before the Lord Chief Baron, and immediately after the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, whose salary was 8000*l.* a-year. The Master of the Rolls was to have a salary of 6000*l.* a-year with the addition of a house, when no place of residence whatever was to be granted to the Vice-Chancellor, who, in point of fact, did all the business of the Chancery Court (hear, hear). To what could such an arrangement be attributed? Surely not to any political prejudices (hear, hear). The Chief Baron, who had little or nothing to do, was to have 7000*l.* a-year, while the Vice-Chancellor, who did so much, was to have only 6000*l.*; and the Chief Justice of the Pleas, who had not one half of the business of the Vice-Chancellor to perform, was to have a salary of 8000*l.* a-year. He could assure the house, that all the barristers in Westminster-Hall were perfectly astonished when they heard of these arrangements. The salary of 8000*l.* a-year for the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas trod too closely upon that of the Chief of the Court of King's Bench, who was Chief Justice of all England. As to the salary of the puisne judges,—and he spoke it in a place from which his expressions would in a few hours be conveyed to the bench,—he thought the proposed scale too high, and that they would be well and truly paid with 5000*l.* a-year (hear). When he said this, the house must feel he gave a disinterested opinion; for it was not pleasant to speak in reduction of the incomes of those in whose presence he must spend nearly the whole of his time, and where it was desirable for him professionally to hold a good understanding: still he must say, that 6000*l.* a-year was for them quite an extravagant remuneration, and he believed there were none more surprised at it than the judges themselves. He saw that the whole bar in Westminster-hall were in one ferment of astonishment at the proposition on the morning after it was made, and they naturally compared the emolument and the duties with those of other offices. There was the Speaker, the first commoner in England, who held an office of great responsibility and heavy labour, attended with great expense, admirably sustained at present, as all must know who partook of the dignified and splendid hospitality of the Speaker's mansion (hear); and yet his salary was only 6000*l.* a-year. What comparison was there between his necessary expenditure, and that of a puisne judge who had only the circuit expense to maintain? Then there was the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, who had to maintain the national hospitality on a suitable scale, in the presence of foreigners of rank,—who had his household expenditure also swelled by the maintenance of messengers,—whose business consisted of no sinecure (hear); for he had to listen to the ambitious pretensions of the Holy Alliance, to fence off all their meditated attacks upon public liberty, in the best way he could; and no doubt it required all his great ingenuity to do so—to make excuses of all kinds for them, both in and out of the house—to correspond back and forwards with these good people—to tell them that to attempt in England to assist in some of their projects would be just as much as his head was worth (a laugh, and hear);—then to manage matters in debate in parliament; and yet all this for 6000*l.* a-year! The puisne judges were only plagued all day with the lawyers, but the foreign secretary was plagued with them all night (laughter)—not so satisfactorily, indeed, for either party, for the lawyers had often a chance of gaining a cause by day, but they had little or none when they grappled with the right hon. gent. by night. On the whole, he thought 5000*l.* a-year was quite enough for the puisne judges; he would propose, then, at once, to lop off 500*l.* from the resolution of 5500*l.* a-year, and he had no doubt in this reduction he should have the assistance of his learned friend near him.

Mr. Scarlett.—“No, indeed, you shall not” (loud laughter).

Mr. Brougham, well, then, he must do it himself (hear.) Let him not be told of the refusal of professional gentlemen to mount the bench for such a salary. It was easy for a lawyer to say, ‘I would not take it;’ which reminded him of an observation of a humorous friend, who had said that it was one thing to ask a man to take a dram when the bottle was on the table before him, and another to say, ‘Sir, will you allow me to send to the cellar for a glass to refresh you’ (a laugh). It was the most idle pretence to say that the members of the profession would commonly refuse the bench even at the present rate of remuneration. He knew of no such refusal. Judge Buller had been raised to the bench at an early age, before he had time to make a fortune at the bar. He would now consider a still more important part of the subject, not the salaries, but the independence of the judges. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, had stated, perhaps incautiously—

ly, that the late king had made the judges independent of the Crown; and the inference was, that he was deserving of the gratitude of the people. Now it was as well, in such a case, to speak the truth; and the facts of the case were, that it was William III. who made the judges independent of the Crown, and the late king did nothing but secure the judges from removal from office at the demise of the Crown. Lord Hardwicke had more accurately stated, that the great hero of the Revolution, King William, had auspiciously protected the liberties of the country by laying the foundation of the independence of the judges, and that his late Majesty had found out the only thing that remained to render them thoroughly independent—the securing of them from a removal from their offices on the demise of the Crown. Whatever had been the motive of this proceeding on the part of his late Majesty, whatever was its principle, or its tendency to promote the object for which it was avowedly designed, he had no hesitation in saying, that it was a perfect delusion upon the people, so long as the Crown pursued the practice of translating the judges from the lower to the higher seats upon the bench. Looking up for promotion on the bench, as in the church, naturally tended to make men look rather to their maker, than to the public good. He spoke of the office of common law judge, and not of the office of Chancellor, which, being partly judicial, and partly political, must of course more expose the possessor to influence; and he could not, as an honest man, say that he had not sometimes seen a certain effect on some judges from particular bias—he admitted it to be rare, and accountable for from peculiar circumstances—but generally the bench was admirably filled; still the Crown ought, for its own sake, to remove the sort of tendency to which he alluded, or the possibility of its existence. If they wished to preserve the purity of the judges in the public esteem, they ought to put them above suspicion. He foresaw the difficulty which would be opposed to his proposition, and the choice which would be left to him between the positive prohibition to translate a person of high merit in default of finding any candidate so competent, which might occur once in half a century, and the other danger which he dreaded of constant translation. Between those two evils he would elect the first. He would have less dread of the translation of a Master of the Rolls—he would have no predispositions as to questions of political libel—he would have no peculiar feelings acquired from judicial habits in administering the law of high treason—nor in any of the great questions which affected the interests of the Crown, the revenue, or the tithes. His wish was, however, to emancipate the judges altogether from any bias on their judgment, and from any suspicion of bias in the public mind. In the last reign he knew but one instance of the translation of a judge, namely, Chief Justice Eyre; and he did not recollect any other up to the time of the Regency. But of late years the practice had increased, so that in 15 years there had been no less than six acts of judicial translation. The first of these cases was that of Sir V. Gibbs, a man of very decided political character; and therefore, in ordinary calculation, liable in a considerable degree to the influence to which his observations referred, though, as he very willingly admitted, in practice a very pure, impartial, and enlightened judge. He was attorney-general in very troublesome times; then was made a puisne judge of the Common Pleas, and after that Chief Baron of the Exchequer; then Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; and he might have been Chief Justice of the King's Bench, but his infirmities grew upon him so fast, that he died in a year or so after his last promotion. The next case was that of Baron Thompson, a truly venerable judge (hear, hear, from the ministerial side)—no man more readily admitted his high qualities and judicial excellence, his eminence as a lawyer, and his amiable disposition. He was first a Master in Chancery, then a Puisne Baron of the Exchequer, then Chief Baron. And here he could not but observe how groundless were the fears of not being able to get able men to accept these offices. A Master in Chancery had one of the easiest and most lucrative situations under the Crown; and yet Chief Baron Thompson gave up all the delights and advantages of it to go into the Exchequer, one of the duller courts in the universe (laughter), to attend the Old Bailey, and to drudge upon the circuit. At that time, too, the salaries were much less than at present. The next case was that of Baron Richards, first Solicitor-General, then Puisne Baron, then Chief. Lord Chief Justice Abbot was at first a Puisne Judge. He admitted that no man more able, more perfectly competent in all respects, could have been chosen. Chief Justice Dallas was the sixth case, and Chief Justice Best the seventh, and all in 13 years. It was vain to talk of any other rule; what had once been an anomaly, and a shameful anomaly, had now become a common practice, and that under an administration that had claims to moral principle and a regard to decorum (hear). This was indeed reducing the Bench of Judges to the level of the Bench of Bishops, and a translation on one bench might soon, politically speaking, be as well understood, as a translation ever had been understood upon the other. It was placing the duty and the interests of the judges in perpetual conflict, a situation in which human integrity had scarcely ever yet been found capable of resisting corruption. If judges were found pure under such circumstances, the public would not believe them pure, and it was the essential, the paramount duty of every Government, not only to keep the ermine unsullied, but unsuspected. Reverting to the difficulty which he had before mentioned, he preferred shutting out the promotion of the most deserving judge once in 50 years, and amidst a dearth of the requisite talent, to leaving the subject so open to jealous animadversion. He meant no offence to any one man—he spoke theoretically. He went by his knowledge of human nature. He proposed to insert in the resolution—"Whereas it is expedient to secure the independence of the judges by providing them adequate salaries; and whereas it is unwise and inexpedient to promote Puisne Judges to be Chief Justices, or Puisne Barons to be Chief Barons."

The Attorney-General thought it would be very unwise and inexpedient to adopt the resolution as it was moved by his learned friend. Neither the history of present or of past times proved it to be at all necessary. A resolution of the house in the last reign had been inserted as the preamble of an act for securing the independence of the judges and the due administration of justice; but that formed no case to justify the resolution now proposed, which if good in principle, ought to be constituted into the rule by legislative provision. If it were wise to forbid the promotion of Puisne Judges, let that be prohibited by statute. But if the matter were to be left to individual discretion, the Crown must be left to exercise that discretion. Any particular abuse in the exercise of it might form a ground for legislative interference; but no instance of such abuse had been pointed out. It was said that these translations were more numerous than in former times. What did that amount to, if in every case a justification were found in the circumstances? At the time of the appointment of Chief Justice Dallas, the place was offered to the then Attorney-General, who refused it. Could it have been offered to a more fit and proper person? Could the situation have been better filled either for the Court or the public than by Chief Justice Dallas? His learned friend had quite forgotten the practice of past times. Lord Coke was moved from the Common Pleas to the Chief Justiceship. Sir Matthew Hale was a Puisne Judge before he was made Chief Justice. Lord Hardwicke was Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and then was made Lord Chancellor. Lord Camden was Chief Justice of the Common Pleas before he was Lord Chancellor. Yet the learned gentleman would lead the house to believe, that since 1810 a new principle had been adopted. Accident had multiplied the cases, but there was no new principle. Lord Kenyon was Chief Justice of Chester and Master of the Rolls before he was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench. What did all this prove, but that the line could only be drawn by discretion, and that that discretion must be left with the Crown? It was against the practice of the constitution and inexpedient, to embrace a proposition of this nature in a resolution, which, if good at all, ought to be carried into effect by an act.

Mr. Scarlett could not reconcile the inconsistency of his learned friend (the Attorney General) in saying, that there ought to be no resolution, with the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in proposing a resolution. If it were inexpedient, why was any resolution proposed? He could perfectly understand the design of his learned friend near him, who wished to pronounce the sentiment of the house (which he must take leave to say was that of public opinion generally), in a way which would hand it down to posterity for the guidance of their conduct. But he invited his learned friend (the Attorney General) to consider the effect of what he had uttered. He allowed no qualification whatever: he declared every resolution of the kind to be unwise and inexpedient. Again, let him only remark the inconvenience of entrenching himself behind individual cases. How was it possible for his opponents to argue with him while he remained in such perfect safety? They took general and abstract grounds, to which the learned gent. without any reasoning upon them at all, opposed individual circumstances. Of course there could be no argument on those terms. Suppose he were to take up the statements of the learned gent. and put a particular case. In the time in which Mr. Garrow was Attorney-General there were no less than three vacancies—two as Chief Baron, and one as Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. Were either of these offices tendered to Mr. Garrow? Was he not a man of eloquence equal to any man—of consummate talent in his profession—of high legal attainments? What objection could there have been to his appointment? Would it be pretended that he was like some other great men who had preferred ease and retirement? Alas! he solicited and obtained the situation of puisne judge. It was impossible to offer an objection to his appointment, and yet three chief justiceships were vacant, and not one was offered to him. It could not be presumed that the Chancellor wished to insult a man of Baron Garrow's character. It was much less to be supposed that he would before that have advised his promotion to the office of Attorney-General, if he had not been convinced that he was equal to the highest offices of the law. Such was the difficulty and inconvenience of arguing upon individual cases. As to the cases of former times, he had always understood that Lord Hardwicke had taken the Chancellorship very unwillingly. The office was not at that period so very desirable; for it was only recently that it could be held for any length of time. But his learned friend (the Attorney General) appeared to forget that the Lord Chancellor held the Seals as a Minister, supported by and remaining in office with his colleagues, and that on former occasions there were no such calculations as those of remaining a quarter or perhaps half a century in office. Therefore it was that Lord Hardwicke declined taking office. The appointment of Lord Chancellor had, indeed, been considered for some time as a precarious one, so much so, that the late Lord Ellenborough refused it. It was also a well authenticated fact in our history, that Lord Mansfield refused the Seals. Lord Camden accepted them, but at the persuasion and entreaty of his friends; it was well known that he never served any purpose, or allied himself to any party, in order to obtain that office. Again, Sir James Mansfield was disinclined to take the Seals; he felt that the fixed salary of a judge was more certain, as indeed it would be in future, unless some Joint Stock Company could be established which would secure to an individual the possession of the Lord Chancellorship for five and twenty years (hear). It was urged that the appointment of Puisne Judges was in the King, but it was well known that the Lord Chancellor had, for years, exercised the right of nominating to those appointments. And yet it must be confessed, that the appointment by the Lord Chancellor, who was himself a member of the Administration, and at the head of affairs, was most likely to bring the office of the Judge to disrepute and disgrace in the minds of the people. The case of my Lord Coke had been alluded to, but it should be recollected that that learned judge, after having sat upon the bench had been removed, and subsequently practised as a barrister; that he afterwards became a member of that house, in which capacity, he believed, he rendered the greatest services to his country. He (Mr. S.), and those who thought with him upon this subject, did not object to the King's exercising the discretionary power of appointing Puisne Judges to Chief Justiceships upon great and necessary occasions. They wished only to establish a rule to the contrary, which rule was only deviated from upon full and ample grounds for such deviation being made apparent.

ly, that the late king had made the judges independent of the Crown; and the inference was, that he was deserving of the gratitude of the people. Now it was as well, in such a case, to speak the truth; and the facts of the case were, that it was William III. who made the judges independent of the Crown, and the late king did nothing but secure the judges from removal from office at the demise of the Crown. It was urged that the appointment of Puisne Judges was in the King, but it was well known that the Lord Chancellor had, for years, exercised the right of nominating to those appointments. And yet it must be confessed, that the appointment by the Lord Chancellor, who was himself a member of the Administration, and at the head of affairs, was most likely to bring the office of the Judge to disrepute and disgrace in the minds of the people. The case of my Lord Coke had been alluded to, but it should be recollected that that learned judge, after having sat upon the bench had been removed, and subsequently practised as a barrister; that he afterwards became a member of that house, in which capacity, he believed, he rendered the greatest services to his country. He (Mr. S.), and those who thought with him upon this subject, did not object to the King's exercising the discretionary power of appointing Puisne Judges to Chief Justiceships upon great and necessary occasions. They wished only to establish a rule to the contrary, which rule was only deviated from upon full and ample grounds for such deviation being made apparent.

Mr. Canning conceding all that had been urged by the learned gent. opposite (Mr. Scarlett), felt bound to come to the conclusion, that the resolution proposed by the learned member (Mr. Brougham) ought not to be adopted. They would find that the adoption of that resolution would lead to a discussion on the propriety or impropriety of every judicial appointment which the Crown might make. If such appointments ought not to be vested in the Crown, let a specific act of parliament be introduced to that effect. But if the Crown was to exercise a discretion in the appointments, let that discretion be free and unfettered, subject however to the opinion of that house in the event of any abuse. Either course would be open and straight forward; but the proposed resolution would have the effect of attacking, by a side wind, every appointment of the Crown, while it made parliament share with the King, or his Majesty's ministers, the duty and responsibility of each appointment. He was most anxious that the judges should be free and independent, but he was also anxious that they should be so placed as to enjoy the confidence and favour of the people. He could illustrate his argument by what took place upon the Regency bill. It then became a question as to the latitude to be allowed to the Prince Regent in creating peers, and it was proposed by some that he should only have the power of extending the peerage to men of extraordinary military merit. Now there was scarcely a man in the house, who did not perceive at once the folly of such a restriction. It might be right or it might be wrong to give this power to the Prince Regent, but it was felt by all that the proposed measure would devolve upon the House of Commons the duty of discussing the propriety or impropriety of each elevation to the peerage; so it would be in the present case. Either let the Crown be restricted by law from appointing to the higher law preferments, or else let it have the exercise of free and unfettered discretion, subject, of course, to that inquiry on the part of the house which any violation of the rights and interests of the community would render necessary.

Lord Althorpe thought the resolution might be adopted with a view to a bill hereafter; of which it might form the preamble.

Mr. Peel was ready to admit, that if it were the intention to follow up the resolution by an enactment, the observation of the noble lord would apply. It had been objected that there was an inconsistency between the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had said "If you enable me to make this liberal increase in the salaries of the judges, there is a probability that in the bill to be brought in, a clause will be introduced to regulate the future appointment of Chief Justices, and perhaps to abolish the practice of nominating them from among the Puisne Judges," and the learned gent. (the Attorney-General) who had opposed this resolution (hear). He denied the inconsistency. The common object of his rt. hon. and of his learned friend was, that instead of judges being appointed in future (as had been the case generally during the last 25 years) not until they were upwards of 50, or perhaps 60 years old, this liberal increase might induce able and meritorious men to come forward for these most important offices while they were yet in the prime of life—as from 40 or 45 to 50 and upwards. He perfectly agreed with his rt. hon. friend in thinking that there was no middle course between leaving the prerogative of these appointments unfettered in the hands of the Crown, or this house's addressing the Crown, requesting it to withhold altogether the exercise of such prerogative; and undoubtedly the House of Commons had the power, if it should see fit to do so, to prepare and present an address of that nature. It was not a little singular, that while the learned gent. opposite had found so much fault with the learned gent. on his (Mr. Peel's) side of the house, for having adduced in his speech no instances but particular ones; that learned member's (Mr. Brougham's) own address was almost entirely confined to the single case of Mr. Baron Garrow, whom he described (and every one must admit with great justice) as a man of the highest talent and learning; and who ought, in the learned gent.'s opinion, to have been raised to the chief justiceship. But to cite instances of this sort was only to provoke discussion on the relative merits of existing judges. The learned gent. himself did not propose to take away absolutely, and under all possible circumstances, this power of appointment. "Let it only be exercised," said he "in cases of rare and distinguished merit." But, supposing this preamble once agreed to, and passed as part of the new law, would it not afterwards be quite impossible for the crown to promote a puisne judge, to the chief justiceship, however extraordinary might be his merits and qualifications, without very great disadvantage to that individual (hear)? Would it not be very unfair towards any puisne judge to select him for a promotion that must of necessity appear so invidious? There was much in the learned gent.'s (Mr. Brougham's) general reasoning against which he was not prepared to contend. All that he desired was to show that in a case of this kind there was but one alternative for the house to pursue. If the crown should ever abuse the power it was invested with in respect to the appointment of judges, it would always be open to the house to proceed for remedy of such a grievance by address. To the resolution now submitted to the house, he must object, as unconstitutional. The House of Commons might proceed on the same principle, by address to the throne, in relation to the appointment of almost every individual holding office by its nomination. The discretion of the crown in these matters ought to be left unfettered, unless it were meant to take it away altogether; in which case a bill for the specific purpose must be brought into both houses of parliament. On these grounds he should oppose this resolution.

Mr. Hume contended, that if a resolution such as that now proposed had stood upon the journals, they would never have witnessed the appointment of Mr. Justice Best to be Chief Justice of the Common Pleas—an appointment which there was not one individual at the bar who did not deprecate. It was unpleasant to the country, and disgraceful to those who recommended it to the crown (hear).

Mr. Sergeant Osborne declared that the hon. member for Montrose, so far from speaking the sentiments of the bar of England relative to the appointment of Lord Chief Justice Best, was uttering those that were exactly the reverse of them. He could safely assert, that no judge had ever been more calumniated, or had evinced higher character and ability, than Lord Chief Justice Best (hear, hear).

Mr. Denman asked, when it was said that if the crown should make an improper appointment, it would be open to the house to address the crown for its retraction, whether it would be possible, in the case of an untried judge (against whom there might exist every objection, but who had not yet proceeded to the exercise of his judicial functions), to do so? Ever since the period at which English judges were declared to be irremovable, except by reason of misconduct, no judge had been removed, in England, from his office. In Mr. Kenrick's case, he (Mr. Denman) did not find that the power of addressing the crown had been resorted to at all—he did not find that any such course had been adopted, nor that any of the servants of the crown had come down to that house to submit to it the propriety of urging that gent.'s removal (hear). The proposition now brought forward by his learned friend, seemed to him to have met the case which it was intended to meet. It would at least have the wholesome effect of giving the crown a hint of the opinions of the people on this subject. As to the promotion of Mr. Justice Abbott to be Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, he (Mr. Denman) would only say, that had there at that time existed a resolution of the House of Commons to guide the discretion of the crown, he thought he could have anticipated another nomination. He would even venture to suggest the name, and that was going very far, of the party he was now speaking of; and whose appointment at that period would have given universal satisfaction to the country, to parliament, and to the bar (hear, hear). It was the absence of some such wholesome resolution that had led of late to these appointments of junior judges to be chiefs; a system which evidently must have this effect—that from time to time the influences of hope and fear must be operating on the minds of the puisne judges, to the disparagement of the purity and integrity of justice.

Mr. Wynn would have been induced to draw a very different inference from the circumstance of there being no instance in a period of 120 years, of the removal of an English judge: he should have concluded from such a fact, not that parliament had neglected its duty, but that the judges had faithfully discharged their's (hear). Mr. Kenrick, as yet at least, had only been prosecuted as a private individual. There were no indictments against him as a judge: how, then, could the crown have interfered with him in his judicial capacity? Since the year 1700 to the present time, there had been sixteen Chief Barons appointed, and only five of them without being previously puisne judge (hear). With regard to Sergeant Lens, he could state that some years ago the chief justiceship of Chester was offered to him, and he declined it. He did not know whether the chief justiceship of the King's Bench was actually offered to the learned sergeant by the administration of the day, but he was sure that at the time his health was in a condition that would have compelled him to refuse any such offer (hear). Upon the whole he thought, that if the resolution proposed by the learned member for Winchester had gone on to declare, that under no circumstances of superior talent, or merit, should any puisne judge be hereafter appointed a chief justice, it would have been more consistent and reasonable than in its present form, under which, at all events, he felt compelled to vote against it.

Mr. Abercrombie said, the facts on which this resolution was founded were indisputable. Two chiefs, nearly at the same time, had been elevated to that rank from puisne judges. To him this appeared to be a course of appointment highly objectionable. There were many trifling circumstances which altogether might form a ground for the removal of a judge, and yet not afford sufficient cause for an address from that house. Mr. Kenrick's case appeared to be almost a matter of indifference with the rt. hon. President of the Board of Control. But Mr. Kenrick, whose conduct was now to be judged of, had himself to try criminals. And what must be their feelings at knowing that their judge himself was being tried, as he might say, before the court of King's Bench in the meanwhile. It was certainly a very fit subject to call forth the observations it had called forth from his (Mr. Abercrombie's) hon. and learned friends. He concluded by supporting the resolution.

The house then divided, when the numbers appeared — For the amendment 29—Against it, 112—Majority, 83

FRIDAY, MAY 27.—The Judges' Salaries' bill, having been recommitted, with an instruction to the committee to make provision for the retiring allowances of the Judges.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the first resolution—that the present salaries of the Judges should cease and determine, and certain others be provided to make up the stipulated amount already submitted to the committee.

Mr. Searlett could not allow the propriety of giving the Lord Chief Justice no more than 10,000*l.* a-year in lieu of all fees. He had a great objection, for reasons which he had formerly stated, to the abolition of some of the fees. He believed that the average emoluments of the office had been 15,000*l.* a-year, for many years past; the least which they ought to give should be 12,000*l.* a-year. He complained that the Puisne Judges were about to receive a considerable augmentation of emoluments, without giving a proportionate increase of salary to the Chief Justice. He begged the house to consider the effects of deteriorating the consequence of that situation in the eyes of the world, and of that profession which the Chief Justice represented. It was with the profession of the law as with the lottery. The aggregate of the property made by it would not cover the expenses laid out in preparing for it, taking in all those who aspired to it. It was by the situation of Chief Justice that people were induced to subscribe their money. If they made free with the ancient fees, perquisites, and emoluments of the Chief Justice, why were they not at liberty to do so with bishopricks? Men of considerable eminence would not be induced to give up a leading practice at the bar, for a salary barely equal, perhaps inferior, to the profits of their practice. The style of living must be taken into the account. The profession lived very much together, and were rigorous critics towards every one in the profession as to the rate and style and expense. A man of good practice might live in his own way, and make a very good figure with half his earnings. Not so the Chief Justice, who was looked up to not only as head of the common law, but as one possessed of dignities and advantages becoming his high station. A man would accumulate less for his family as Chief Justice at 10,000*l.* a-year, than a barrister could with the same sum acquired by practice. He was free to do as he liked in the latter case; in the former he would be chained to hard labour for life; he would be condemned to tug at an iron oar, or, if it should be considered as too harsh a description, at a gilded one. He would advise Government if they wished to induce independent men of the best intellect and acquisitions to accept the situation, not to reduce its consequence or pecuniary advantages, but to do every thing in their power to uphold the dignity of it. With that view he would take it out of the patronage of the Lord Chancellor, whoever might happen to fill that office. It was the duty of Government to provide as many competitors of capability as they could; and the Chief Justice ought to be at liberty to offer himself. But for that reason the appointment of the Chief Justice should not lie with the Lord Chancellor. He could easily conceive a case, though of course it never yet happened, of a Lord Chancellor taking care not to promote any persons to the Bench, except such as were notoriously too inferior to himself to threaten him with danger of rivalry. To prevent that, Government ought to retain the appointment of the Chief Justice to themselves, taking care to bestow it on the best man of their own party. He thought it a great advantage to the dignity of that office, that the Chief Justice should, as often as it could be effected, be made a peer. It would encourage the sons of noblemen to enter that career, if that high reward were rendered a little more certain. A man worth 5,000*l.* a-year might be made a Secretary of State. He would then get 6,000*l.* a-year more. The barrister making 10,000*l.* must resign all that before he could take to the 10,000*l.* which it was now proposed to give him. He concluded by moving that 12,000*l.* be inserted in this resolution instead of 10,000*l.*—This amendment was afterwards thrown out without a division.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could understand the learned gent. in his observations on the justice of abolishing any advantages enjoyed by the present holder of an office, because that would be a breach of the conditions upon which the office was accepted; but he did not so clearly apprehend the abstract rights of individuals to the emoluments of an office to which no one at present dreamt of appointing them.—Judicial offices like all others were fit subjects for the regulation of Parliament. The question then was, whether or not 10,000*l.* would be an adequate compensation to any barrister of eminence for quitting his practice to sit as Chief Justice; between the salary and the dignity of that situation, they were not likely to be at a loss for sufficient candidates. He denied that the present Chief Justice would be any loser, and he was the only party whose interest they were bound particularly to consider. His emoluments and salary together, had averaged 9,200*l.* Deduct expenses of rolls and other instruments for the use of his court, with the charge of the land-tax and civil list, and 700*l.* or 800*l.* a-year which it cost him for his state, and there did not remain 8,500*l.*, so that the resolution gave him an absolute increase of 1,500*l.* a-year.

Mr. Peel said it was as open to the legislature to dispose of the fees of the Chief Justices as of the Secretaries of State. About twenty years ago, a Secretary of State was in receipt of 17,000*l.* or 18,000*l.* a-year, from fees of very ancient establishment, which had in progress of time, and the changes of things, reached this enormous amount. They were abolished, and a salary of 6,000*l.* a-year given instead of them. He thought that if the present Chief Justice would be no sufferer by the resolution, there was not the slightest ground for considering the interest of his successor in the fees to be abolished. The legislature had dealt with many other offices in the same manner, and their power to do so was not be called into question.

Mr. Hume asked if the fees were to be abolished after being taken away from the Chief Justice?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the resolution followed the recommendation of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the nature of the fees and offices. As to the regulation of the fees, he understood that his learned friend near him had a bill ready to bring in for that purpose.

Mr. Hume objected to confining the fees, because they operated as a tax upon those who had the misfortune of being engaged in a lawsuit. He wished to know whether the abominable fees of Chancery were to be diminished; which certainly must be strong inducements in themselves to the Judge to look with more complacency than he ought on the dilatory practices of that Court. Certainly the Lord Chancellor ought not to be the only officer whose fees were to be sacred from the control of Parliament.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained before, that he could yet propose nothing with respect to the Court of Chancery, because the Commissioners had made no report. He deprecated the exaggerations respecting the fees and emoluments of the Lord Chancellor. It was true that he received 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* in fees as Speaker of the House of Lords; but that had nothing to do with the office and duties of Lord Chancellor. In that office he only received 5,000*l.* a-year salary, and about 7,000*l.* in fees. But the salary of the Vice-Chancellor was paid at his own suggestion out of the 5,000*l.* a-year; so that, in all, the Lord Chancellor did not receive more than 13,000*l.* a-year. Was the Lord Chancellor of England overpaid with a salary of 13,000*l.* a-year (hear)? As far as trouble and labour went—as far as consumption of time and devotion to duties were concerned, the Lord Chancellor yielded to no public officer whatever in the exercise of his functions (hear).

Mr. Hume would rather that the Lord Chancellor should be paid 15,000*l.* a-year, than receive a salary which was raised in the present objectionable manner. As to the amount of that learned lord's income, he begged to repeat, that he understood it to be 18,000*l.* per annum; but he did not yet know whether or not the fees on bankrupt commissions were included in this estimate. If not, he begged to say, that those fees formed a very important part indeed of the whole salary.

The Solicitor General denied that any important part of the Chancellor's salary, was derived from bankrupt fees or from the postponement of business.

Mr. Hume said, that when the returns that had been ordered should be produced, he would undertake to challenge the learned gent. to disprove his statement.

Mr. Horsey twice said, that the Lord Chancellor, so far from desiring to delay the progress of business under any circumstances, had lately himself remodelled the bankrupt office. The numerous holidays that used formerly to be observed there were now done away with, excepting only a very few days; and for the additional labour incurred to the clerks by this arrangement they received additional allowances. These allowances, he could assure the house, were paid by the Lord Chancellor himself out of his own salary, which did not exceed 15,000*l.* a-year.

Mr. J. P. Grant observed, that the exaction of fees in courts of justice could be defended on no other plea, in any case, than this—that they were originally intended, and might serve as an encouragement to the officer receiving them to the better discharge of his duty. They became an evil, when they ceased to operate in this way; and were felt only as a severe tax upon litigants in courts of justice.

Mr. Hobhouse really conceived that if the salaries of the judges were to be raised, and they were still to have the appointment to offices in their courts, and the fees until these offices fell in were to remain, the public alone would be the losers by the new arrangement; the judges alone the gainers (hear, hear).

The Attorney-General denied that the public would gain nothing by this arrangement. It was intended that hereafter every officer appointed should personally discharge the duties of his office. Now the chief clerk of the Court of King's Bench (Lord Ellenborough) did not discharge the office in his own person, but by the master. All the fees out of which the salary of Lord Ellenborough, as chief clerk (about 7,000*l.* per annum) was defrayed, went first into the Exchequer. The master was paid, out of other fees, such a salary as was thought adequate to the duties he performed. Now, whenever Lord Ellenborough vacated this office, that amount of 7,000*l.* would be saved to the public (hear, hear), and only the present, or any other income, continued to the actual officer who now represented him (hear). As to the question of the fees themselves, and as to whether they should be got rid of altogether, that might be made the subject of a separate discussion at some other opportunity.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—The house having resolved itself into a committee to consider further the resolution on the salaries of the Judges,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a resolution for granting an additional 500*l.* a-year to the retired allowances of the puisne judges.

Mr. J. Williams enlarged upon the advantages of arranging the salaries and pensions of the judges so as to leave them no temptation to remain on the bench after the decay of their faculties and bodily strength had rendered them notoriously unfit for the duties of their station. The greater the difference between the salary and the pension, the stronger the inducement to weak-minded judges to cling to their stations, in spite of the dissatisfaction of the public. With these views, he proposed as an amendment an addition of 400*l.* a-year to the retired allowances beyond the 500*l.* now moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Denman spoke of making a handsome retreat for the retirement of judges, though he was not very favourable to the increase of their salaries, having been unable to discover any case in which a man of known abilities had been offered the salary of a judge and had declined it.

Mr. Peel said, that the duties of the acting judges had in the course of these discussions been greatly under-rated. It was not in those duties which came in the routine of the courts that their labours were all comprised. After their return from the assize, they had to sit at the Old Bailey. Besides the business of the term, they were burdened with a considerable quantity of business, the amount of which was only known properly in his office. Upon all questions of capital punishment brought up from the counties, there were numerous references from his office to the judges upon the facts which had appeared on the trial. Some of these involved points of law which they had to discuss privately among themselves. Then they were of necessity consulted, as legal advisers of the Crown, upon private bills. In short, their duties were numerous and weighty enough to take up their whole time.

Mr. Denman said that the representation of the rt. hon. Sec. did not altogether satisfy him. He thought it one of the least advisable things to leave that power of after-consultation among the judges assembled in a private room, without the presence of counsel, to determine on points of law affecting questions of life and death. It was a common thing for counsel, prepared to argue a point for their client, to hear from the presiding judge that they need not undertake the argument because such and such a thing had been resolved two or three years ago by the judges in a private room, upon the point reserved on a preceding trial, of which judgment the public knew nothing whatever. There was an equal disadvantage in making them advisers upon private acts of Parliament, upon the construction of which they might as judges have afterwards to decide.

The Attorney-General was induced, upon mature reflection, to entreat his rt. hon. friend to adopt the amendment of his learned friend. It was of the utmost importance to take away all inducement to judges to adhere to the bench when their incapacity or feebleness had made their retreat a matter of notorious necessity. There had been instances where the difference between the salary and pension had been a consideration of such a nature as to prevent a judge labouring under the greatest weakness from retiring.

Mr. Peel said that the amendment seemed to meet the general feeling of the house, and no duty could be more gratifying than to give ground on a point of this nature. He cheerfully acquiesced in the amendment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his alacrity in giving up his own proposition to adopt that of the learned gent. He proposed that the scales of retired allowances for the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Chief Baron, and the Master of the Rolls, and the Vice-Chancellor, should be 3,750*l.* by way of preserving their consequence in a medium between the puisne judges and the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chief Justice.—The resolutions for granting 8,500*l.* to the Puisne Judges, and 3,750*l.* to the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Chief Baron, Master of the Rolls, and Vice-Chancellor, as retired allowances, were then agreed to.

Mr. Hume begged to observe, that in the case of the Master of the Rolls, 800*l.* had been added to the yearly retired allowance. But, on the other hand, no part of the full salary had been deducted, as in the case of the puisne judges. That was left to the Master of the Rolls, at 7,000*l.* a-year; but as he conceived the same principle ought to be adopted in the one instance as in the other, he thought the full salary of that judge should be but 6,500*l.* per annum.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.—On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench bill, and the Common Pleas bills, were read a third time.

On the question for the third reading of the Judges' salaries' bill,

Mr. Brougham rose to repeat that his opinion remained unchanged upon the impropriety of this bill, which he conscientiously believed to be unjust and uncalled for. Let the house look at what had been the progressive increase of the salaries of the puisne judges. A few years ago their salary was but 3000*l.* a-year, and 25 or rather 33 per cent. was then added to make up for the increased price of the articles of life. The prices lowered, but no reduction of the salary was the consequence. Then followed the restoration of the currency, which must again have made a difference in their favour amounting to 25 per cent. more, independent of the reduction of taxes. The consequence of these several additions since the year 1809, was, that the judges' salaries would now be virtually 7,000*l.* a year, as compared with the 3000*l.* with which they were satisfied 15 years ago. If granting these large and unnecessary allowances to the judges, was evincing a faithful stewardship of the public purse, then he did not know what the meaning of an unfaithful steward was (hear). He was astonished at such a lavish expenditure of the public money, when the Secretaries of State had less, although necessarily incumbered with a large expenditure, from which the former were exempt. He wished to see the dignity of the judicial station upheld; he was anxious to see the honour and the comforts of the judges maintained, but he disliked to see it done at this expense, and still more he disliked their being placed in the track of promotion, or translation like the Bishops, because he was convinced that in the law, as in the church, such prospects were detrimental to the public service.

Mr. J. Williams regretted that his Majesty's ministers had persevered in carrying this measure through the house. It would seem indeed from the disinclination of ministers to give a pledge that they would restrict the appointment of judges to lawyers of certain ages, that they were indifferent to the manner in which the duties of the bench were discharged. He knew the difficulty of making any general regulation for the particular age at which a judge ought to retire, for some men were as competent to transact business at 70 years of age as others were at 60. The age, however, at which judges were appointed to the bench during the last 60 years, and more particularly during what might be called the dynasty of the present Lord Chancellor, was painfully remarkable. It did not appear to be a matter of chance, but of system, that the appointments should mostly take place at advanced periods of life. With respect to the pecuniary question, as long as the old system of appointment was continued, the more money was paid, the longer would the office be held by the individual, without reference to the state of his faculties.

Mr. Peel said that nothing could be more difficult than to agree upon any particular age which ought to determine the appointment or retirement of a judge. It would be absurd to say a judge ought not to be appointed until he became 60 years of age, and equally absurd to make that age the specific time for his retirement (hear). He entirely concurred in the general tendency of the learned gent.'s remarks—that considering the bodily labour which a judge must undergo, men of sufficient legal knowledge and experience at the age of 40 or 45, were the fittest to fill the judicial offices (hear). He denied that the course had been to select lawyers at 60 years of age to fill the office of judge. The Government, he could assure the learned gent., entertained no desire to pursue such a course, but exactly the contrary; and if he had not already given a pledge to that effect, he begged now to be expressly understood as giving it (hear, hear).

Mr. Hobhouse asked why the judges should be paid more than the Secretaries of State? He thought that the dignity of a judge was not dependent upon the amount of his salary. Nor could he see the propriety of stimulating the judges to remove their places of residence from the spot in which they were now generally accustomed to have them, and rear the younger branches of their families at the west end of the town. He complained that several useless offices were still maintained about the courts. Among these were the office of clerk of the papers, and the filacer's office. The judges had still means of indemnifying themselves for inadequate salaries, by appointments which remained, and which they would naturally confer upon their families. A number of fees likewise remained that ought to be abolished, and the alien office was also perfectly useless; so opposed was he to the proposed augmentation, that he meant to move, as an amendment, that the salaries of the judges be reduced from 5,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* Another point had been entirely omitted—he meant the principle of making the judges immoveable. They could never expect an impartial administration of justice while the puisne judges looked up to the situation of chief. So determined was he to assert the principle that judges ought to be immoveable, that he would make a motion for its introduction by a declaratory paragraph in the preamble of the bill.

The bill was then read a third time.

Mr. Hobhouse, on the question for its passing, moved that the sum be 5,000*l.* instead of 5,500*l.* which was considered by almost every leading man in the profession as too large a salary.

Mr. Brougham seconded the motion. He had never known the office refused at 5,000*l.* a-year salary; nay, he had never known it refused at 4,000*l.*

Lord J. Russell said, that as the office with the former salary had never been declined within the recollection of his learned friend, there was no occasion to raise it on the supposition of wanting able men to fill it, which was a fear purely theoretical.

The house divided—

For passing the bill, 74; for the amendment, 45; majority, 29.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 23.—The Earl of Liverpool called their lordships' attention to the bills on the table relative to the Judges' salaries and reform in Courts of Justice. He would first move the second reading of the bill for the abolition of the sale of offices in the Court of King's Bench and Common Pleas, but in what he had to say he should advert to all the bills. The object of the bill relative to offices was the prevention of their sale; but the principle on which it was introduced was the doing away with all sinecures whatever. Hitherto part of the remuneration of the judges had been made up by profit derived from offices in their gift; but it was proper that they should have specific salaries, and not depend upon any resources of this kind. The bills before their lordships were introduced to effect this purpose. He had no hesitation in saying that all offices in courts of law, which were sinecures, ought to be abolished, and that those which were efficient ought to have suitable salaries; and in this way only they should be paid. The noble earl then stated the salaries to be given, according to the bill, to each of the judges, and concluded by moving the second reading of the sale of offices' abolition bill.

The Marquis of Lansdown did not mean to oppose the bill, in the principle of which he entirely concurred. These bills gave a sanction to the principle that the mode of paying the Judges, by allowing the sale of offices, was improper, and that the mode of paying them by a fixed salary was to be preferred. He was not so well acquainted with the details of the measures; some of them were said to require alteration. To promote the respectability of the Judges, their salaries should be such as to encourage able lawyers to accept the situation; but their lordships should be careful in their liberality not to be too liberal. The places of the Judges might be overpaid, and whenever an office was over paid, it became an object of political influence. Hitherto the office of Judge had been kept free from such an influence, though it had been stated by Monsieur Cottu, in his work on the jurisprudence of this country, that the Government was always inexorable in requiring that the judges of all the courts should be of its own political opinions. It was therefore right that on this point their lordships should be cautious; and after they had augmented the salaries of the Judges, it would become them to see that this temptation was not improperly used. Another point which he thought should be guarded against, was, the introduction of new fees. He understood that many of the fees now exacted, had been exacted for the performance of duties which the Legislature never intended should be paid for in this manner; and he hoped that care would be taken, after the present fees were abolished, to prevent in future any similar fees from being levied. He called the attention of their lordships to the administration of justice in Wales. The principles of the present measure were, that the Judges should be so well paid as to maintain the first rank in society, that they should be made independent of all political influence, and that there should be few of them. Every one of these principles were the topics of praise to every foreigner, and to all the natives of this country who examined our system. But every one of these principles were violated in the case of the Welsh Judges. There were a great number of them in proportion to their duties, they had low salaries, and they continually received political appointments. He did not know why, when a general system of assimilation was pursued in every branch of the Administration, in the collection of the Customs and Excise, and in all the regulations for trade, that the same principle should not be extended to the judicature in Wales, nor did he know why this gross anomaly should not be removed, and the system adopted in that Principality assimilated to the administration of justice in the other parts of the island. It could not be said, that it was advisable that justice in the remote provinces should be different from justice in the capital. If this were the case, a supreme Court might be established at once in London, and the Judges spared the trouble of going their Circuits. He had, however, always understood, that the great advantage of the present system was, its establishing a connexion between the remote Courts and the higher tribunals of the country, making the administration of justice alike in all. He would not advert to the conduct of persons belonging to the Welsh Judicature, though it might illustrate some of the evils of this system, because that conduct was likely to be investigated before another tribunal, and their lordships might be called on to give their opinion on it. The bill which had been passed last session, for regulating the Welsh Judicature, had been completely inefficient. He knew that more than one-half of the business at Caermarthen at the last Assizes had been left undone for want of efficient means for executing it. He stated this as an additional reason why their lordships should take the state of the Judicature in Wales into their consideration, and regulate it on the same principles as were laid down in the bills then before their lordships.

Lord Ellenborough thought that the bill would be nugatory. If its object were to prevent the sale of offices, that could not be prevented so as to produce any public advantage. If merely the regulation of the offices was intended, that, he thought, would not be accomplished by this bill. His noble friend near him supposed that fees had multiplied, but he could assure him that was not the case. In his office, the most lucrative in the Court of King's Bench, the fees were rather smaller than formerly. There had been no alteration since the earliest record, which was 1605. Sales of office by the Chief Justice never, in fact, took place; but the higher offices were always given to relatives. If offices were to be abolished, that object might be accomplished in the manner which had been adopted with respect to the Court of Exchequer in Ireland—namely, that of buying out the interest of the parties. According to the old system the salary of the Chief Justice was double that of a puisne judge; but now, when all profits were taken away from the Chief Justice, his rule was not observed. From the proposed mode of paying the judges, it would be found that they would soon be insufficient; at present, part of their emoluments depended on fees, and the fees were in proportion to the business performed; if the judges were paid by a salary it would soon be necessary to increase their numbers. There was a great public convenience in the practice which gave seats in that house to high law officers. Did their lordships think that 10,000*l.* a-year, without any addition of private fortune, would be sufficient for a judge who was to be made a member of that house? There was a great inequality in the retired allowance given to the Chief Justice and Puisne Judges. The Puisne Judge had a salary of 5,500*l.* a-year while performing the duties of his office, and a retired pension of 3,500*l.* The Chief Justice had a salary of 10,000*l.* a-year, and his pension was only 4,000*l.* He thought that this glaring disproportion should be corrected. The noble lord concluded by repeating his opinion, that the public would obtain no advantage by those measures, and that he thought the objects in view might have been accomplished by better means.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted that the bill for the abolition of the sale of offices could not take effect for a considerable time with respect to offices already sold; but as to the prevention of the future sale of offices, its operation was immediate. With regard to offices already sold, there were only two ways of accomplishing their abolition, either by buying them out at once, or suffering them to expire. Both methods were equally just; but he was sure that in this case great difficulty would be experienced in trying the first; for those who were interested in such offices would not be easily satisfied, and the Government would be liable to the imputation of giving too much to some, and too little to others. The best course, therefore, appeared to be that of allowing offices to expire. Nothing could be more improper than that judges should be rewarded by a means so liable to imputation, as that of the sale of offices. The noble lord had objected to the salary of a Chief Justice not being double that of a puisne judge; but the question to be considered was what would be a fair remuneration for a person placed at the head of the Court of King's Bench. With respect to the alleged disproportion of the retiring allowance, that was founded upon the consideration that the puisne judge could not be able to make any great saving out of his salary, and that he therefore ought to have a considerable allowance on retiring. There was more chance of the Chief Justice accumulating a fortune, not only considering his salary, but the probability of his having made considerable savings before his appointment to the bench.

The Lord Chancellor wished the sale of offices in courts of justice to be done away with. He had always thought the practice very improper. His reason for so saying was, not that any Chief Justice, either of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, had ever made an improper use of the patronage they possessed, but because public opinion never could be satisfied that they might not. The administration of justice should be placed far above suspicion, and the possibility of that suspicion was a great objection to the sale of offices. But he had another reason for wishing the practice to be done away with, which was, that persons who bought offices, naturally thought themselves very ill-used if any reforms were made which affected their interests. He did not suppose that any Chief Justice had ever refrained from making such reform as he thought necessary, notwithstanding the opposition of interested parties; but it was necessary that those who administered justice should stand clear in public opinion. With respect to the offices called sinecures, their lordships would concur with him in the propriety of their abolition, as well as in the proposition for paying efficient officers by fixed salaries. As to the increase of the salaries, their lordships would recollect that the Chief Justices had received no augmentation of salary for a long series of years. If patronage were given to them in place of salary, the continuance of that system was the fault of Parliament, not of the Chief Justices. With respect to the low salaries of the puisne judges, he could only say that all the judges he had ever known had always done their duty in such a way that it could not have been better performed had their salaries been ten times greater. This arose from that great security for the good conduct of the judges in this country, the publicity of their proceedings. It had been asked why the Chief Justice and the puisne judges should not be placed on the same footing with regard to the retiring allowance; but his noble friend had given a very satisfactory reason for that disproportion, and he wished their lordships to consider that it was a very delicate thing for lawyers of talent to take the situation of puisne judge under the circumstances in which they had for some time past been called upon to accept such appointments. The situation which he had held at the head of one of the courts of law, and which he had desired more than any other, and retired from with regret, was not to him a profitable situation. His practice at the bar produced three times more than he received from it. With respect to the office which he now held, many erroneous notions prevailed. No effort of his had yet been able to convince the public of the real fact, with regard to the office of Chancellor of Great Britain, which was, that its emoluments did not produce one farthing more than they did a century ago, but in truth a great deal less. Much had been said of the patronage of the Court of Chancery—of offices given to relations and friends; but if it did not turn out upon investigation that he had been more sparing of patronage than any of his predecessors ever had been, then let him stand convicted before their lordships. With regard to what had been observed on the state of judicature in Wales, he should only say, that ill as the Welsh judges were paid, for one appeal or writ of error that came from them, there were a hundred from the English Courts.

The bill for the abolition of the sale of offices and the other bills connected with it were then read a second time.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Upon a motion by Lord Liverpool for the third reading of the Judges' Salaries' bill,

The Lord Chancellor complained in the strongest terms of the misrepresentations and calumnies which had gone forth respecting the emoluments of his office, although the amounts of its profits had been already given in accounts before the House of Commons, and the means were apparent for the correction of such mistakes. Perhaps it was thought that this mode of calumnious misrepresentation was the way to get him out of office: they were mistaken who thought so; he would not yield to such aspersions, nor shrink from asserting what he owed to himself. Had he been treated with common justice, he should not, perhaps, have remained Lord Chancellor this day, but he repeated he would not be driven from his office by calumnies.

own attack. Let him only be treated with common justice, and in five minutes his office should be at any body's disposal. From the accounts which had been furnished to him of his emoluments as Lord Chancellor, by those who best knew the amount, apart from his income as Speaker of the House of Lords, he was happy to say, that the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench had received a larger income from his office. He quoted from the average accounts of the last three years; and he would further say, that in no one year, since he had been made Lord Chancellor, had he received the same amount of profit which he enjoyed while at the bar. Strange, then, it was, that he should be attacked as he had been by misstatements and misrepresentations of every kind. If he remained at the bar, and kept the situation he held there, he solemnly declared he should not be one shilling a poorer man than he was at this moment. His noble friend (Earl Grosvenor) should not have blamed him for not bringing this subject before the house earlier. It had often been brought forward, and it was thought that the emoluments arising from the sale of offices should not be interfered with, because, had they been abolished, the Chief Justices of the supreme courts must have received a compensation in some other way. It was therefore concluded that parliament made a good bargain for the public in allowing them to remain. When the salary of the puisne judges had been augmented from time to time, no augmentation had taken place in that of the chiefs, because they were considered as deriving part of their emoluments from this source. It could not for a moment be supposed that having entered on the laborious duties of their office under the conviction that its emoluments were to be secured to them by law, they could be turned adrift without any regard to their rights. The parliament had said by the act abolishing sinecures and regulating offices, that no sinecures should exist after the present vested interest should expire; but the present possessors had just as good a title by law to their emoluments, as their lordships had to their estates. The noble earl entirely misunderstood the question with regard to sinecure offices. Bills had repeatedly been sent up from the other house for abolishing them, and they had been resisted, because the persons who brought them here did not understand the question. It was assumed that because the deputy did all the drudgery of the office, therefore the principal was of no use. The doctrine was founded on a mistake: the presence of the principal might not always be required—his superintendence might not be given from day to day—but it was given on proper occasions—and were not his responsibility always interposed, the consequences might be extremely injurious to the suitors and the public. He would pledge himself to be as active as any noble lord in correcting abuses, but he would perform his duty with a due regard to the rights of others. The reason, why, in the present bill, there appeared no clause regulating the offices in the Court of Chancery was, that a commission was now sitting on the state of that court. Much misrepresentation had gone abroad concerning his conduct since he presided over that court; but whatever he might suffer from such calumny and misstatement, he enjoyed the consolation that he had been incorrupt in his office, and he could form no better wish for his country than that his successor should be penetrated with an equal desire to execute his duties with fidelity. The feelings and fate of an individual were in themselves of small importance to the public, and he might be sacrificed to the insults which he daily received; but he begged noble lords to reflect that he might not be the only sacrifice. If the object were, as it appeared to be, to destroy the reputation and throw discredit on the motives and conduct of men in high official situations—if every man who occupied an eminent station in the church or the state were to become the object of slander and calumny—then their lordships might lay their account with similar treatment, and might rest convinced that their privileges as peers could not long be respected when such characters had been sacrificed (hear, hear).

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

Police Magistrates' Salaries.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 21.—On the motion of Mr. Peel, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, to take into consideration the subject of the salaries of the police magistrates of the metropolis.

Mr. Peel requested the attention of the committee to the pecuniary allowance which the police magistrates of the metropolis received for their services. It was his intention to propose that those individuals should receive an addition, which he trusted would not be considered at all unreasonable. He could prove, to the satisfaction of the committee, that since the institution of police magistrates, the business which devolved upon those individuals had, owing to various acts of parliament which had been passed, independently of the increase of population, greatly augmented. Although that circumstance would of itself be a sufficient reason for increasing the salary of the magistrates, he rested his proposition upon grounds which he hoped the committee would consider even more satisfactory. When the police magistrates were first appointed, it was the practice to select individuals to fill the office, who were utterly incompetent to discharge the duties which devolved upon them. Out of twelve police magistrates appointed at a former period, there were only three barristers; the rest were composed of a major in the army, a starch maker, three clergymen, a Glasgow trader, and other persons, who, from their previous occupations, could not but be considered as utterly unqualified to perform the duties of magistrates (hear, hear). The law had fixed no qualification with respect to the persons appointed to the office of magistrate; but he thought the committee would be pleased to hear that neither his predecessor in office (Lord Sidmouth) nor himself had ever appointed a person to fill the office of magistrate who had not been a barrister of three years' standing. That was a rule to which, in his opinion, it was most desirable to adhere (hear). But in order to enable the Secretary of State to abide by that rule, and to carry it into practice, it was necessary to augment the present salary of police magistrates. He implored the house to consider whether 600*l.* a-year (the present salary) was sufficient to induce a barrister to give up the emoluments of private practice and the hope of preferment in his profession; to undertake the duties of a magistrate, which required almost constant attendance. It could not, he thought, be considered an unreasonable proposition, that in future the Secretary of State should be empowered to give to each police magistrate the sum of 800*l.* per annum (hear). He hoped that he should not be told that individuals might be found, who would be willing to undertake the magisterial duties for a less sum. It was very true that such was the case. He was constantly receiving applications from persons who were anxious to be appointed police magistrates. Those applications proceeded principally from country magistrates who had discharged the duties of their offices ably and satisfactorily; but whom, nevertheless, he did not think it right to appoint to be police magistrates in the metropolis. He held the unpaid magistracy in as high respect as any man, but he could easily conceive that a gentleman might, in consequence of the influence which he derived from local circumstance—the relations of landlord and tenant, for instance—be able to discharge the duties of a country magistrate in a satisfactory manner, who would be incompetent to undertake the very important functions of a police magistrate. "Police magistrates" was the name generally given to the magistrates to whom he alluded, but those persons were mistaken who supposed that the duties which they had to perform were merely executive. They were called upon to administer the law in a great number of complicated cases. Several nice cases had occurred under the building acts. He knew one of that description which had occupied the attention of the magistrates for a couple of days, during which surveyors were examined on both sides. It appeared to him that the individuals appointed to administer justice in this country were more parsimoniously dealt with than in almost any other country in the world (hear, hear). He thought this was poor economy to give an inadequate remuneration to individuals selected to administer justice, whether in the highest office of judge, or in the less important but still very important office of police magistrate (hear). He might, he did not doubt, get persons—those who could not succeed in their profession, the refuse of the bar—to fill the office of police magistrate, at a lower salary than he proposed to give; he could save 100*l.* or 200*l.* a-year by such a proceeding, but the public would have cause to lament it. The present police magistrates were of the highest personal respectability, and performed their duties to the great satisfaction of the country. They were thirty in number, only four of whom were not barristers. The rt. hon. gent. concluded with moving "that it is the opinion of the committee that each justice appointed, or to be appointed, under the act for the more effectual administration of the office of justice of the peace in the metropolis, should receive a yearly salary not exceeding 800*l.*"

Mr. Hobhouse was of opinion that the plan laid down by the rt. hon. gent., of selecting magistrates from the bar, would add to the patronage of the Crown, and tend to destroy the boasted independence of the bar, which, indeed, was hardly necessary, for he understood that there were at present 400 places which might be given to barristers, whose number amounted in the metropolis to 820. He did not clearly understand from the statement of the rt. hon. gent. whether the increased salary was to be given to all the police magistrates of the metropolis, or only to such as the Secretary of State might think fit to favour. In the former case, he would agree to the resolution; in the latter he would oppose it, for he could not help thinking that the partialities of a Secretary of State might be improperly exercised, when he recollected how, on a melancholy occasion, at a not very distant period, a person at the head of the police of the metropolis (Sir R. Baker) was dismissed by the rt. hon. gent.'s predecessor.

Mr. Peel said the increase would be extended to every police magistrate. With respect to what the hon. member had said respecting the patronage of the Crown—if that were any object, it could be much better attained by giving the appointments to gentlemen from the country, rather than from the bar (hear).

Mr. Hume did not think that 800*l.* per annum was too much for a magistrate to receive, but he was of opinion, that the present number of magistrates might be reduced. He understood that each magistrate attended to his duties only for a very limited time during the day.

Mr. Peel said that the question of the propriety of reducing the number of magistrates had been considered in a committee which was appointed at his suggestion two sessions since, to inquire into the state of the police of the metropolis. In 1792, London was divided into nine districts, to each of which three magistrates were appointed. Notwithstanding the great increase of population, and the consequent augmentation of business, no addition had been made to that number except by the appointment of magistrates to the Thames police, a most useful institution. A great part of the business transacted in the police offices was done in the presence of two magistrates. He thought that a good arrangement, as one magistrate acted as a check on the other. This being the case, it was necessary to have a third magistrate attached to each office, to provide for the relaxation of the other two. The periods of relaxation were very short. The office was open from ten in the morning till eight in the evening. Two magistrates attended in the morning, and one in the evening. The jurisdiction of the magistrates of Union-hall extended over a district containing not less than 243,000 inhabitants. In one month, July 1823, not less than 176 cases of assault came before the magistrates of that office; and in July 1824, the number of assault cases was 150. This was independent of all other cases. It was evident, under these circumstances, that the number of magistrates could not be reduced without great inconvenience to the public, and prejudice to the administration of justice. That, at least, was the opinion which the committee, to which he had alluded, came to on the subject (hear).

The resolution was agreed to; the house resumed, and the report was brought up and received.

Licensing System.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.—Lord Nugent presented a petition signed by the churchwardens, overseers, and inhabitants of Leighton-Buzzard, praying that the laws relating to the licensing of public-houses might be taken into consideration, for the purpose of amending them. The petition arose out of the circumstance of a poor publican at Leighton-Buzzard having been refused a renewal of his licence, without any cause being assigned for that refusal. The consequence was, that he had suffered considerably.

Mr. Monck said, that this subject called for the serious consideration of the house. Some alteration certainly should be made in the existing law, under which the magistrates exercised the most arbitrary power. Two public-houses adjoining the town where he resided (Reading), had been shut up some time since, without any reason being assigned, except that public-houses were pernicious, inasmuch that poor men were induced to spend money there, which otherwise would be spent at home. Those who earned the money were the best judges of the manner in which it should be spent.

The petition was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.—Sir F. Burdett presented a petition from a person in Chichester, complaining of partial conduct in certain licensing magistrates of that town, who had refused him a license for a public-house, though no imputation could be made against his character, and though his application had been supported by 400 respectable inhabitants of the parish in which he resided. The complaint of the petitioner referred to a practice which had now arisen to a serious evil, and called for a remedy.

Mr. Poyntz said, that the three magistrates of whose conduct complaint was made were most honourable men, and if they did refuse the license to petitioner, he was certain that their motive was far from being corrupt. At the same time he could not but express his surprise, that an application such as the petitioner made should have been refused.

Mr. Hume pressed on the attention of ministers the necessity of some alteration in the law respecting the power of magistrates to refuse or grant licences at their discretion. The case before the house was one of great grievance, but was only one of many hundreds of the kind which occurred year after year. In Chichester, where this petitioner resided, there were 37 public-houses. Of these, 34 belonged to the brewers (Messrs. Humphreys and Co.), and there were only three free public-houses in the town. In the parish in which the petitioner lived, there was only one public-house, and yet he was refused, though the magistrates granted nine licences in the next parish. This was unfair to the individual as well as to the inhabitants of the parish, because the houses licensed in the next parish were, for the most part, those of Messrs. Humphreys and Co., and the occupants of them were obliged to give a bond that they would sell no other beer but such as Messrs. Humphreys brewed.

Mr. Maberly thought the law which regulated the licensing of public-houses required serious consideration. In some cases the magistrates had not the power to grant licences, except on a particular day; and if by any accident a man, who might have been licensed for years before, were prevented from attending to renew it on that day, he was obliged to wait till the next licensing day, which might be a year distant. He knew a case in which such a circumstance had occurred. A man to whom the magistrates had no objection, and who had been licensed before, was prevented by sickness from attending on the licensing day, and the consequence was, that though he came on the next day, his licence was refused, the magistrates not having the power to grant it. Surely this required some remedy.

Mr. Huskisson said, that there were 37 public-houses in Chichester, which was not a very large place. The question, then, was, whether these were enough. In his opinion they were quite sufficient for the town.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Kenrick.

LORDS, THURSDAY, APRIL 14.—The Earl of Essex said it was his wish to have grounded some motion upon the proceedings which had taken place in the Court of King's Bench, respecting Mr. Kenrick the magistrate, whose case was one of public notoriety; but there were technical objections in the way, which prevented him from adopting that course. He wished, therefore, to know of the learned lord (the Lord Chancellor), whether he had received any communication on the subject of Mr. Kenrick from the Court of King's Bench. It must remain with the learned lord to act in the way he might think proper; but the conduct of a magistrate who had acted as Mr. Kenrick was said to have done, could not, in his opinion, be passed over unnoticed.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that Mr. Kenrick stood precisely in the same situation as any other judge, and could not be removed from his office except on an address from his Majesty, in which both houses of parliament must concur.

The Lord Chancellor assured the noble earl he was without any official communication. He had only the same information respecting the business as the rest of their lordships might have had. Here, however, he must observe, that as caution should be used in recommending persons to be magistrates, so it was also necessary that those who had the power of removing them should take care that the representations on which that authority was to be exercised were well-founded. Representations had been made to him, of a magistrate having applied to his own use fines which he had levied on individuals. On reading the affidavits which were laid before him in support of this charge, he did not choose, on their authority, to strike the magistrate out of the commission, and the result proved the propriety of this hesitation; for it turned out afterwards, that the magistrate indicted and convicted of perjury the persons who had sworn these affidavits. On the present case, he had only seen in the newspapers the report of what passed in the Court of King's Bench when a criminal information for libel was applied for on the part of Mr. Kenrick. But the decision of the court had no reference to the question agitated by the noble earl; for it appeared that the judges refused the information solely on the ground that Mr. Kenrick had chosen to defend himself in a public paper, the Stamford News; and had thus taken the law into his own hands, instead of applying, as he ought to have done, in the first instance to them.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 14.—Mr. Denman rose to call the attention of the house to the conduct of a magistrate of the county of Surrey. The complaint which he had to lay before the house related to two particular transactions; and if substantiated, they would form a ground for the house to address the Crown, praying that Mr. Kenrick might be divested of any judicial situation which he then held. The first part of the charge he was about to make, was contained in a petition (which he then presented) from Martin Canfor; the second, in a great variety of affidavits, which were produced in Hilary Term last in the Court of King's Bench. From these two sources he drew the inference that Mr. Kenrick had acted with partiality, violence, and intemperance on behalf of a party for whom he chose to interest himself, and had wrongfully imprisoned an individual who pursued him by action, and recovered a verdict against him. If that which he had admitted himself in his own affidavits should alone be taken against him, it would prove him utterly unfit to hold his present office. He would refrain from going into particulars at this time, and confine himself to a motion for bringing up the petition in order to printing it, and for producing and printing copies of the affidavits before mentioned. The whole of the case would thus be put into the hands of members, who might increase their information upon the facts by inquiries; after which the house might be called upon to declare in some form what steps it might deem necessary to be taken.

Mr. Denton said, that Mr. Kenrick, in a conversation which he had had but a few hours ago with him, had expressed his most earnest desire that the house might, by going into an examination, give him an opportunity of disproving the accusations. But it certainly was the wish of Mr. Kenrick that the affidavits should not be printed before the matter came to trial, and was investigated according to the course of the courts of law. The case ought not to go partially before the public.

Mr. Peel said, that he had no intention to obstruct the investigation, but he thought that enough notice had not been given on the point of producing the affidavits, which part of the motion was now mentioned for the first time. A question might arise, would the affidavits show the whole of the case? If not, should not some means be allowed to Mr. Kenrick to complete the explanation? He thought, at any rate, that the affidavits ought not to be printed.

Mr. Denman urged, that the printing of the affidavits would not put Mr. Kenrick in a worse situation than that in which he stood already, for the substance of them had appeared already in all the newspapers, and they had been discussed in the King's Bench.

The Attorney-General, in order to temper the opinion into which the house might be led, took this opportunity of saying, that the question in the Court of King's Bench had never been heard on the merits. One counsel only was heard for Mr. Kenrick, but it appearing that he had written a statement of his case in a newspaper, the Court would not grant a criminal information to a party who had taken up his own cause in a public newspaper. All that he had to request for Mr. Kenrick was, that the house would reserve its judgment for the investigation.

Mr. Scarlett thought that the affidavits ought not to be printed; they embraced a number of transactions, some of which were connected with the case, others not, and Mr. Kenrick had had no opportunity of replying.

Mr. Wynn observed upon the hardship of proceeding against a gentleman upon the matter of sworn affidavits, when it might be urged against any thing which could be advanced for him in the unsworn examinations before the house, that equal credit could not be given to it because it was not upon oath.

Mr. Canning agreed that this was a sufficient objection to printing the affidavits, and thought that the learned gent. should put the charge in some shape in which it would be fairly and equally met. Again, the affidavits, if produced, might contain a great deal of totally irrelevant matter, so that the individual might not know which of them, or which parts of them, it would be necessary for him to answer, and which not. But if the learned gent. would put the charge in some such form as seemed to have been appointed in the case of Baron Page, the case would then be considered as soon as possible by the house.

The petition was then read. It was from Martin Canfor, of Stoke Newington (a butcher), praying that the house would institute an inquiry into the truth of the statements contained in his petition, and adopt such measures in relation thereto as it might think fit. The statement was in effect, that Mr. Kenrick had refused a search-warrant against one William Beale, who was accused of having stolen petitioner's sheep; William Beale being the brother of Mr. Kenrick's bailiff. That Mr. K. had, instead, sent a note requesting Beale to deliver up the fleece; that upon petitioner's discovering the fleece in Beale's house, and appearing with it again before Mr. K., Mr. K. demanded of him his note to Beale which the petitioner had in his possession; and on his refusing to surrender it, Mr. K. ordered a constable to seize him and take it by force. That instead of committing Beale, Mr. K. had driven petitioner to submit to an arbitration touching the question of property.

On the question, "that it do lie upon the table,"

Mr. Denman thought, that had he introduced this question in the absence of any affidavits to support it, it would have been objected to him, "that there was nothing in the case, that it was picked up upon mere hearsay, and not upon oath." But it now seemed, that the objection urged in this case was, that the charge was too solemn; and that the disclaimer on the other side could not be equally so (hear). In the case of the Chief Baron of Ireland, which was brought forward by the hon. member for Limerick, no difficulty of this kind was started. In that case commissioners were appointed to inquire into the business; there was no substantive charge; but the house proceeded upon a certain number of facts on which those commissioners had reported. How was the objection in this case to be met? As far as he could be supposed to know any thing of the facts imputed as against this individual, he (Mr. D.) charged him with gross misconduct. The affidavits did not contain the charge that was now meant to be preferred. They would only show the mode in which Mr. Kenrick managed to get rid of that question by bringing his charge of libel against the Morning Chronicle. He now proposed, therefore, to have laid upon the table the affidavits made by Mr. Kenrick himself, and by him brought forward in support of his application for a criminal information against the editor of the Morning Chronicle, together with a copy of that letter of which he had been proved to be the author, addressed to the Stamford News.

Mr. Baring thought that the objections taken to the motion of his learned friend were such as might almost induce people to suppose, though he was perfectly sure such was not, in fact, the case, that ministers had some desire to serve the individual complained of, from the effect of the inquiries proper to be instituted by that house (hear). Great responsibility attached to some quarter for not having already brought a case of this importance before the house. The first intimation which he had received of this individual's conduct was from perusing in the newspapers the speech of the Attorney-General; and when it was considered that that learned person had made such charges in a public court of justice, it was quite evident that they must be presumed to be known to the whole kingdom. Supposing such a speech had been made by the Attorney-General in respect of one of the judges of the courts at Westminster, would it be possible that that personage could be allowed to remain one of the judges of the land (hear)—or, at least, that he should continue in that eminent station without the matter of such a speech being made the subject of inquiry before that house? And because Mr. Kenrick was only a judge of Wales, it could never be contended that it was not equally essential that such a course should be adopted towards him. It was equally impossible to believe that the King's Attorney-General could have made such a speech as he had delivered on this subject in a court of justice, if he had not the strongest moral conviction on his mind that the charges which he had brought against Mr. Kenrick in the course of it—

The Attorney-General observed, that that speech was delivered by him in his capacity of an advocate only.

Mr. Baring still thought that the learned gent. would not have made such a speech without feeling that there were strong grounds for it, and, consequently, for a solemn investigation into the matter. The rt. hon. gent. opposite had told the house that they must suspend their judgments on this case; but, unfortunately, Mr. Kenrick could not suspend his judgments. He was about to go his circuit; and surely, because Wales was a little and a distant place, it would never be allowed that he should do so till parliament had examined these charges. Was a matter of such importance to be postponed to next session, merely because it was brought in at so late a period of the session? He (Mr. B.) was willing to rest the case on the testimony Mr. Kenrick had given for himself; in that case there could be no want of equality on the ground of evidence.

Mr. Denman, after observing that he certainly thought it would have been the most rational course to have all the affidavits printed, moved—“that there be laid before the house the affidavits filed by Mr. Kenrick, in support of his application for a rule against William Clement; also the affidavit of Mr. James, which was filed in order to prove that Mr. Kenrick was the author of the letter published in the Stamford News.”—Ordered.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21.—Mr. Denman gave notice of the course of proceeding he proposed to pursue with regard to Mr. Kenrick, and named the witnesses who would be called in support of his charges: he moved for their attendance on Friday next, and also for the printing of Mr. Kenrick's letter to the Stamford News.

Mr. Peel submitted, that the learned gent. was at present rather precipitate. Ought not his first object to be to ascertain whether the House of Commons were prepared to go into the inquiry; for the summoning of witnesses would otherwise commit them to a course which possibly they might not desire. They ought to be cautious how they committed themselves in such a precedent, and more particularly in a case in which the grounds of complaint were not as yet even printed; for the letter which formed one of them was not presented to the house until last night, and of course could not be supposed to be yet in the hands of members. At any rate, the motion for going into the inquiry and calling evidence, ought to be postponed until the papers were in the hands of the members. If the learned gent. would embody his charges on paper, it would give the individual accused the ability of more satisfactorily replying.

Mr. Abercrombie said, that there were two propositions in the case, which no man who heard them would dispute. First, that the house ought not prematurely to go into the inquiry; secondly, that they ought not to proceed in it without furnishing the accused with means for knowing the nature of the charge to be preferred against him. But both of those objects were already attained. The first was effected by the petition of Canfor which had been presented, and which contained the whole matter of the charge. As to the second, a friend of Mr. Kenrick's had stated that it was Mr. Kenrick's most anxious desire that there should be full and prompt inquiry. So that here was a charge deliberately brought, and the accused courted inquiry. The only question left for the house was, how soon they ought to go into it. How could it be assumed that Mr. Kenrick was ignorant of the charges? The objections, therefore, to the course marked out by his learned friend would not apply. He had only spoken in anticipation of what the house might deem necessary. It must be understood that he waited for the result of what he had submitted. Of all cases he had ever known, this was the clearest, and Mr. Kenrick himself prompted the house to inquiry.

Mr. Peel did not speak in reference to Mr. Kenrick, but to the forms of the house, and the principles of justice. The house had not determined on inquiry, and at least they should have the documents before them.

Mr. Wynn said, that it was the duty of the house to take care that the accused should have ample knowledge of the charge, which ought to be reduced to writing and handed to him. In the case of Baron Page, the complaint against him was ordered by the house to be reduced to writing by his accuser (Sir John Cooke), and a copy was ordered to be furnished to him. The house could then decide if there were prima facie a sufficient ground of charge to merit further inquiry.

Mr. Tierney said, if he understood rightly, there was no charge or imputation against Mr. Kenrick as judge, but only as magistrate. If the charge affected him as a judge, then undoubtedly it must be reduced to writing; but the petition, which contained the charge, only affected him as a justice of the peace. His learned friend did not make any charge; he only presented the petition. It was an odd way of going to work to fix the responsibility upon a member of instituting by a settled form of his own, a charge contained in a petition; when they ought rather to choose to hear the petitioner themselves, that in case of his not making his charge good, he might be made immediately answerable. What his learned friend proposed was, that the petitioner should be heard. In the event of proving his charge, it would become the duty of the house to address the crown for removing Mr. Kenrick from the commission of the peace. It would afterwards become a question how far it could be proper to retain a man in the office of a judge, who was found unfit for the magistracy; and his removal from that high station would require more solemn forms from the parliament than could be necessary in this proceeding.

Mr. Brougham was surprised at the doctrine laid down, that a complaint was not to be entertained, unless the house cramped itself by an impeachment or a written charge. He had never heard that maintained in the house before. There had been already two instances of this same kind of proceeding in this session, and yet no demand had been made of a charge reduced to writing. The first was against the Duke of Manchester; the second was the petition of Burnett against Lord Charles Somerset. Inquiry was in this case necessary: he might have to impeach. The house was not called on to exert its judicial, but its inquisitorial functions.

Mr. Peel thought, that the learned gentleman ought to give notice for Friday, instead of fixing his motion for that day, because, in the meantime, Mr. Kenrick might be able to lay such a statement before the house as would make inquiry unnecessary.

Mr. Denman consented to alter his motion, but not with any expectation that the charge of the petition could be settled by anything which Mr. Kenrick might be able to advance between this and Friday next. It would, indeed, be little consistent with those high principles of justice for which the rt. hon. Secretary expressed his anxious regard, if the accused party, upon his own allegations, were allowed to prevent an inquiry called for by the sense of the house. He concluded by moving "that the petition of Canfor be taken into consideration on Friday next; that a copy of the petition, and of this order, be served on Mr. Kenrick forthwith; that Martin Money Canfor be directed to attend this house on Friday next; and that Mr. Kenrick have leave to attend the house himself or by counsel;" which were severally ordered.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.—Mr. Denman moved the order of the day for considering the petition against Mr. Kenrick, and calling in as a witness Mr. Martin Money Canfor.

The Speaker here rose on the point of form, and observed, that he was ignorant of the course about to be taken upon this business. If it were intended to call an individual to their bar, and interrogate him while the Speaker was in the chair, the course would be to commence by putting such interrogatory through him; but if it were intended to open a general examination of the petitioner, and then to have a cross-examination to follow by all the members, then, perhaps, the more convenient course would be to proceed in a committee of the whole house.

The house having resolved itself into a committee (Mr. Gordon in the chair), Martin Money Canfor and Mr. Kenrick, or his counsel, were ordered to be called in.

Mr. Gurney and Mr. Bolland appeared for Mr. Kenrick. The petitioner took his station at the bar, and was examined by Mr. Denman.

He is a farmer, and was living last summer near Charlwood-common, Surrey. About the month of May in last year he lost about twenty sheep. One of them was a ram.

(Upon an objection of the Attorney-General, the witness was directed to answer without looking at his notes.)

He found some of the sheep upon Westwood-common, which is about 5 or 6 miles from Charlwood. They were all marked with a particular composition. He afterwards found the ram in a fold with some sheep belonging to one W. Beale, who lived near Betchworth. The ram was shorn; when he lost it the fleece was on. He saw Beale, and asked him where he got the ram. Beale said he bought it some time before. He asked Beale to produce the fleece; but he would not. Witness applied to a neighbouring magistrate, Mr. Kenrick, of Betchworth. He was shewn into Mr. Kenrick's room, and told Mr. Kenrick that he came for a search warrant to secure the fleece of a ram which he had lost. That he had seen the ram in the possession of Beale, and could swear to it, but Mr. Kenrick refused to receive the oath; Mr. Kenrick began to write. Adams left the room, and came in again with a paper, which was the form of a search-warrant. Mr. Kenrick said, "The note I am writing to Beale will do as well." Witness told him that he came there for a search-warrant, and he was afraid that Beale would not pay attention to the paper, having already refused to deliver up the fleece. Mr. Kenrick flew into a great passion, and ordered him out of the room. Witness did not go, but said he must consult with his attorney. Mr. Kenrick said, "Don't talk to me about your attorney." Finding that the magistrate was offended with what he had said; he begged him to go on in his own way. Mr. Kenrick gave the paper to Adams, and asked what was the Christian name? "Ours is James," Adams said, "and the one charged is William." Adams asked if it was to be served by a constable? Mr. Kenrick said to witness, "That is not necessary—take it yourself to Beale." Witness took the note to Beale's mother. He did not find Beale at home; but he made sure of the ram, and placed it in the grounds of Mr. Nash, who held the next farm to Beale's. He stepped into the public-house: presently in came Beale. Witness said he had a note from Mr. Kenrick; asked for the fleece; Beale would not give it. Witness said that he would go to another magistrate. On Tuesday witness went to Mr. Burgess, a justice, residing three miles from Mr. Kenrick. Mr. Burgess would give him no warrant, though he was going on very well, till witness told him of the note from Mr. Kenrick. Mr. Burgess said that he was sorry witness did not come to him at first, and he would have granted the warrant. Mr. Burgess refused to go on, and advised witness to go back to Mr. Kenrick. He went next morning; first, he saw Beale talking with James Beale, bailiff to Mr. Kenrick: He asked Beale again for the fleece; Beale said "I'll see it out with you." Both the Beales laughed. Witness saw Adams, and told him that Beale was come, and that he wished to see Mr.

Kenrick. Adams said that Mr. Kenrick had left the whole matter for Mr. Nash and Mr. Cutler to settle. Beale produced the fleece for Mr. Nash and Mr. Ede to look at it. They decided that the fleece in the possession of Beale belonged to the witness, who went to Mr. Kenrick with the fleece. Mr. Kenrick said, "What's the matter now?" Witness told him what had happened. Mr. Kenrick asked for the note he had written, and witness having refused to surrender it, Mr. K. told Adams to shut the door, which was done. "Now, Adams," said Mr. Kenrick, "I appoint you a special constable; search him for that note I gave him." Witness would not be searched. Mr. Kenrick said "Adams, send for the constable of the parish." Witness was kept an hour. John Batchelor, the parish constable, came. Mr. Kenrick said, "Constable, there's your prisoner—do your duty—search for a note which he has upon him." Witness would not resist the real constable of the parish, and suffered Batchelor to search him. The note was taken from him. Mr. Kenrick said, "Take the fleece from him." The constable took the fleece. Witness brought an action directly. It stood for trial at the last Croydon assizes. There was a compromise; Mr. Kenrick was to pay 5*l.* damages, and all the expenses that witness had been at, including loss of time and all other losses. He was a week from home before he got information about the sheep.

The witness was then cross-examined at great length by Mr. Kenrick's counsel, and various members of the house; but nothing was elicited from him to alter his first statement. He admitted that the taxed costs paid by Mr. Kenrick, 190*l.*, did not cover his loss and expenses, and that this was the reason he had proceeded to the present petition. Witness identified the note and read it:—"These are to request that you will deliver to the bearer, the fleece of a sheep admitted to have been taken by you from Westwood, in order that it may be produced as evidence before me, or a charge of felony, or bring it with you to my house, and show you cause why you should not do so."

"To William Beale." "W. KENRICK."

He said that Westwood Common was about four miles from Beale's, and he had been induced to suspect Beale, because he had been told by one Higgins, that he, Higgins, had seen Beale leading the ram off the common in a string. But he, Canfor, did not tell this to Mr. Kenrick.

The witness was then desired to withdraw.

Mr. Denman stated that he did not intend to call any more witnesses on this subject, but said he would state what he proposed as his ultimate course. When the petition and all the evidence on the part of Mr. Canfor, should have been gone through, he would leave it to the house to allow evidence on the other side to be given; and then the other case might be proceeded with; but whether it would be convenient for Mr. Kenrick to be put on his defence before that other case came on, it would be for the house to determine.

Mr. Kenrick's counsel upon being asked what course they intended to take, said they wished to give in Mr. Kenrick's petition in answer to the witness's statement.

The Chairman suggested that the learned counsel might read the petition as part of his speech.

The counsel (Mr. Gurney), then proceeded to read the paper; which stated that the fleece was detained with the view of giving it up to the party entitled after the question should have been legally tried.

Mr. Gurney then said, he should have thought he might very safely leave the case of his client, Mr. Kenrick, upon his own statement, which they had just heard, were it not for one part of that case in which he (Mr. Gurney) happened to have been personally concerned. Mr. Kenrick had intrusted his defence to Canfor's action to his learned friend Mr. Bolland and himself. Upon the trial of that action being called on, he (Mr. G.) understood from Mr. Canfor, that his object was only to secure costs. Now, he did think that his client, Mr. Kenrick, had no available defence to make in that case, and that a verdict must pass against him, which of course would carry costs. He therefore suggested to the learned counsel on the other side, that if such were Mr. Canfor's object, he had no objection to give him the verdict; upon which the plaintiff's counsel made a most explicit arrangement for plaintiff's taking a verdict with costs in the terms which had just been stated. Those costs were afterwards to be taxed by the officer of the court. It would therefore be for the house to determine whether Mr. Canfor, because he had been disappointed in the amount of these costs, and not because of any denial of justice that he had experienced at the hands of Mr. Kenrick, had not resorted to this petition as a measure of revenge and malice?—whether it had not been in the hope of obtaining further costs from Mr. Kenrick that he had continued proceedings of this kind, after the compromise and termination of his action? A perfect stranger, it appeared, came and asked for a search-warrant against a person of known good character in the neighbourhood of the magistrate. It was a moot point, whether the ram was stolen or strayed; and the upshot of the charge ultimately was, that the ram had actually strayed. No evidence was adduced that the beast had been stolen. The only complaint was, that the other party, Beale, had refused to give up the animal; and as it appeared to the understanding of the magistrate that this was a case of disputed property, he had deemed it improper to grant a search-warrant. With respect to the violence said to have been manifested by Mr. Kenrick, he would only say, that from the manner in which the witness answered the interrogatories at the bar of the house—from the intemperance which he displayed, some defence might be imagined for the conduct pursued by Mr. Kenrick. He could hardly suppose it would be presumed, under all the circumstances of this painful case, that the magistrate in whose behalf he appeared had been guilty of corruption. Under the circumstances which had been stated, it appeared to him that the magistrate had exercised a sound discretion. What, he asked, would be the situation of the subject, if a magistrate, in every case where application was made to him, violated the sanctity of a private residence? It would diminish the respectability of the magistracy if they complied with these applications, unless where strong suspicion existed. If magistrates, acting from the best motives, were to be thus inculcated, no gentleman of station, no gentleman of learning, would accept of the office. No magistrate, under similar circumstances, would have consented to grant a search-warrant? He saw no reason whatever for calling a magistrate to that bar to answer the complaint now urged. If a magistrate acted wrong, the law was open to the aggrieved party. In such a case, the lowest, the poorest individual might resort to a court of justice for redress. He could, for instance, move the Court of King's Bench for a mandamus to compel the magistrate to perform his duty. This individual had done no such thing. For the injury which he alleged he had received, he brought an action in the Court of King's Bench, and he had received a compensation (hear). Notwithstanding this, he now came to the House of Commons, and said he suffered in consequence of a denial of justice; and he accused Mr. Kenrick as having been guilty of tyrannical conduct. What denial of justice had been sustained? What more could the complainant have obtained by the search warrant than was effected by the summons, or notice, which was placed in his hands? He procured his fleece—he procured that which he applied for; and what more would he have? Viewing all the circumstances of this case, he felt confident that no case had been made out, which called for the notice of that honourable house.

In answer to a question from the Chairman, Mr. Gurney having stated he should call no witnesses; and Mr. Bolland, also of counsel for Mr. Kenrick, having declined to add any thing to what had been said by Mr. Gurney,

An Hon. Member bore testimony to the excellent character of Mr. Kenrick, and vouched for the honour and respectability of that individual. He was, in all the relations of life, a most amiable and honourable man. A search-warrant ought not to be granted except in cases of grave suspicion, but he knew Beale, and had always considered him an honest man.

Mr. Canning apprehended it was quite impossible to proceed with the case, in its present state. They had on one side, evidence given at their bar, which would be printed; on the other side, they had the speech of a learned counsel, which was evanescent, and of which they had no record. They could not proceed without some motion.

Mr. Denman said, he would move that the evidence be printed.

Mr. Canning thought it would be unfair to assent to a motion of this kind, the evidence being all on one side. He was ready to go to a decisive verdict on the case, as it now stood; and, if no other person would make a specific motion on the subject, he would.

Mr. Denman said, the course he intended to pursue was a plain and clear one. Charges had been brought against an individual at the bar, and a witness had been heard. Individuals had been mentioned who, if it were necessary, might have been examined on the other side. As those persons had not been called, how could they dispose of the business except by printing the evidence, and adjourning? A most ingenious and eloquent speech had been delivered by the counsel for Mr. Kenrick—a speech which he was convinced would not be so evanescent as the right hon. gent. seemed to suppose. There were many novelties connected with this case, and amongst them, perhaps, the greatest was the proposition which had been laid down by the rt. hon. gent. when he asked, why should the evidence be circulated without the speech of the learned counsel (hear)? He should like the rt. hon. gent. to point out any precedent where a speech delivered by counsel, or by any other person in that house, or at the bar of that house, was so sent forth along with the evidence. Was there much danger, he would ask, from sending out the evidence in the way proposed, when it was quite clear that other speeches opposed to that evidence would be delivered in the course of the discussion on the subject? The question here was, whether a poor individual, who endeavoured to recover his property, and who, in making that effort, was imprisoned, should receive the protection of that house? He (Mr. D.) was taken by surprise, when he found that persons who might have been called on the other side had not been brought forward. If the rt. hon. gent. could give him an example from authority, or could adduce something like reasoning to justify the refusal to print the evidence, then he would be content to deviate from the course which he originally intended to pursue; but if the contrary were the rule, as he believed it was, he should move "that the chairman do now leave the chair, that he report progress, and that the evidence be printed."

Mr. Peel said the speech of the learned gent. was entirely beside the real question. He began with a charge against Mr. Kenrick, and those who really wished to investigate the matter called on him to bring forward some written specific accusation. The learned gent. declined that course, declaring that the petition of Canfor contained the charge. The question therefore was, whether the evidence given by Canfor produced such a feeling in the house as rendered it necessary to proceed further. It appeared to him that no persons were so fit to judge of the merits of this case as those who had just heard the evidence given at their bar. Having attended to all that had been stated by Canfor, he was ready to move, "that the house having heard the testimony adduced by Mr. Canfor in support of his petition, do not think it necessary to institute any further proceedings" (hear, hear). He would now say, in defence of the individual accused, that there was nothing (at least, in the evidence brought forward) which could authorize the house to proceed any further.

A long discussion ensued upon the question whether the committee should come to an immediate decision on the case, or time should be given to consider it after the evidence was printed.

In the course of this discussion,

Mr. Peel said, it was quite clear that Mr. Kenrick had not acted from any corrupt motive. That was the most important part of the case. The second accusation was, that Mr. Kenrick had ordered his servant to search the petitioner. This undoubtedly was improper; but could he (Mr. Peel) dismiss from his recollection that an action had been brought against Mr. Kenrick, that he had been visited by a verdict, and put to an expense of 2000l.? He thought that gentlemen ought to be satisfied with the adjudication of a court of justice with respect to one part of the case, when, with reference to the other, they acquitted him of all corrupt and improper motives.

Mr. Baring, Mr. W. Wynn, Mr. Canning, and Mr. Goulburn expressed their opinion that though Mr. Kenrick's conduct had in some respects been indiscreet, no case had been made out to warrant an address to the Crown for his removal.

It was ultimately agreed, that the house should take time to consider the case, and that the evidence should be printed.

The house then resumed; the chairman of the committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Monday.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Mr. Denman postponed the further consideration of the committee on Mr. Kenrick till to-morrow. He also brought up a paper relative to the case of C. Franks; and inasmuch as it contained the grounds of a charge against Mr. Kenrick—namely, that he had unjustly committed Franks for a felony—had afterwards proposed to compromise the affair on the condition that Franks should plead guilty of such felony, which Franks had declined to do, and had subsequently published a false and libellous letter against Franks—he gave notice that he would to-morrow submit a motion for considering such paper, and for calling witnesses in support of it.

Mr. Peel said, if it should appear that Mr. Kenrick could not enter upon his defence without also calling witnesses, other matters must necessarily stand over till next session.

The Speaker intimated that it had been usual to grant a copy of such a charge to the party accused, and upon the question being put from the chair, it was agreed that such copy should be communicated to Mr. Kenrick.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—Mr. Tremayne presented a petition from Mr. Kenrick, in reference to a paper which had, upon the preceding evening, been laid upon the table by the learned member (Mr. Denman), in reference to the case of Mr. Franks. The petitioner stated that he was taken by surprise by the order which the house had thereupon made for examining witnesses in relation to that charge; and that therefore he was not prepared. Now he (Mr. Tremayne) apprehended that this gentleman was not correct as to the order which he supposed to have been made by the house; for though the learned gent. stated that the witnesses were at hand and ready to be examined, he believed no order was actually made.

The petition was then read.

Mr. Denman would have no objection to allow Mr. Kenrick more time to instruct his counsel. He would therefore propose that the witnesses should attend on Thursday. It had been intimated to him (Mr. D.), that in respect of the case of Franks, however, Mr. Kenrick would not be able for some time to prepare instructions, and that that matter must stand over till next session. In this, as in all other parts of the case, he felt himself entirely at the disposal of the house. The papers were printed, and in the hands of hon. members; therefore the contents must be, by this time, tolerably known to Mr. Kenrick himself, and must have been so from the moment, almost, they were first printed.

Mr. Peel admitted that the accusation in this case involved two charges of the gravest kind; but at the same time they were such as might be tried by the ordinary tribunals, and seeing that no proceedings appeared to have been taken in respect of them in those tribunals, he thought it very doubtful whether the house should hear witnesses to either charge. It was not till one o'clock that afternoon, that Mr. Kenrick knew any thing of this second charge being brought forward. He had only had the interval, therefore, between one and four o'clock for instructing counsel, and no opportunity at all for getting witnesses, if he proposed to call any. If this inquiry were now begun, they must go on and through with it; for he could not consent to that proposition of the learned gent. to take the charge against Mr. Kenrick first, and the answer next session. Was it after that charge should have been circulated in every direction, especially in that part of the country where Mr. Kenrick resided—was it possible that the house could postpone the answer to six months afterwards (hear)? He hoped he had satisfied the house, and even the learned gent. himself, of the impossibility of now going into this inquiry (hear).

Mr. Denman, observing from the general impression of the house, that it was not the desire of hon. gents. to proceed at present with Franks's case, felt it to be his duty not to press it further now; but he would bring it forward next session, unless in the meantime circumstances should occur very materially to change his view of the case. He would now move that the committee on Canfor's petition should resume its sitting.

The house having resolved itself into the committee,

Mr. Denman said, the committee for which he moved some time ago in order to examine into the case of Mr. Canfor having now resumed, he presented himself to their notice, for the purpose of submitting certain resolutions, founded on the evidence which had been adduced in support of that case. The charge was brought forward by him in conjunction with another charge; and in his view of the case, the two charges together formed matter of much more grave accusation against Mr. Kenrick than either of them, singly, would have done. He now merely alluded to the case of Franks—postponed as he considered it to be, to the next session—in order that he might not be met by the assertion that he had brought forward an isolated case against Mr. Kenrick. That case charged Mr. Kenrick with having in the execution of his duty conducted himself in a manner that had exposed himself to great animadversion. He (Mr. D.) was aware that in his view of this matter he differed from a great number of his hon. friends; but he certainly stood in a peculiar situation with regard to his auditory on this occasion; for he could not help considering the House of Commons as a special jury of magistrates, in a case of this kind (hear). A large proportion of the house consisted of gentlemen who filled similar situations to Mr. Kenrick's in the magistracy; and who, he had no doubt, discharged the duties attached to those situations with honour to themselves and advantage to the country. It was impossible, however, that they should not feel something like sympathy for Mr. Kenrick. They might, indeed, from the same cause, be the better enabled to judge of the motives which had influenced the conduct of that gentleman; and far was it from his (Mr. D.'s) desire to deprive any one in Mr. Kenrick's situation of the consolation of such a sympathy. With Mr. Canfor, who had appeared at their bar, he had had no previous communication. But he thought that the case might very well be left on his testimony. He was aware, indeed, that many hon.

gents, considered that witness's evidence to have been flippant and unsatisfactory. This he could not admit. And however improper might be the motives imputed to a witness, however different his manner from that which could be desired, those considerations would have no effect upon the weight and credit of his testimony, unless there were other grounds to suspect him either of fraud or falsehood in the delivery of his evidence. But when this witness came forward he was evidently in a weak and nervous state. He came there, endeavouring to screw his courage to a higher pitch than he had ever before found to be necessary; and perceived himself to be in a situation that he had never previously experienced, surrounded as he was by so many gentlemen of the highest rank in the country. As to flippancy of manner, he (Mr. D.) had never known even a simple country witness, after being subjected to a severe cross-examination, who did not leave the witness-box a much more impertinent person than when he first came into it (a laugh). In answer to the statements of Canfor, Mr. Kenrick had himself presented a petition. Now such facts as had been stated on the one side, and were admitted on the other, must be assumed to be true; and on such, gentlemen, might safely proceed to form a deliberate judgment. There were many such admitted facts in this case, which he would presently notice. (Here the learned gent. proceeded to recapitulate the testimony of Canfor.) Both the objects for which Canfor waited on Mr. Kenrick were defeated, one of those objects being to recover his property, and the other to prosecute the person who he supposed had improperly possessed himself of it. The refusal of the search-warrant placed Canfor in a worse situation than that in which he originally stood. Having failed in procuring the fleece, he then proceeded to another magistrate, who refused to act in a case where a magistrate had already been applied to. He must here observe, that a sort of language had crept into use, in speaking of magistrates, generally, of which he could not approve. One of their most important duties was to trace out stolen property. That was the mode by which they could best protect those who were liable to depredations; and therefore the granting a search-warrant was not a matter of indulgence and favour, but it was their duty to grant it, wherever a fair ground of suspicion existed. But though Mr. Kenrick might refuse the search-warrant, he certainly had no right to decline taking the evidence which was tendered to him on oath. It was a strange course of proceeding to refer to two arbitrators the question, to whom the ram belonged. Why should a reference have been made, until Beale had shown that he had lost something?—until he had proved that he possessed a ram similar to that claimed by Canfor? Mr. Kenrick thought that this course would put an end to the business, not recollecting that another question might remain to be decided, even after the award of the referees—namely, how the sheep got into the possession of Beale (hear)? The arbitrators having decided in favour of Canfor, he produced their notes to Mr. Kenrick; what did Mr. Kenrick himself say on this part of the subject in his petition? He stated, that Canfor brought two samples of wool with him, to show that it was the same as that of the sheep which he had lost, "but your petitioner is by no means convinced thereof." How was it possible for Mr. Kenrick to suppose that this was not the property of Canfor, when the notes, written by two individuals, perfectly competent to decide the question, declared that the fleece was Canfor's property? If Mr. Kenrick were anxious to preserve the character of Beale he took a very bad way to effect that object. There was a prima facie case of suspicion against Beale, which could not be cleared up, except by a full and fair investigation. He would ask any magistrate now present, if a charge were made against a respectable neighbour, and he refused a search-warrant to the applicant, whether he would not, on the moment, give notice to the party accused to stand forward, and clear up his character? Would he not write a note in these terms—"a stranger has applied to me for a search-warrant against you—it will be proper for you to come to my house, and show that he is labouring under error?" Mr. Kenrick did not act thus. He washed his hands entirely of the business. He left the complainant to get his property by means of a foolish note, which Beale disregarded. If there were a responsibility on the part of magistrates to use their best efforts for the restoration of property, Mr. Kenrick had in this case neglected his duty. Canfor stated to him, when he found his representations were unavailing, that there was a solicitor at Reigate to whom he would apply for advice. This appeared to have vexed Mr. Kenrick, and he refused to grant the search-warrant because the manner of Canfor did not please him. This was not conduct befitting a magistrate, who ought to guard against all capricious feeling. This, however, was not the worst part of the case. He was sure no gentleman in that house who was in the commission of the peace would say, that he would act with the same disregard of law and justice as it was admitted Mr. Kenrick had subsequently done. An individual applied to him for the restoration of his property, and instead of being assisted, he was himself made a prisoner, and dealt with insolently and outrageously. He was ordered to be searched by Mr. Kenrick's butler, who was made a special constable on the moment for that purpose. A parish constable was then sent for, and was directed to make an assault on this injured individual who came before the magistrate for redress. If magistrates thought proper to behave in this way, they ought to be taught that such conduct was as contrary to law as it was to justice. They should be informed, that they were not to act from the impulse of personal feeling, of offended pride, or wounded dignity. Such feelings ought to be discarded from their minds the moment they ascended the judgment-seat. What was Mr. Kenrick's justification for this outrageous conduct? He stated, that Canfor behaved insolently, that he said he would apply to Mr. Burgess, a magistrate at Reigate; and that he accused Mr. Kenrick with not understanding his duty. Canfor, however, states that he only said he would apply for advice to his solicitor. This, he declared, was the only offence he had given. If any greater offence had been given, let the house consider how well supplied Mr. Kenrick was with evidence to prove it. His butler, George Adams, William Beale, and Mounra. Naah and Ede, could easily prove whether there were any thing improper in Canfor's conduct. Batchelor, the constable of his own parish, who, astonished and bewildered, proceeded to execute the strange orders of Mr. Kenrick, could also speak to the conduct of Canfor. It had however been said, that no felony had been committed, because the sheep was found straying on a common. He thought the rt. hon. Sec. (Mr. Peel) would not adopt that line of argument. The place had nothing to do with the offence, which consisted in clandestinely taking the property of another. It was said that Mr. Kenrick placed the fleece in the hands of a constable as evidence to further the ends of justice. That, however, was not the fact, for he had entirely dismissed the case (hear). The conduct of Mr. Kenrick was the most outrageous he had ever heard of, and his abuse of power in appointing his butler a special constable for the purpose of searching Canfor, was most unwarrantable. Suppose Canfor had resisted—suppose bloodshed had ensued—what excuse could be made for the conduct of Mr. Kenrick? This case was one of the most serious importance. If such a case were viewed lightly by the house, then it became of ten times more importance in his eyes; because it showed how the magistracy of the country viewed such an invasion of the liberty of the subject. He knew it was argued that Mr. Kenrick had paid the penalty of his offence. If the petitioner came to the bar, and demanded 5*l.* damages more than he had obtained in Court, this answer would be complete—"You have accepted a certain sum, and you cannot come here for more." But that was not an answer which would satisfy the House of Commons when inquiring into the alleged misconduct of a judge (hear). It was strange how the House of Commons acted, when cases that might be connected with courts of justice were brought before them. Sometimes, when a complaint was made, they said to the petitioner, "Go to a court of law, establish your case there, and then we will see whether it is necessary for us to proceed." The complaining party took that advice; and having proved the truth of his case, again applied to Parliament, when he was met with this answer—"This is a proceeding on which a court of law has already decided, and the House of Commons is debarred from interfering." The question was, whether it was proper that a magistrate should be intrusted with power who had exhibited so much indiscretion and irritability? Was Mr. Kenrick, after he had been proved guilty in a court of law, to be continued in a situation where he might still further abuse his authority (hear)? Was he to be enabled to the end of his life to deny justice to those who applied for it? Suppose a gentleman's butler had robbed his master, and suffered a twelvemonths' imprisonment as the punishment of his offence, would not the gentleman feel greatly astonished if the offending party applied to be reinstated in his situation? The servant might say "I have suffered the penalty of my crime. I was imprisoned for twelve months, and it is extremely unjust to punish me further by refusing to place me in my old situation." This was precisely the argument used by hon. gents. when they said, that as Mr. Kenrick had paid the penalty of his offence, he ought to be no further molested. He thought the magistrates of the country were too much above control. When he said this, he deemed it right to declare that no man could feel more respect than he did for the magistrate who watched over his neighbourhood with paternal care—who settled petty quarrels, and who exerted his authority to preserve the morals of the people, and to add to their comfort. But he could not approve of that indiscriminate and blind obedience which some individuals seemed to think ought to be paid to the magistracy in general. He thought the Government ought to say, when a case of gross misconduct on the part of a magistrate was brought forward, "Here is an offence of a trying nature, let us examine it, and see whether this magistrate shall longer be allowed to exercise the functions of a justice of the peace in the county where he now acts." When magistrates misbehaved themselves they ought to be dismissed. That was the course pursued in Ireland, and had been followed in parts of this country. A friend had recently written to him, stating that a magistrate of Hampshire had, in the time of Lord Loughborough, been thus treated. An action for false imprisonment was brought against him, and 50*l.* damages were awarded. It was thought necessary to consider whether the individual was fit to remain in the situation of a magistrate. The Lord Lieutenant was unwilling to interfere; but Lord Loughborough and the Government took up the case, and the offending party was removed. The Government, however, appeared now to disclaim that wholesome power. Not a week passed in which complaints were not made against magistrates, but no notice was taken of them. As the power of the magistracy was increased, the superintending control of Government appeared to be diminished (hear). With these views and sentiments he had brought this case before the House of Commons. He was influenced by no private motives (hear). He utterly disclaimed them (hear). With respect to the individual whose conduct was incriminated, he harboured no feelings of animosity towards, and was never, until the present occasion, under the same roof with him. He acted from a sense of public justice; and it was his intention to submit the following propositions to the committee:—

"That this committee is of opinion, that the allegations contained in the petition of Martin Money Canfor have been substantially proved.

"That the said petitioner preferred his complaint to William Kenrick, Esq. one of the magistrates for the county of Surrey, relative to the loss of a ram, and required a search-warrant, to recover the ram as well as its fleece, both of which were in the possession of William Beale, the brother of the said William Kenrick's bailiff, but that the said William Kenrick refused to grant a search-warrant, or to take the depositions of the petitioner.

"That the said William Kenrick, in this respect, appears to have neglected his duty as a magistrate, is not inquiring into facts of a suspicious character; and that his subsequent conduct, in causing the said petitioner to be arrested, and commanding and ordering him to be searched, was illegal, arbitrary, and oppressive, and a gross abuse of his authority as a magistrate."

The first resolution having been read—

Mr. Peel entirely acquitted the learned gent. of harbouring any personal hostility against Mr. Kenrick, or of being actuated by any undue motives in bringing this case forward (hear). The high and manly character which the learned gent. had always maintained, would have sufficiently shielded him against any such charge, if he himself had not said a word about it (hear). At the same time, he must observe, that the course which he (Mr. Peel) meant to take on this occasion did not arise from any undue bias towards Mr. Kenrick, with whom he had no acquaintance. He was only anxious that they should decide in the manner most consistent with the forms of Parliament, and, above all, with the principles of equity and justice. In the outset, he called on hon. gents. to divest themselves of all prejudice connected with the other case. The present charge had nothing to do with the affidavits in the case of Franks—the committee was called on to consider that of Canfor only. Although there were many gentlemen present who held the situation of magistrate, he was persuaded that they would indulge in no partial feeling on that account. On the contrary, if the house interfered, those individuals would, he thought, be more likely to vindicate the situation of magistrates from any imputation that might be cast on it, in consequence of improper conduct alleged to have been committed by one of their body. The learned gent. had divided the case into two parts—1st, the refusal of the search-warrant on the application of Canfor; and 2d, the conduct of Mr. Kenrick in ordering Canfor to be detained—in appointing his butler as a constable—and in taking from him the note and the fleece. He would pursue the same course in considering the question. He did not propose to contend that Mr. Kenrick had acted with perfect propriety in this transaction, or that no charge of indiscretion could be maintained against him. All he would contend for was, that there was no ground for the interference of the House of Commons. On the first part of the charge he would say, that whether Mr. Kenrick did or did not act as a perfect magistrate, when application was made to him for a search-warrant, he must exonerate him from any corrupt or improper motive. He appeared rather to have been influenced by a desire to act with impartial justice. Whether his note was proper, or whether it did not contain phrases which ought not to have been found there, he would not now enquire. The principal accusation was, that Mr. Kenrick had suppressed a case of felony, and that he had done so under a feeling of corrupt partiality. He, however, denied that any such imputation could obtain credit. It appeared that the individual against whom a search-warrant was applied for, was a man of good character, and of some property; for in the fold where the ram was found he had between 70 and 80 sheep; amongst those a ram was found, which Canfor supposed was his property. Was any concealment attempted? None whatever. The sheep were kept in an open field, accessible to all. (Mr. Denman: "The ram was shorn.") If it had been at the season of the year when it was unusual for sheep to be shorn—or if the other sheep in the fold were not shorn—then there would be some foundation for assuming that concealment was contemplated. But as it happened that it was in the shearing season, and as all the other sheep were shorn, how was it possible to maintain the accusation of attempting to conceal the ram. (hear). When he was asked for the fleece, what would have been easier than for him to have said, "It is not in my possession. I have disposed of it." He, however, at once said, that he had it, but would not give it up. Was it advisable that Mr. Kenrick should issue a search-warrant against a respectable individual on such slight grounds? Besides, Beale claimed the fleece as his property, which formed a very peculiar feature in this case. Canfor was asked, "Did you tell Mr. Kenrick that Beale claimed the ram as his property?"—and after a great deal of prevarication, he answered that "he did." This was most important; because Mr. Kenrick, knowing Beale's character, would naturally say on receiving this information, "It is a question of property, and I will not ruin this man's character for ever, by issuing, on such grounds as these, a search-warrant." Canfor was asked, "Did you not tell Mr. Kenrick that Beale claimed it as his ram?" He answered, "That he would not give it up to me." Q. "Did you not tell Mr. Kenrick he claimed it as his ram?" A. "No." A learned gent., however, asked him—"How late was it when you saw Mr. Kenrick the second time?"—A. "On Monday, about one o'clock." Q. "On the Sunday Beale maintained the sheep to be his, and the fleece to be his?"—A. "Yes." Q. "And you told that to Mr. Kenrick?"—A. "Yes." Q. "That he said it was his, and he would not give it up?"—A. "Yes; and that I wanted a search-warrant to search his premises, as it was my property." Here, in the course of two minutes, was the most decisive contradiction. After denying the fact, he was ultimately compelled to confess that he did state to Mr. Kenrick that Beale claimed the sheep as his property. Under these circumstances, he thought Mr. Kenrick, in refusing the search-warrant, had acted rightly. In a case of this kind slight circumstances were often of very great importance in leading to a correct conclusion, and he wished the house to observe, that Mr. K., who was said to have acted partially on account of a sort of acquaintance with Beale, did not know the Christian name of the person whom he was supposed to be so anxious to favour. That piece of information he received from the butler. It also appeared that the butler, who was acquainted with Mr. Kenrick's feelings towards the accused, handed a search-warrant to him for the purpose of having it filled; but Mr. Kenrick merely stated that he did not think it necessary in this case. On this part of the case the general impression must be, that no undue, corrupt, or improper feeling had been made out which could warrant the house to interfere in the matter. He now came to Mr. Kenrick's subsequent conduct towards Canfor, and on that he thought that Mr. Kenrick in calling on his servant to act as a constable, and seizing the note he had given to Canfor, had acted in an indefensible manner. A civil action had been brought against him, and a verdict obtained, which proved he had acted improperly. But whether the house would feel themselves called on to animadvert on this indiscretion with the severity urged by the learned gent., was a question admitting of considerable discussion. For his own part, he thought it would not become parliament to proceed vindictively, because Mr. Kenrick had detained Canfor in his house for one hour, that individual having obtained damages for the false imprisonment. Mr. Kenrick had acted improperly, and he was sorry that he had suffered his temper to prevail, but they ought not to lose sight of the provocation which he had received. They had been told that they were to draw no unfair conclusion from Canfor's conduct at the bar, because he was so overwhelmed by the novelty of his situation, that he was unable to give so correct evidence as he otherwise might have done. Of course, he was extremely terrified when placed before the Commons of England; but the house could not forget his demeanour; and from the specimen they had seen, it was possible that in the heat of summer, and under the feelings of irritation for the loss of his ram, his conduct to Mr. Kenrick might not have been of that mild and conciliatory nature which would please a magistrate. When it was considered, besides, that Canfor had threatened to hand Mr. Kenrick over to his solicitor, he (Mr. Peel) was induced to believe that the whole of his conduct had been offensive and provoking. He did not say that if the provocation had been greater, it would be a sufficient excuse for Mr. Kenrick's forgetting the moderation and temper which became his situation as a magistrate, but it must at the same time be allowed to have some weight when the house came to determine the amount of delinquency in the case. A great stress had been laid upon Mr. Kenrick's having thought proper to detain the fleece. He thought the reason which that gentleman gave for having done so was very satisfactory: believing it would thereafter become the subject of a civil action, he had taken it into his own possession, that it might be forthcoming at the proper time. He knew that he could not justify his conduct in a court of justice—but still the motive which had influenced him ought not to be lost sight of by the House of Commons when they were called upon to pronounce a censure upon a magistrate. The learned gent. said, that because one part of a man's conduct had been the subject of an action in a court of justice, it was no reason why other parts of it should not afterwards be investigated. He agreed with him in the general principle, and he agreed that the criminal conviction of a magistrate was a sufficient ground for the Lord Chancellor's removing him from the commission; but the question in this case, as in every other, must be, whether such a punishment would be commensurate with the offence charged; and here it must be remembered, that there was not only no conviction, but not even a criminal charge. He knew the same thing had been done in Ireland, even without a conviction; but that proceeding was not approved of in this house, and it had been said that the Lord Chancellor for Ireland would have done better to follow the English practice. The learned gent. had alluded to the case of a servant who should rob his master, but he put it to his candour whether there was the slightest resemblance between that case and the present. Mr. Kenrick's conduct had never been brought before a court of justice. Canfor had accepted of it as a composition for his action; and it was said that he had now presented his petition to the house solely from the love of public justice, and to prevent an improper person from holding any longer an authority which he had abused. He (Mr. P.) did not think that any of these allegations had been proved. He denied that any charge of felony had been suppressed or attempted to be suppressed by Mr. Kenrick. He denied, at least he doubted, that Canfor had been influenced by the motives foisted into his petition. He believed that, hearing of Franks's case, Canfor thought it was a good opportunity for bringing forward his own complaint. He would not, however, have it supposed that Mr. Kenrick ought to be dismissed with a sentiment of approbation: his conduct was such as could, in no point of view, be justified; but it was not such as called for the interference of the house. He should therefore conclude by moving a resolution, which, although from what had been said last night he had reason to believe it might be unsatisfactory to some hon. gent., was in his opinion consistent with the justice of the case, and with the usual practice of the House of Commons, viz. "that this committee, after hearing the evidence brought in support of the allegations of Mr. Canfor's petition, and the counsel for Mr. Kenrick, do not think it expedient to recommend any further proceeding in reference to that petition."

Mr. Tierney never heard a resolution less satisfactory, though he was ready to admit the candour with which the rt. hon. gent. had expressed his utter incapacity to approve of the conduct of Mr. Kenrick. He (Mr. T.) went, however, a little farther, and thought that the house would lower itself in the estimation of the public, if it did not in the most unequivocal manner mark its sense of the outrageous conduct of that gentleman, and protect the people against any future mal-administration of justice in the same quarter. There were two questions involved in the subject before the house. One, whether Canfor had received sufficient redress for the wrong he had sustained; the other, which deserved the serious attention of the house, whether some security ought not to be provided to protect the public against injury in future, from acts similar to those now complained of; because other magistrates might, like Mr. Kenrick, misuse the very extensive powers with which they were intrusted, and instead of preserving the public peace, become instruments of oppression to all over whom they had authority. The first part of the case made out against that gentleman, was his refusal to grant a search-warrant on Canfor's application; the second was his imprisonment of that person in consequence of his refusing to give up the note and fleece.—The rt. hon. gent. said, that all attempts to prove any corrupt motive on the part of Mr. Kenrick had failed. It was not necessary to prove any such motive; but whether any such motives existed—whether Mr. Kenrick's temper were so violent as to be beyond his power of controlling it—or whether he had not the capacity to execute the duties of his office—the rt. hon. gent. might choose which he would—it was obvious that Mr. Kenrick was unfit any longer to remain in his situation as a judge. The rt. hon. gent. said, that Canfor's manner was calculated to provoke the magistrate; but he had travelled in search of his ram, until the blood ran out of his breeches knees; and it was no wonder that he should be chafed a little when he applied to the magistrate. When he was imprisoned, he showed no symptoms of violence; the violence was all on the side of the magistrate. Let the house consider whether the man had not some excuse for being a little out of temper. It must be remembered that Canfor was not acquainted with all those niceties and refinements which a lawyer had at his fingers' ends; he was only a butcher. He said to the magistrate that he had lost his ram, and after walking a long time in search of it, he had at length found it in the fold of another man. That man told him he would neither give him his ram nor show him the fleece which had been shorn from its back; and he therefore asked the magistrate to give him a search-warrant, which he thought was the best means of getting possession of his property. So every man in his situation would have thought. Well, Mr. Kenrick was not then angry; he said, "I won't grant you a search-warrant; but I'll give you a note to the man, who, you say, has got your ram, and this will operate as a summons and bring him to me." He found no fault with this proceeding, excepting that Canfor's evidence was not taken on oath. To grant a summons, might have been the best; he believed, indeed, that it was the common course. Mr. Beale, who had the ram, was said to be an excellent character. He did not dispute it; but he must be permitted to say that Mr. Beale's conduct with respect to rams was very extraordinary (a laugh). Mr. Beale had lost a ram that had a mark upon its ramp. He happened to find another, which had a mark on its side, and he said to himself, that although this was not his, it would do as well as another; so he took it home, and to prevent any mistakes about the mark, he sheered the fleece off (laughter). The owner of the ram saw it, and notwithstanding the change it had undergone, he recognised it to be his, and told Mr. Beale so, who refused to give it up.—Canfor then said, "Show me the fleece, and I'll convince you it is mine." Mr. Beale who had taken the ram in the manner described, refused this request, which seemed very reasonable. This made Canfor very angry, and no wonder that it did. He then went to Mr. Kenrick, and solicited redress in what he thought the best manner, that was to say, by a search warrant. Mr. Kenrick gave him a note instead, and with this he went to Mr. Beale again. Says Beale, "I won't show you the fleece, and I don't care for Mr. Kenrick nor his note either." This of course made Canfor still more angry, and as he found Mr. Kenrick's note of so little use to him, he went to another magistrate, Mr. Burgess, who, from a regard to etiquette, which might be proper enough, refused to interfere. Canfor had therefore nothing to do but to go back again to Mr. Kenrick, and he did so; and then came what he (Mr. T.) thought a very material part of the story. Canfor found Mr. Kenrick's servant, George Adams, who was a principal actor in the drama. This person, who was no doubt a very excellent clerk and a worthy butler, said, "My master will have nothing further to do in this business." This singular saying had never been contradicted. Mr. Kenrick in his petition, which was in fact an answer to Canfor's, did not rebut this statement. Did the rt. hon. gent. mean to say that he acted correctly here? The rt. hon. gent. had objected to the illustration used by his learned friend of a servant who rubbed his master; but suppose that he had lost his plate, and found it where it was in considerable danger of being melted—suppose he then applied to a magistrate, and said, "I have found my plate, but if you don't assist me to get it back immediately the arms will be rubbed out, and I shall never be able to identify it." This case of the fleece was exactly the same, and he asked whether any magistrate (he spoke in the hearing of many) would refuse to give him any help, and say as Mr. Kenrick had done, "No; I will have nothing further to do in the business." His objection to grant a warrant might be reasonable enough; but was there any reason why he should have refused to investigate the affair? All that the poor man got, instead of the redress he went for, was a message through the butler, to the effect that Mr. Kenrick would have nothing more to do with it. Canfor then grumbled, and it was not surprising that he did so; upon which the butler said that Beale had been there, and that there was a proposition to refer it to Mr. Nash. Canfor said he did not care to whom it was referred, if the fleece should be produced, because without that, it would be impossible to satisfy the referee. Now, although before this, Mr. Kenrick knew nothing of Mr. Beale, he had in the interim become acquainted with him through his butler. The matter was then referred, and the result was, that Canfor got both his ram and his fleece. He might then have gone home if he had chosen, but he said, "No; I'll go to Mr. Kenrick again, and show him that I have had an award in my favour, and that I have not made an improper charge." He went to Mr. Kenrick, and there the scene was entirely changed. "Oh, you dog!" says Mr. Kenrick, "you have got back your ram and your fleece, have you? then I'll make a special constable of my butler, and have you taken into custody." And this was what the poor fellow got for calling upon the magistrate to pay him a passing civility. Mr. Kenrick gave as a reason for this, that he wished to keep the fleece, because it might be necessary afterwards to produce it in a court of law. Now, without meaning any thing in the least degree uncivil to Mr. Kenrick, he (Mr. T.) must take the liberty to say he did not believe this. Mr. Kenrick, it must be remembered, was a judge; he had no such excuse as other persons might have pleaded. He was well acquainted with the law, and he must have known whether such a pretence was well founded or not. He might have produced Rde and Nash, the referees, and Adams and Beale; but he had not done so; and therefore, he (Mr. T.) must be forgiven, if he did not believe one word of a statement which was opposed to his own common sense. Canfor having refused to give up the fleece or the note, Mr. Kenrick told his butler, and another constable, to search him and seize the note. Canfor brought an action for this imprisonment, and Mr. Kenrick, when it came to trial, thought fit to compromise it. The action was put an end to by the payment of 5*l.* and the costs. A good deal had been said about Canfor's motives, but he did not care what those motives might have been. The house had nothing to do with them; but since, by a sort of God-send, the case had come before them, were they to shut their eyes to it? The rt. hon. gentleman had said, the case was not worthy of the interference of the house. If this instance of violence and of intemperate use of the authority he had been intrusted with was not a reason why the conduct of a magistrate should be investigated, what case could require an investigation? It was said that the case of Franks must not now be taken into the account. He did not want to do so, but the facts of that case had been made so public that no one could forget them. A piece of wood of the value of one shilling had been stolen from Mr. Kenrick, for which he committed Franks to gaol, and after he had been confined two months, and exposed to every privation, offered to let him out if he would plead guilty. He (Mr. T.) could not help thinking that, notwithstanding his opposition to the resolutions of his learned friend, it would not be the rt. hon. gent's fault if Mr. Kenrick was not persuaded to quit the premises, and not interfere further with the administration of justice. He had said that, in Ireland, magistrates had been removed without being convicted, and that such a practice had been blamed; but the difference between those cases and the present was, that here the party had been convicted. (Mr. Peel said the action against Mr. Kenrick was a civil one.) He (Mr. T.) knew it was; but he was sure the rt. hon. gent. was too candid to cavil for a strict interpretation of words when the result of that action was in fact a conviction. It was the duty of the Lord Chancellor, or of ministers, or whoever else might have to advise his majesty, to recommend the removal of Mr. Kenrick. He had never heard of a case more suspicious or more disgusting than this; and he could not imagine any person less fitted to discharge the duties of a magistrate than one who had conducted himself like Mr. Kenrick. Whether the resolution of his learned friend was the best they could adopt, he did not decide; but he had no hesitation in voting for it. He said so without any feeling of ill-will towards Mr. Kenrick, of whom he knew nothing, and with whom he had had no communication. He knew that the interference with the conduct of magistrates in their judicial capacities was always a matter of delicacy. He knew that it was easy to bring charges against them, and that it was difficult to rebut those charges; but he thought, in the present case, that the charge had been satisfactorily substantiated, and that the interference of the house was urgently called for. He had himself often refused to present petitions against magistrates, because he was not satisfied with the nature of the complaint against them, and he would not have been instrumental in fixing upon them the imputations which must arise from such charges being printed and dispersed throughout the country, when the proof might have fallen short of the facts stated. This case, however, he thought, had been fully made out, and he implored his Majesty's ministers to consider the consequences of denying justice to the people, and the necessity of preserving in the minds of all men a good opinion of those who were intrusted with the administration of it (hear).

Mr. Canning said, he fully concurred in the last sentiment of his rt. hon. friend, but before the house came to the conclusion which he would press upon them, they would do well to consider whether the case was of so grave a nature as to justify the course proposed by the learned gent. Nothing could be more untrue, than that because ministers were not prepared to go all lengths in censuring the conduct of Mr. Kenrick, they therefore approved of it. The question was, whether the case called upon the house to exercise that highest and most transcendent power which parliament unquestionably possessed; and if it did not (as he thought it did not), whether they should pursue an intermediate course which would brand Mr. Kenrick with an imputation which would render him powerless in the high office he held, and thus produce a great public mischief. Without going into the details of the case, he was decidedly of opinion that neither of these courses should be adopted. He had no acquaintance with Mr. Kenrick: he had no partiality in his favour, and yet he must say that this was the most trumped-up case upon which it had ever been proposed to found so grave a charge. The whole extent to which it reached proved only that Mr. Kenrick had been guilty of an indiscreet and culpable want of temper in his interview with Canfor. With respect to the search-warrant, that part of the case was given up. That he had suffered his temper and his discretion to be overcome, could not be denied, nor could it be justified; but the complaint and provocation must be taken together. Was the loss of temper in an interview with that provoking individual, who had lately appeared at the bar of that house, so great a crime that it could only be sufficiently punished by removing the person who committed it from his office of judge? He could not in his conscience say that it deserved any such punishment; and as that was the only one which could be inflicted consistently with the interests of the country, he would not consent to adopt that other measure, as unjust as it was inconsistent with those interests, of blasting the character of the person accused, and yet leaving him in the possession of his office. This was the short view which he had taken of the subject, and which had determined him not to vote for the resolutions of the learned gent., which would be nugatory unless they were followed up by an address to his majesty. It could not be denied that flying into a passion—the only charge proved against Mr. Kenrick—was a moral fault; but the House of Commons must be cautious in inquiring into the private life of persons, because it might happen that the most respected characters, whose public conduct was without reproach, might be open to similar imputations in their private habits.

Mr. H. Summer expressed his astonishment at the view taken of the case by the right hon. gent., and at the severe strictures which had been passed upon the manner in which Canfor had given his evidence at the bar. It should be recollected that this man was a person of no education, and that he had adopted a manner which he thought would evince his independency, and about which he might afterwards boast to his pot-companions, when he detailed to them his conduct at the bar of that house. But although he could find no other excuse for that manner than the man's vulgarity, he felt himself bound to state to the house that the facts in his evidence were the same, without any alteration, as those which he had detailed to him ten days after they had occurred. This consistency (while there were so many inducements to vary, if he had been the man he had been represented to be) convinced him (Mr. H. S.) of Canfor's veracity. Those who treated the present question as trifling, did injustice to the interests of the public; and the statements as to Mr. Kenrick's character did not alter the nature of the transaction; and that was a point upon which there might be two opinions. After so much as had appeared before the house—after the intemperate conduct which had been proved upon Mr. Kenrick—it was impossible to leave him, without full investigation, in the discharge of duties which he could not continue to exercise without suspicion.

Sir Francis Burdett took the short question to be—a question which the house was bound to pursue in any shape, and by all available inquiries—whether Mr. Kenrick had or had not exhibited such qualities of character as ought to exclude him from further filling two such offices as those of justice of the peace, and judge upon a circuit. In his opinion this had decidedly been the case. He by no means looked at the transaction in the light in which it was attempted to be presented by the hon. gent. opposite; and was far from concurring in the doctrine laid down by them, that persons in office should not experience the animadversions of that house, unless they had been guilty of such criminality as justified an address to the Crown for their removal. If gentlemen in those situations were led to believe that they would be exempt from the consequences of all minor offences, they would, in all probability, become less observant of their duty. But, seeing that it was too late now in the session to obtain all the evidence which Mr. Kenrick might think necessary to his justification, he should advise his learned friend to rest satisfied with the opinion which the house had already expressed; leaving upon ministers the responsibility of declaring how far, upon their own investigation, the resolution moved ought to be carried into operation, and reserving to himself the opportunity, in the next session, of inquiring what discretion had been exercised. In proposing this course, he desired to be understood as fully ready to go all the length proposed by his learned friend, and as being decidedly of opinion, that, upon due consideration, there was only one course which the right hon. gent. on the other side could adopt. He concluded by observing—while the house was on the question of dismissing judges—that there was a petition to which he should, in the next year, call its attention, from a Mr. Thorpe, late judge at Sierra Leone, who, as it appeared to him, had been dismissed from his office upon grounds far lighter than those now proved before the house, and in the greatest degree unjust and unsatisfactory.

Mr. W. Courtenay said, that it was quite impossible to cast upon ministers the responsibility of dismissing, upon their own investigation, a judge from his office, against whom the house had not gone so far as to come to any vote of reprehension.

Sir F. Burdett said he had only referred to Mr. Kenrick's removal from the commission of the peace.

Mr. W. Courtenay considered that view of the case still more extraordinary than the other. Was it possible for ministers to come to a resolution that a gentleman was not fit to be a magistrate, and yet allow him to go on filling the office of a judge?

Mr. Denman said, that in one view of the case the house seemed to differ very little in opinion. When a rt. hon. gent. opposite, in defending Mr. Kenrick, spoke of his conduct as discreditably intemperate, and highly blameable, this was coming as nearly as possible to the language of his (Mr. Denman's) own resolutions. Under these circumstances, still maintaining that his resolution, in its fullest extent, was the correct one, he should rest satisfied with the house having pronounced no decision upon the case, and should not press his vote to a division.

Mr. Wynn admitted some haste and intemperance in Mr. Kenrick's conduct in the present case, but declared that his conduct as a judge in Wales had always given the highest satisfaction. He doubted how far the severe dealings with Mr. Kenrick for his warmth would form a convenient precedent. Suppose it were to be made a question how far a gentleman, who, in a committee of that house, had been so intemperate as to commit a violent assault upon another, was fit to remain a member of parliament (hear, hear, and great laughter)? He believed that there had been a great many admirable judges, whose conduct would not have borne this inquiry which was to be indicted upon Mr. Kenrick. In conclusion, he would say, that if it had been proved that Mr. Kenrick had acted from corrupt motives, that would have been a sufficient ground for addressing the Crown to remove him from his office; but no such fact had in his opinion been established, and he thought the case as it at present stood, was too slight to require any notice to be taken of it by that house.

Mr. Denman said that the cases of a choleric member of parliament and an intemperate magistrate were not parallel. The violence of the former could injure no one but himself; whilst the intemperance of the latter might prove hurtful to those whom it was his duty to protect.

The Chairman then put the question on the amendment, which was carried without a division.

Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 1.—The Earl of Liverpool rose to call the attention of their lordships to the state of the jurisdiction of the house with regard to appeals. In consequence of the immense arrears of appeals which had accumulated, their lordships found themselves, a few sessions ago, called upon to consider whether some means could not be devised for facilitating the administration of justice. A committee was appointed to consider the subject, and that committee made a report in the session before last. What the state of things then was, would be seen by reference to the first paragraph of the report. It appeared that the number of appeals and writs of error then existing in arrear was 225, out of which 150 appeals were from Scotland. This number, in consequence of the accumulation which was to be expected in the course of each succeeding session, rendered it probable that the house, in the ordinary course of its proceedings, would not be able to dispose of the appeals in arrear in a less period than five years. The committee found that those from Scotland were not only the most numerous, but that they were of the description which occupied the greatest portion of the time of the house. The question of arrear, however, was, the difficulty which their lordships had to encounter; for if the arrear could be got rid of, it would be easy to decide future appeals in the ordinary course. To facilitate the decision of cases from Scotland, an endeavour had been made by a change in the legal proceedings to separate questions of law from questions of fact. This measure, the effect of which must be very advantageous, was just coming into operation; so that their lordships might be confident, if they once got rid of the arrear, that they could go on prospectively without any difficulty. The report of the committee contained a number of valuable suggestions. Among other things it was recommended, that a certain number of their lordships would attend daily, from nine o'clock to five, for the purpose of hearing appeals. Objection had been made to compulsory attendance; but this course was finally adopted, and their lordships had had the advantage of the able assistance of a learned lord (Gifford), who had devoted much of his attention to proceedings in appeal, and in particular to the law of Scotland. The beneficial effects of this arrangement were soon felt on its coming into operation in the course of last year. At the commencement of last session the number of appeals was 322, and of writs of error 74, making altogether 396. During the session, 186 of these appeals were gone through, above 40 of them having been struck off; so that at the end of the session there remained only 170 undisposed of. But their lordships had to look, not only to the number of appeals they decided, but to the number of new ones which were brought forward in a session. The number which had come in on the commencement of this session was 52. The number of appeals then standing was 201, and the writs of error 23, making only 229, instead of 326, as at the beginning of the preceding session. Of this number, 229, their lordships had already disposed of 126, so that there remained only 103 undecided. If their lordships proceeded in this manner, by the end of next session there would be left only 26 or 27 appeals undecided; but whether that number, or a few more or less, it was evident that by going on they would completely conquer the difficulty which once appeared insurmountable, and that this would be done independently of the improvement in the law of Scotland, which would render less probable so great an accumulation of appeals from that country in future. It had been said, however, that this arrangement would only give occasion to more appeals being brought. He did not think so. If their lordships once showed that they were capable of promptly discharging all the judicial business which came before them—if no delay were expected, so many appeals would not come before them. The decrease of appeals during the two last sessions fortified him in his opinion. In 1823, the number was 59; in 1824, the number was 39; and in the present session of 1825, only 29. He now proposed, that of the five days of every week, on which a part of their lordships sat to hear appeals, one day should be appropriated to the hearing of those which should come in, in the course of the existing session. If this arrangement were commenced next year, it would probably have a considerable effect both in disposing of appeals, and in taking away the inducement to the bringing of them. The result of their lordships' decisions might also be stated. It appeared that out of 86 appeals brought during the session, 63 had been affirmed, 17 reversed, and 6 remitted. The arrangements which had been adopted, his lordship said, had, generally speaking, given great satisfaction in Scotland; and after expressing his sense of the credit due to the committee for originating the plan, so the house for carrying it into effect, and to all persons who assisted in its execution, he concluded by moving for certain papers relating to the state of appeals.—Ordered.

County Courts' Bill.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, FEB. 8.—Lord Althorpe rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the recovery of small debts in England and Wales, and observed, that it would be unnecessary for him to go into detail upon this measure, as he had during the last session fully explained his object, when a similar bill was rejected elsewhere, in consequence of his refusal to allow compensation for certain sinecure offices which it was said would be affected. He now consented to introduce a clause for the purpose of allowing such compensations; although he retained his former opinion that the bill would be better without it, yet he yielded to the wishes of others, and was anxious even at this expense to forward the measure. After the second reading of the bill, to which he understood in its new form there would be no objection, he should move for the appointment of a committee to consider of the sinecure claims, which he believed would be found smaller than he at first apprehended. He then obtained leave, and brought in his bill, which was read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on Friday next, and to be printed.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.—Mr. Scarlett presented a petition against the bill for the recovery of small debts, signed by a number of gentlemen connected with the profession of the law. The learned member said, that he considered the measure introduced by his noble friend (Lord Althorpe) as too violent an innovation on the existing form of proceeding to obtain the sanction of parliament.

MONDAY, MAY 2.—Lord Althorpe brought up the report of the committee on the County Courts' bill.

Mr. Brougham said, that in consequence of the alterations which had been made in the committee, having for their object to prevent the increase of the influence of the Crown, the bill now met his entire approbation.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.—Upon the report of resolutions upon the County Courts' bill,

Lord Althorpe argued against any compensations being granted to officers of courts of justice, for the loss of fees arising out of the reforms made in the courts by the present bill. The compensations proposed were to be granted for the loss of professional profits, against all the known chances and vicissitudes of professional life. He objected to any compensation being made to any individual who could not prove an actual loss arising out of the present bill.

Mr. Hume wanted to know whether, if compensations were given to those who suffered in the present instance, gentlemen were prepared to support the principle of giving compensations to all who, in any case, should suffer a loss of fees under any bills of reform and improvement? The claims in the present case were grounded upon the argument, that the claimants were injured in offices which they had acquired by purchase. For his part, he thought that the sale of offices in courts of justice was in itself a great evil, and the first step ought to be, to prohibit any such sale, and thereby to prevent any claim for losses sustained by a reform of purchased offices. The whole system of fees was pernicious in the extreme. As to the compensations claimed in the present instance, upon the same principle might compensation be claimed for losses by any manufacturer who had established his manufactory upon the faith of laws, and had sustained injury by an alteration of such laws two individuals in the house, the compensations would never have been heard of. The noble lord, who was the origin of the measure, would never have consented to the compensations, but from a knowledge that without acquiescence in this demand, his bill would not pass through the other house. What a state were they reduced to, if they were obliged to vote away the public money, merely to prevent the opposition to a useful measure, by a party personally interested in the abuses which that measure was intended to reform.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.—Lord Althorpe moved the third reading of the County Courts' bill, which was then read a third time.

Mr. Alderman Wood proposed a clause, by way of rider, to exempt the city of London from the effects of the bill.

Lord Althorpe had no objection to the clause, because, in the old County Courts' bill, the city of London was not included.

The clause was then agreed to, and added to the bill by way of rider.

Mr. Bright proposed a clause of a similar nature with regard to Bristol, which was agreed to.

The bill was then passed.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 21.—The house went into a committee on the County Courts' bill, when, after a conversation, in which Lord Ridgdale, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Darnley, and the Lord Chancellor took part, the house resumed, and the chairman (Lord Shaftesbury) moved that the report be received this day three months. The motion was agreed to, and the bill consequently lost. The chief ground of opposition stated by the Lord Chancellor to the measure was, the want of a clause for compensating those officers in the existing courts whose income would be affected by the passing of the bill. His lordship recommended a commission to inquire into the subject before any measure should be submitted to parliament.

Court of Chancery.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, FEB. 18.—Mr. J. Williams moved for a return of all the appeals decided in the Court of Chancery, between the Hilary terms of 1823 and 1825; and the causes upon which they were disposed of, distinguishing those decided by judgment from those which were struck out of the paper. Also other returns, which went to show the state of the business, and the general rate of dispatch.

Mr. Peel objected to the motion, because the usual notice was not given.

Mr. J. Williams said, that the first part of the motion was in mere continuation of returns already before the house.

Mr. Peel would not object to so much of the motion.

Mr. J. Williams moved for the first-mentioned returns accordingly, and gave notice of a motion for the production of the remainder.—Ordered.

MONDAY, APRIL 25.—Mr. J. Williams begged leave to ask the rt. hon. Sec. for the Home Department, whether there were any prospect of the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the practice of the Court of Chancery being laid before the house?

Mr. Peel said he was not prepared to give a satisfactory answer to the question. He could have no official communication with the commissioners until the report was made. As to the progress made in the inquiry, or the approximation towards the completion of the report, he possessed no official information. He would advise the learned member to address his inquiry to the learned member for Exeter (Mr. Courtenay), or some other member of the commission.

Mr. Brougham expressed his surprise that the commission had not yet laid any information before the house, particularly as the Solicitor-General had some time ago informed the house that they might soon expect a "partial report" on the subject.

Mr. Courtenay said, it would be improper for him to attempt to fix any time at which the report of the commission would be made; but the commissioners had not been idle, and had no wish to delay the presentation of the report. He believed he might say that the report would be presented in the course of the session, but he would not be understood as pledged to that declaration. He was sure that the house would see the propriety of his speaking so guardedly, when they recollected that the object of the commission was to inquire into the practice which had existed for centuries in the highest court of judicature in the kingdom. Whatever his learned friend might think on the subject, the commissioners were of opinion, that no alteration should be made in the practice of that court without full and deliberate discussion. The commissioners had reviewed the whole practice of the court from its very commencement; and before they could be prepared to recommend any improvement of the present system, they must take time to consider the subject deliberately.

TUESDAY, MAY 21.—Mr. J. Williams, in rising to present certain petitions touching delays and other grievances in the Court of Chancery, said, that although it would be competent to him to submit to that house a distinct motion on the subject to which the petitions referred, yet, as it was presumed that a report, whether partial or general, was shortly to be laid before the house by the commissioners appointed to inquire into the forms of proceeding in the Court of Chancery, he preferred postponing such motion, as there might exist a difference of opinion as to the propriety of proceeding before that report was presented. But of this he was persuaded, that there did not, without the doors of that house, exist a single person, and he trusted that few would be found within it, who were not satisfied, that no matter what the character of that long expected report from the commissioners, no long interval of time would be suffered to elapse without a thorough reformation being effected in the proceedings and jurisdiction of that court (hear, hear). There was, it was said, a limit to forbearance in human suffering. But there was a patience of another character, in the display of which a certain class of men were most exemplary, and in which it did seem that the present commissioners were not deficient—a patience as to the sufferings endured by other people (hear, hear). When that commission was appointed, he felt no hope. He therefore was not disappointed. He had, perhaps, in his view that observation of Burke—that serious reformers would never choose the authors and abettors of the system to be reformed as instruments for its correction. He thought the appointment nothing but a parliamentary manoeuvre of the rt. hon. gent. opposite (Mr. Peel) (hear, hear). He would admit, that if he sat on the same side, had the same object as, and possessed the countenance of the rt. hon. gent., he might have followed the same course (hear, and a laugh). But he was surprised that the right hon. gent. could have mentioned the commission with a serious countenance. He believed that not even the gravest of his Majesty's ministers, from the learned lord to the rt. hon. gent., could peruse the list of commissioners, and reflecting on the object for which they were appointed, could refrain from laughter (hear, hear). However, he was not sorry that the commission had been so tardy in their proceedings. The period which they had suffered to elapse, had given the system time to work, as the phrase was. It had brought things to maturity, and more fully showed the necessity of the reform for which he had contended. It now appeared that the number of causes and appeals which remained for hearing were upwards of four hundred. The judgments to be given in causes, appeals, petitions, and other "matters and things," as they expressed it in that court, amounted to 1,200 (including the causes to be heard). Looking at the mode in which business had proceeded in Chancery since the year 1813, and taking the average of causes heard each year in that time, as the measure by which to judge of the future progress of the court, the last cause now on the list would come on for a hearing (he would not say when for judgment) in forty years from the present date (hear, hear). The evil had arrived at maturity, and called for a thorough reformation: a mere revision of the forms of proceeding would effect no beneficial change; from the present commission, therefore, he expected nothing. If thirty years should be considered a little too long for the duration of a Chancery suit, or 10,000*l.* a little too much to be expended on it, perhaps they would receive from the commission some such copious relief, as a reduction of the time to twenty-nine years and nine months, and of the expense to 9,999*l.* (hear). He, however, did not despair, but looked to a prompt reformation of this overwhelming jurisdiction, so much at variance with the principles of our common law. If such evils had arisen under the direction of consummate wisdom, it was time for folly to see what it could do in the reform of them. The time would come, when the country would not be satisfied with going merely to the rind and surface of this jurisdiction—a jurisdiction depending on no legal enactments, nor resting like the common law on any immemorial usages (hear). He said resting on no immemorial usages, for Sir Wm. Blackstone had said, that though there had been many accurate writers who treated on courts and their several jurisdictions before the period when the time of immemorial usage commenced, not one of them had taken any notice about the equitable jurisdiction of the court of Chancery,—of that court, which had now swollen to such a magnitude, that it actually reeled and staggered under its own weight. Some persons might be inclined to ask, how was this jurisdiction founded, if not in legislative enactment or in immemorial usage. It was founded in the conscience of the keepers of the great seal, of which, as they had generally been priests or lawyers, he would say, that it was a sandy foundation for a great paramount jurisdiction. Selden, in speaking of the origin of the court of Chancery and its way of conducting business, made use of the following expressions:—"For law we have a measure, and know what we have to trust to; but equity is according to the conscience of the chancellor, and as it is shorter or longer, so is equity. It is the same as if it were measured by the chancellor's foot. What can be more uncertain? One chancellor has a long foot, another chancellor has a short foot, and a third chancellor has an indifferant foot: and so it is with the chancellor's conscience" (loud laughter). Now, if this were a fair description of the foundation on which the jurisdiction of the court of Chancery rested, that by itself would form a sufficient reason for inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court of Chancery, even if there were not other reasons which rendered that inquiry unavoidable: such a task could not be executed by a commission of mere lawyers, though he was certain that the length of time during which the present commission had been engaged, would ultimately tend to accelerate and consummate that good work, it would become worthy of consideration whether, in place of such a system, it was not high time in this thinking country, as Mr. Cobbett had ironically called it, to substitute another, and attempt a system on the authoritative foundation of the legislature of the country, ascertaining, describing, defining, limiting, and laying down, certain rules for the guidance of suitors, so that they might in future have to trust to legislative enactments, and not the conscience of any chancellor (hear). It was impossible that the country would long allow the question to remain unexamined, how far it was expedient, that there should be two conflicting systems of judicature, co-existing in the same country—a phenomenon in jurisprudence, which he had the authority of Sir William Blackstone for saying, was not known in any other country. It would be convenient for the people of England to learn, whether it were proper that by law a remedy should be pointed out to the suitor for a grievance—that he should be at liberty to pursue that remedy up to a certain point—that, after he had advanced so far, he should be withdrawn from the tribunal in which he had claimed redress to another tribunal, proceeding upon separate rules, and acting upon a contrary law—that he should be forced out of the court which would have submitted his case for trial to a jury of his country, to be placed in a court of equity, where the most unsatisfactory mode of trial was pursued, by admitting written interrogatories, and none else, to be administered to a witness in one place by an examinant in another, and by leaving the effect of those interrogatories, indefinite and uncertain as they were, to be afterwards judged of by a single individual—that he should be torn from a tribunal of which the rules had often saved the constitution, to be dragged into another, which acted on rules intelligible to few persons and beneficial to none; and that when he had arrived, as he supposed, at the end of his trouble, when he had made the court acquainted with all the facts of his case, the court of Chancery should then be allowed to interfere—and till then it was not allowed to interfere—to render unavailable all the measures he had taken; and that, too, without grounding its proceedings on a single affidavit, though the result of them was to rob the suitor of the righteous fruit of his judgment—namely, his execution (hear, hear). Circumstances like these must, he was sure, become the subject of grave inquiry, when this commission limited to the skirts and fringes of the court of Chancery—this commission for entering into its mere rind and surface, and for not proceeding any further—this commission for considering how much it was possible to shorten the distance between the first subpoena and the final answer should have passed away, and left no trace of its existence. The circumstances he had mentioned must ere long form the substantial and paramount parts of some legislative inquiry. The country would not much longer endure that an equitable jurisdiction should, after a suitor had almost reached the termination of an action at law, take that action from a court which knew the facts of it, and place it in another court which knew nothing of them, and which compelled the suitor to incur an expenditure to tenfold the amount of that which he had previously incurred in the court of law. Whether the present commission were engaged in such inquiries or not, it would be fitting to inquire how far it was right in this thinking country, that a man, who had made himself master of a sum of money under circumstances of palpable fraud, should be able to defend himself successfully against all summary proceedings for the recovery of it. Was it right that a trustee who had misapplied trust money in his hands, should have the doors of equity thrown open to him, so as to find refuge within it from the just claims of those whom he had defrauded? As the law now stood, the person injured could not obtain any redress as against a trustee without seeking the door of the court of Chancery, which the moment he entered was closed for ever against his escape. So, too, with regard to executors. An estate might be worth 100,000*l.*, and the debts upon it might not amount to one farthing. The payment of a legacy to the amount of 1,000*l.* might be deferred for years, if the executor chose to say, "Let me see what the amount of this estate is before I pay to you the bequest of the testator." In so plain a case, which required and admitted of a speedy remedy, the legatee was entirely without relief, unless he thought proper to seek it in that odious dungeon the court of Chancery; from which, when he was once immured in it, he seldom escaped without loss of comfort, fortune, and life (hear). He did not mean to say that people were killed in that court, but that they were subjected in it to a species of living death in the anxiety and mental torture to which its proceedings gave rise, and that they often perished by starvation, owing to the manner in which it expended and deprived them of their scanty means (hear). But to return to the point from which he had digressed. Was it right that this thinking people should, in two such cases as he had just mentioned, be referred for relief, as it was insultingly and mockingly called, to the court of Chancery? These points demanded inquiry; but it was an inquiry that ought to be conducted, he would speak out plainly, not by lawyers either ancient or modern—not by persons either moving in the trammels or enjoying the emoluments of the law, but, if it were to be successful, by persons possessing greater information, greater intelligence, and more philosophy and reasoning, than generally fell to the lot of members of the profession. His observation was intended to apply to the profession generally, and to himself amongst others. Letting that point, however, pass for the present, he would now proceed to another. Before the report of the commission was received by the house, the time would be thought to have arrived for considering the transfer of real property in England—a system disgraceful to the country, and matter of ridicule and disgust to those who understood it, and saw how it was managed (hear, hear). In all ordinary contracts relating to personal property, a man knew what he undertook to buy, and what he undertook to give for it. For instance, if he bought a horse, he saw what he had to receive, and he knew the price he had to pay for it. But if he purchased land, even to the amount of 100,000*l.*, he would undertake to say that not even the rt. hon. gent. opposite (Mr. Peel), nor his learned friend who sat near him, no, nor one lawyer in 500—for the chosen few who understood this department of the law were not more than half a dozen—would venture to affirm that they were receiving for their 100,000*l.* the worth of 100,000*l.* or of one farthing. In point of fact, they knew no more upon that point than he did upon the law of China or Hindostan (hear, and a laugh). The law affecting the transfer of real property was reserved for the consideration and profit of a select few, removed from the general practice of the profession, whose ways were past finding out, whose movements were no more to be determined by reason than those of the astrologer, who, to use the language of Hudibras,

— "Deals in destiny's dark counsels
And sage opinions of the moon sells."

whose principles were no more intelligible than those contained in the dicta of the Magi, or in any thing else that was purposely hidden from the understanding of mankind. He repeated, that the people of England, and even 99 lawyers out of 100, were utterly ignorant of the principles on which real property was transferred. Why did he mention that fact? Because it was one of those out of which the Court of Chancery was fed—it was the doubt thrown upon the titles to land that filled its insatiate maw with so many dainty morsels—it led to the filing of those bills for specific performance (to use the slang of the Court of Chancery) which occasioned such delightful pickings for the Chancery lawyers. There was likewise another matter for inquiry, which he thought the house, when he stated it, would consider to be right marvellous, but of which he would merely say—

" 'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true."

If any gent. had any regard for the credit of the law, what would he think when he heard that if a man died worth only 20*l.* in land, which he disposed of by will, and a doubt arose as to his competency to make such a will, it was a matter of right to the heir to demand a trial of the testator's competency before a jury of the country; whereas if he died worth 100,000*l.* personal property, and a question arose as to his competency to make a will, it was impossible by any exertion of legal skill to get that question framed into an issue to be tried by the country (cries of no, no, from the ministerial benches)? If he were wrong in that opinion, he had no doubt but that his learned friend the Solicitor-General, would hereafter set him right, and point out the mode by which that issue was to be obtained; and if he (Mr. W.) had any knowledge in the trade of the law (and he did not pretend to much), the fact was decidedly such as he had stated it (hear, hear, from the ministerial benches). He did not exactly know what that cheer meant. Perhaps it meant to say that the commission was already over head and ears in consideration of the point he had suggested. He should be glad to hear that it was so: but he was afraid that that point, as well as some others which he had mentioned, were points of important and essential inquiry, going a little beyond the forms of procedure to which he believed that the labours of the commission were to be more particularly directed. There was another subject which was as worthy of investigation as any of those to which he had before referred; and that was, how soon it might be expedient to remove the jurisdiction of bankruptcy from the Court of Chancery, which had no immediate connexion with it. It would be expedient to enter at the same time upon a revision of all the proceedings in bankruptcy, especially of those which were decided before an appeal was made to the Chancellor. On this point he would beg leave to quote the opinion of a learned gent., who was not accustomed to speak with levity of what he (Mr. W.) called the antiquated errors of the law, but who in a pamphlet which he had recently published, had affirmed that, if all the imaginations in the world had been set at work to devise mischief, it would have been next to impossible for them to have constituted a court more calculated for the end proposed than the bankrupt courts as they existed at present. He submitted that this statement was true to the letter; and his reason for calling the attention of the house to it now was, that when he had first mentioned the subject to the house, it was attempted to drive him from it by unremitting assertions that in the Court of Chancery and every department connected with it all was right; that there was no delay in its proceedings, no complaints against its forms, no extraordinary expenses created by its jurisdiction—in short, that there was nothing in it, either done or said, which was not consistent with the welfare of the people of England. Now that he had an admission from the other side, that every thing was not as it ought to be in the Court of Chancery, he would venture, but with all due deference to the members of the commission now sitting, to suggest, if it were not too late, and they did not think their inquiry to be limited to the mere form of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery—he would venture to suggest to them the propriety of making these necessary and fundamental changes in that court. They might be made with perfect safety, because, if what he alleged against the court were correct, he defied any man, by any alteration, to make it worse (hear, hear). He should now proceed to bring forward the particulars of some cases which had recently been placed in his hand. For the correctness of these cases he did not feel himself responsible, but merely laid them on the table, in the discharge of his duty as a member of parliament. Not that he thought them open to doubt or controversy; but that he did not like to pledge himself to that, of which he had no personal knowledge. One of the petitions he had to present was entitled to the most respectful consideration, as it came from a gent. of high honour and character. This was the petition of Samuel Palmer, one of the churchwardens of the parish of Newington. The petition stated that in the year 1653 there was granted by the then lord of the manor of Walworth to the overseers and churchwardens of the parish of Newington, a piece of land of which the rents and profits were to be applied to the use of the parish. In the month of August 1820, the trustees of the charity filed a petition in the Court of Chancery, stating that the annual income of the property, which had formerly been small, was now increased to 600*l.* a-year, and praying that it might be referred to the Master to determine in what manner it should hereafter be applied. That petition was heard on the 4th of November 1820, before the Vice-Chancellor. He referred it to the Master. In two years and four months afterwards the master made his report; and by that report he took away the jurisdiction over the rents, and profits from the overseers, and gave it to the trustees. Against that report the petitioners presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor on the 15th of August 1823, and on the 12th of April the trustees presented another petition, praying that the report should stand confirmed. In August 1823, the Master, whom the Chancellor had ordered to review his report, restored the jurisdiction to the overseers. In October a petition was presented by the overseers to the Lord Chancellor, to have that report confirmed. A petition opposing this, was presented by the trustees in November. In August a supplemental bill had been filed by the trustees, so that in November 1823, there were three petitions before the Lord Chancellor respecting this charity, all waiting for his adjudication. And here he begged leave to state, that between that latter period and the present—for the matter unfortunately was still pending—two questions had arisen before the Lord Chancellor, which he had no doubt that his learned friend would tell them required some deliberation, and which, for any thing he knew to the contrary, might really deserve it. The first was, how far the present lords of the manor of Walworth—namely the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, had a right as visitors to interfere with the charity. This question he ought to state, was suggested on affidavit by the solicitor for the trustees, on his own suggestion, and not at their instance or request. The second question was, how far the overseers of the poor for the parish of Newington, who were now appointed under a local act, were overseers as contemplated by the statute of Elizabeth. The great and eminent lawyers of the Court of Chancery might say that the consideration of these points was wise and necessary; but to the understanding of the petitioner it appeared quite the reverse. He could not understand why forty attendances, when these petitions were in the paper, but when they were not even touched, amounting to 56*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, without reckoning the fees of counsel to sustain them, were wise and necessary; he could not understand why 16 attendances at times when the matter was not heard but only mentioned, amounting to 30*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, making with the ex-penes above enumerated, 861 odd, were wise and necessary. He could not quite understand why it was wise and necessary that five years should pass away during which the whole or at least part of the charity was suspended. In that time, out of 40 individuals who benefited by this charity, nine had died, and none had been elected to fill their places. In that time 1001. had been accumulated to the funds of the charity; and the petitioner could not see how it was in theory just, or in practice useful, that this accumulation should be withheld from those for whose benefit it was intended. Indeed, the petitioner could not comprehend the wisdom and necessity of many of the charges in this bill of costs, of which, with their permission, he would read a few items to the house. (Here the learned gentlemen read the following extracts from the bill of costs, which excited great laughter in the house):—

Although there had been all these attendances on the part of the solicitor, and all these promises on the part of the Lord Chancellor, the matter had not yet been brought to a decision (hear). The next petition which he had to present was that of Mr. Walter Honeywood Yate, who described himself as an individual entitled to estates in the counties of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, which, however, it was in vain for him to attempt to recover, as he had not the pecuniary means which a man ought to possess before he embarked in the dangerous voyage through the shoals of Chancery. To give the house an idea of the enormous expenses to which it was believed that proceedings in that court necessarily gave rise, he stated that a late respected member of that house, Mr. Ricardo, had left by his will the sum of 50,000*l.* as a nest-egg to provide funds for the defraying of any expenses to which his heirs might be put in the Court of Chancery, in defence of their title to the estates in question, thereby giving his opinion of what he conceived likely to be the result of being drawn by any unfortunate circumstance into that most dreadful and most vexatious of English courts. He would read the last paragraph but one in this petition to the house, because he considered it as worthy of its most deliberate attention. It was as follows:—“Your petitioner humbly submits that the means of addressing that court should be afforded to all subjects of the realm with equal facility, and that in affording such means, the House of Commons will be conferring a great benefit on the subject, which will be more sensibly felt by all classes than the reduction of any impost, or the repeal of any tax.” The next petition which he had to present, was a petition from a person of the name of Gower, who, he believed, was connected with the family of the Marquis of Stafford. The petitioner stated, that he had been left by the late Duke of Queensberry an annuity of 300*l.* a year; and declared that there was a provision in his grace's will requiring the trustees to invest, immediately after his death, as much stock in the 3 per cent. consolidated annuities as would secure to the petitioner such an annuity. Shortly after the Duke's decease, his property was thrown into Chancery by the executors of his will—a measure of which the petitioner did not complain, though he did of the delays of the Court of Chancery. This was in 1810. For seven years, though there were avowedly large funds in the court belonging to the estate, the petitioner did not receive one farthing of his annuity (cries of no, from the ministerial benches). He believed the fact to be so—at any rate, such was the assertion of the petitioner. At the end of those seven years the petitioner received one-fourth part of the arrears due to him. Three years had since elapsed, but the petitioner had received nothing more; so that there were now arrears to the amount of 1,386*l.* due to him, though the funds belonging to the estate were ample and almost inexhaustible. The petitioner calculated the loss he had suffered by the non-payment of these arrears at simple interest at 1100*l.*, and at compound interest at 1400*l.* He further calculated, that if the money, as it had accumulated, had been purchased into the funds, it would at this time have made a difference to him of 2,800*l.* To compensate him for this damage, he had the satisfaction of being told that every thing was done according to the ordinary rules of equity (hear). That might be very fine satisfaction for the hon. gentls. opposite, but it was very cold comfort to this petitioner. He therefore thought his case worthy of the notice of the house, and recommended it to their consideration, with this piece of information—that many assaults under the Duke of Queensberry's will had been compelled to hide their heads in workhouses, in consequence of the non-payment of their annuities, for which there were funds enough in the Court of Chancery, had they not been locked up by the proceedings instituted in it. The next petition which he had to present came from an individual who had applied to him with almost as much importunity as he had used towards the rt. hon. gent. opposite—he meant Mr. Gourlay. The petitioner stated that he had presented two petitions before, to which the house had paid little attention. He dated the origin of his ruin from the day in which he was forced to enter into the Court of Chancery. He detailed some of the struggles in which he had been engaged in it, stated that he had recently been victorious in two issues, but added, that his victories, like those of Pyrrhus, had almost been as fatal to him as defeats. He declared that the benefit of them had been nothing, and that retreat from the contest appeared to him now to be the only good he could obtain. He prayed the house to assist him in that object. He said he had a manual of his own case in readiness, and that he wished the house would afford him aid to print it. The next petition which he had to present was from an individual of the name of Joseph Bancroft, who was now confined in the Fleet-prison, under an attachment from the Court of Chancery. This individual stated himself to be more than 71 years of age, and that he had been committed for not answering certain interrogatories. He had now been in confinement two years and five months. The petition stated, that before his committal, he was living at a village near Lincoln; that he was utterly ignorant of the nature of law proceedings; and that he had trusted every thing relating to this suit to his friend Brown, and to the solicitor whom he had employed. It then proceeded to say, that certain interrogatories were filed; that an answer to them was not put in in time; and that the consequence was that he had been committed, not to the county gaol at Lincoln, but to the Fleet-prison in London, by a special messenger, at an expense of no less than 50*l.* Until those costs were paid, the contempt of the petitioner could not be cleared, and he himself could not be heard in court. For more than a year and a half, immediately subsequent to his committal to the Fleet, he was entirely bereft of his intellects; that in that interval his friend Brown died, and that he must have died too from want, had it not been from the kindness of the Warden of the Fleet prison, and the humanity of one of his fellow-prisoners. The petitioner further stated, that he had no means whereby to defray the expenses which had been incurred in the execution of the attachment against him, though he had now put in his answer to the interrogatories. He remained in the Fleet prison at this moment, and there, he said, he must remain till the end of his life, if the house did not exercise its humane and necessary interference in his behalf. He asserted that many individuals in that prison were similarly situated, and that the course of the Court of Chancery was, not to inquire why no answer had been put in, but to proceed to imprison the offender, no matter whether his offence proceeded from ignorance and inadvertency, or from deliberate obstinacy. The only remaining case which he had to state was that of Tambridge school; The case was

Known in the profession as "The Attorney-General v. the Skinners' Company;" and the object of it was to recover an estate for the school, worth from 4,000l. to 5,000l. a year. In the year 1820, the case was heard before his Honour, the Vice-Chancellor, and was promptly decided. There was an appeal, as there always would be where there was money to support it, from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor to that of the Lord Chancellor; and that appeal, after standing for just one year and eight months before his lordship, at last came on for hearing. It was heard, and the Lord Chancellor confirmed the decision of the court below, on the correctness of which he understood it was impossible to harbour a single doubt. In 1821, on another petition, the decision was the same way. The case then went into the Master's office, and there it remained two years. Death then took off the Master, and the case then went to another, who succeeded him. He had exerted himself no doubt to the utmost; but in spite of all his exertions, the matter was in Chancery still. It was now in the seventh year of its age, and how much older it might grow was a point he would not pretend to determine. The income in dispute he had before told them was between 4,000l. and 5,000l. a-year; and all parties had agreed that it should be applied in increasing the amount of exhibitions belonging to the school. One generation of boys had been defrauded of, or if that were too strong a word, had lost the benefit of these exhibitions; and another generation of boys was likely to have the same loss to submit to, for the Court of Chancery unfortunately laid fast hold of all the funds in dispute. Let the Vice-Chancellor decide promptly—nay, let the Lord Chancellor do the same; let there be doubt upon the question or no doubt, if property were involved, the Court of Chancery fixed its fangs into it; if there were money, it fattened upon it; if there were life, it fed upon it (hear). The evil was not of modern creation; it existed 150 years ago, as Butler bore testimony in Hudibras. For the knight, after he had tried every means to win the widow, direct and indirect,—and direct means were always the best to be pursued in such cases—after he had assailed her with all the artillery of sighs and glances,—after he had attempted to draw her into an epistolary correspondence, and had tried, but in vain, many other amatory proceedings, received the advice of his squire to write her "a love-letter in Chancery," which, he stated,

"Would bring her o'er to be his wife,
Or make her weary of her life" (a laugh).

He would undertake to say that the widow would have consented to take in the knight, the squire, "the camp, the pioneers, and all," rather than take in that bill of Chancery, which was as great a nuisance 150 years ago as it was at present (a laugh). Relief was to be obtained through the House of Commons, and through no other quarter (hear). Of the commission now sitting he would say nothing; into Chancery it had been cast and thrown, and he anticipated that at no distant time, the house would receive a suppliant petition from the members of it, praying to be delivered from the irrelievable court into which they had been cast by the manoeuvre of the rt. hon. secretary. He expected no good from the sitting of that commission; in that house, and in that house alone, could the recovery of the Court of Chancery be effected from the diseases which beset it. A committee of that house or nobody must be the surgeon to accomplish the cure. It was in vain to tell him of lawyers reforming themselves (hear)—of courts of justice sitting upon their own abuses, and flogging themselves out of their jurisdictions and their fees as Sancho Panza flogged himself out of his vices and peccadillos (hear). Whatever might be thought or said within the walls of parliament, the people of England knew full well that from such proceedings no amelioration of the system could be rationally expected. It was therefore incumbent on the house—for the time was now come—to take some decisive step. The rt. hon. secretary opposite, had got rid of 400 statutes at one blow in his attempt to amend the system of juries. He trusted he would follow up the blow and give effective support to reformation in other quarters. There was one splendid act which bore the date of the reign of James I., and which required that that house should annually resolve itself into a committee for the consideration of matters of justice. The forms of this committee still remained; no great general benefit had accrued of late times from its application. Some specific and crying grievance, it was true, had occupied attention—some partial ameliorations had been attempted—some patch of purple, or black had been applied—"Purpureus late qui splendet unus et alter—Assuitur pannus"—but no great leading reformation had been effected. The subject had never been considered as a whole—never looked upon with an enlarged and comprehensive eye, and therefore the microscopic glances which were occasionally taken at it, had only served to render confusion worse confounded, to bring the general system from bad to worse, and make it what it was—a disgrace to the country (hear, hear). What else but a disgrace was it, to be behind a neighbouring country, in so valuable an institution as that of law, and in such essential requisites as the expedition and cheapness of its administration? And yet this was the condition of England at this time as compared with France. When he deplored on the part of his own country this imperfect condition of her laws, he did not venture upon any thing so foolish as to propose any remedy; but whether the reformation were practicable or not, it was due to the people of England that the attempt should be made (hear, hear). The enlightened feelings of the nation were at variance with the existing system of the Court of Chancery: it put men to the blush, and stopped the channel of justice. At Athens, officers of knowledge and reputation were annually appointed, whose sole business it was to consider what reformation the alteration of circumstances and times required: they were bound to consider what had grown useless, what had grown foolish in the Athenian code, to report upon it, and to move for its repeal. Where had this country so excellent and useful a mode of revision, to chasten the prurency which the lapse of time had occasioned in its laws? They had, indeed, in its full operation, the machinery of legislation, which added largely to the already encumbering bulk of their code, giving enough to its dimensions, but nothing to its utility (hear, hear). It had been a long established maxim, that every thing which was worthy of being attended to was difficult to be obtained; but they had instances enough in other countries of sim-

his attempts being made with success in reforming old and bad institutions. The King of Bavaria had introduced an improved penal code into his dominions. They need not look, indeed, beyond the neighbouring country of France, to see the beneficial results which attended a revision of the old law: there indeed it was effected by a usurper, a man of great and singular qualities, and of great and singular fortunes—a soldier, but one, who while engaged, it could not be said absorbed, in these military achievements, had left behind him a code of law, which would eternize his fame, and form a monument to his greatness that would last, and be remembered with gratitude, when the history of his wars and the vices of his military ambition would have long passed away (hear, hear). What a great neighbouring country had so well done, might surely be tried in this. A professional gentleman had lately published a book upon the crying grievance of this Court of Chancery, in which, after quoting the Chancellor D'Aguesseau's opinion of what ought to be the constitution of a court of equity, he adverted to what that court had practically become in this country, and said, "Lord Eldon had not thought fit to follow these directions throughout the length of his reign, and had, unfortunately for the people, and for his own reputation, taken a different course." (The learned gentleman then continued to refer to Mr. Miller's book, from which he extracted, among others, the following passage concerning the Lord Chancellor:) "Perhaps he thought that the surest way to keep his place was to refrain from innovation, and this was the course he has invariably pursued since he held the office: that he will continue to do so, is not to be doubted, when we consider how difficult it is to change the habits of a man of 75 years of age. But this is a reason why an ancient person ought not to be continued in such an office. It is probable he has no conception of the sense generally entertained of his judicial career. It is one of the misfortunes of his life, that he has made mediocrity and submissiveness the pass-ports to his favour (hear, hear). He is a grievous hindrance to the improvement of the law as a science: he has always ridiculed and resisted all fair improvements; nevertheless they are advancing; and if he remain, he will at length find himself carried away by the current" (hear). Had not these opinions been thus publicly promulgated by this author, he (Mr. W.) should not himself have proclaimed them; but when he found them thus submitted to public consideration, and that, too, at the moment he was calling public attention to the Court of Chancery, he felt himself warranted in quoting them (hear). Before he sat down, he begged to make this appeal to the character and to the sense of public duty of the House of Commons. They knew the enlightened state of public opinion, and that the country looked to them for a redress of grievances; he called upon them not to act upon the opinions of lawyers, who were under the influence of narrow professional views; but in a manner conformable to the march of public intelligence, and the glorious progress of arts and sciences: these were the signs to which they must attend, an indifference to which would convey severe censure upon those who permitted any longer the existence of a system which was as much at variance with the intelligence and information, as it was with the happiness and justice of the country (cheers).

Mr. John Smith, without intending to cast the slightest reflection upon the Lord Chancellor as an individual, wished to state his opinion of the grievances which the people of this country, especially those engaged in commerce, laboured under, from the operation of the existing administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. The system was looked upon with terror by men of business: it was not an uncommon practice for a dishonest debtor to threaten to file a bill, which would terrify the creditor into suffering the greatest impositions (hear, hear). He could state a fact in illustration of this, which had happened in his own affairs. He had lent a sum of 4500*l.* to an individual, on the bond of a most respectable surety. The bond fell due 18 months after this loan, and when application was made to the surety for payment, the answer was, "True, I signed this bond, but I do not now owe the obligor so much; I have since had other transactions in money matters with him, and now only owe him 4000*l.* instead of 4500*l.*, and that is all which I shall pay." Thinking this answer very extraordinary, he (Mr. Smith) took the bond to his solicitor, and stated the circumstances; when he was informed, as he had expected, that the subsequent pecuniary affairs between the surety and obligor, had nothing to do with the original obligation of the bond as affecting the obligee who had advanced the money; and his solicitor offered to serve the surety with a notice of action for the recovery of the debt, but he added, "Just as your claim is, this man can apply to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain you from proceeding at law; and though he must ultimately be defeated with costs, still my costs, that will ultimately fall upon you in the progress of this litigation, will probably amount to more than the 500*l.* at issue" (hear). Startled at this prospect, he accepted the 4,000*l.* and put an end to the matter (hear). In another case, he had acted as one of the assignees of a bankrupt; a defendant had converted a matter of business into a suit in Chancery; and that suit had lasted for 23 years (hear, hear). When he named the period of its duration, he meant not to cast any blame in the particular instance upon the Lord Chancellor, for he believed no judge would have been competent to have settled so voluminous a mass of accounts. Ashamed of this delay, and happening to meet his hon. friend Mr. Baring, who was a creditor upon the estate, they consulted what had better be done to relieve the parties from their existing difficulties. His hon. friend then sat down to unravel the accounts, and in three hours put into order that which the Court of Chancery had failed to do in 23 years (hear, hear), and assisted in terminating the litigation. He suspected that there was something inherently wrong in the whole form and nature of the Court of Chancery. The system, he was persuaded, was in itself erroneous (hear, hear). Let any man who had ever read a bill in Chancery—the bill in the case to which he had alluded was as bulky as the table before him (alluding to the large table on the floor of the house)—let any man who had ever read such a bill, say whether he could understand its import? It abounded in words, but they were words without corresponding ideas—the whole bill was constructed in a language used two centuries ago. Ought

this form to be continued? But, independently of its incompatibility with common sense and justice, he objected to the system, on account of the enormous power which it vested in the hands of the lawyers. In a facetious periodical work, called "The Covent-garden Journal," published by Fielding, he said, "It is erroneous and foolish to think that the English government is only composed of three estates, meaning those of the King, the Lords, and Commons; there is a fourth estate—the mob" (a laugh). It was true, as the writer had put it, that the mob had considerable power at the time when he wrote; but a great change had since taken place; the mob were dispossessed of their power, and supplanted by a different class. He (Mr. S.) would, in defining the government, describe it to have four estates—the King, Lords, Commons, and the Lawyers (hear, and a laugh). The lawyers were legislators—they made new laws, and their dicks had the force of enactments. When his learned friend (Mr. Williams) had touched upon the reformation of the French law—when he had alluded to the genius of Bonaparte, whose code of law he had truly said would serve the memory of his conquests and his crimes, he had omitted to praise it for one of its most essentially useful qualities. That law, if not so purely administered as the British, was at least more readily afforded to the suitor, and twenty times cheaper (hear). This forced upon their attention the comparative demerits of their own system, and it was a case in which every individual in the land owed it to his country to state what he felt and knew upon the subject (hear, hear). When he said thus much, he repeated that he meant not to disparage the Lord Chancellor. He knew that learned lord laboured harder in his office than any other judge: he believed he devoted much more of his time to business, and much less to pleasure, than any other man; but he equally believed that his whole system was bad, and required entire revision (hear, hear); a revision, too, which he did not expect from the commission which had the business in hand, for he knew that the members of it were unable to do what was essentially necessary for a beneficial change, namely, to turn the system itself upside down: to that they must come, before they could accomplish the reformation which was called for (hear, hear).

Mr. Ellice had been long aware of the grievances attending the system of business in the Court of Chancery; and bad as those cases were which had just been brought to light by his learned friend (Mr. Williams), he believed they were trivial in comparison of those which could be brought forward by many individuals connected with the trade and industry of the country. He was also convinced, that no good could arise from the labours of the commission appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Court of Chancery: besides having persons of legal knowledge, it ought to have had the assistance of men of business. Why did not the Court of Chancery, in matters of accounts, adopt the practice of the Civil Court? There such matters were referred to the registrar, assisted by mercantile men (hear), who sat continuously until they made their report. If an improvement could be made in the administration of the affairs of the Court of Chancery, it ought to be made quickly and efficiently; and he begged to direct their attention to one point of practice which he knew to be attended with very injurious consequences—he alluded to the investing money in Chancery: it was a hopeless task to manage the money of others when it became once deposited there. He had represented the grievance of such a case some time ago to one or two of his Majesty's ministers, and the monstrous inconvenience and loss which it imposed upon the guardians of minors. He could more particularly speak of one case, in which he was himself, for his own security, obliged to lodge the money of children, the eldest of whom was only eleven years of age, in the Accountant-General's office. There was the evil—the party lodging money in the Court of Chancery, had no option; it must be invested in the three per cent. stock, at 94 or 95—so that it was not impossible, before the eldest child became of age, the stock would fall to 50 (hear). Above 30 or 35 millions of property were sunk in that disadvantageous manner—an amount nearly equalling the whole floating debt of the country. Why not allow the minors the benefit of investing the money so as to obtain a sort of exchequer-bill interest? In a case in which he was personally concerned, it had been required of him to make an affidavit for the satisfaction of the court. His affidavit was deemed inadmissible, and his succeeding attempts were equally abortive. His solicitor then tried, and after him, his counsel; but their efforts were equally unavailing. The point was of little importance, but after the court had refused to admit five successive affidavits, it at last accepted and was satisfied with that which was first made. The property in dispute was about 1,500*l.*, and the expenses of litigation amounted to between 300*l.* and 400*l.* A good deal had been said of the Lord Chancellor, but he thought it not right to throw the odium of this branch of the judicial system upon the individual Judge. Let the rt. hon. gent. opposite (Mr. Peel) follow up what he had already done, in reforming abuses in the administration of justice (hear, hear). The blame ought not to be cast upon a single individual, who, if he had the disposition, had not the power to remedy them (hear).

The Solicitor-General said, that before he noticed the observations of his learned friend (Mr. Williams), respecting the constitution of the Court of Chancery, he would advert a little to the five petitions upon which he had chiefly founded his speech. His learned friend had, properly enough, abstained from vouching for the accuracy of the statements in those petitions; and, indeed, it would have disparaged his understanding, had he done otherwise. Mr. Palmer's petition came first in order, and related to some alleged abuse in what was called "the Elephant and Castle charity." In the Elephant and Castle charity, the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury had formerly possessed the property, and they still held the right of visitation; being, in fact, according to the settlement at the Reformation, entitled to a reversion of the property. Their claim, however, could not so easily be brought into consideration, because the affairs of the Dean and Chapter must undergo discussion in the Diocesan Court in the first instance. The consequence was, that the cause was only ripe for judgment in January last. But this was not all. The convenience of counsel, as in every other court, was consulted in this; and many of the delays of hearing must be set to the account of their accommodation, which was equally called for by the courtesy of the judge and the interest of the suitors generally. It was not very surprising that, under these complicated accidents and causes of delay, 50l. should have been laid out in the expenses of the hearing. The next petition was that of Mr. Honeywood Yate, who by his absurd and preposterous suggestions, would have the House to believe, that the late enlightened Mr. Ricardo had left 50,000l. upon some contingency of litigation; but if it were so, that circumstance would furnish no reason for inferring that the expense of a Chancery suit would be 50,000l. The fact was, that at the time that Mr. Ricardo made the purchase of his Gloucestershire estate, the title was disputed by this Mr. H. Yate, and it was to defend the estate from that particular claim that Mr. Ricardo set apart the 50,000l. But if there were any justice in the claim, Mr. Yate might sue in forma pauperis. The third petition from Mr. Gower was more preposterous than the others. He was an annuitant upon the estate of the Duke of Queensberry along with other creditors, whose united claims amounted to 400,000l. The Duke of Buccleuch obtained judgments in the Scotch courts against the estate for 100,000l., the amount of fines improperly levied. In the common course of proceeding the creditors could have had no claim to a settlement until the final decision of the appeals in that which was well known by the name of the Queensberry cause. An accidental rise in the funded portion of the property took place, and the Lord Chancellor finding that he had it in his power to do something for the creditors, and yet leave enough to answer the suit of the Duke of Buccleuch, and make compensation to the tenants, went out of his way to do them this service, and ordered a dividend of one half to be paid them. The next petition was from Mr. Gourlay, who was a tradesman. Mr. Kestrotte had refused to put in an answer to a bill, and for that contempt of Court had incurred the expense of an attachment. He probably would wish to have a Court of Chancery that could not imprison delinquents. Such were the petitions which his learned friend had thought proper to present. Mr. Gourlay had no objection to a Court of Chancery which would decide quickly, however erroneously. Mr. Gower wanted a Court of Chancery which would pay him his debt out of other money than that which belonged to his debtor. Mr. H. Yate wanted a Court of Chancery which would allow him to defer his claim to an estate till twenty years after the decease of the purchaser. Mr. Palmer wanted a Court of Chancery which would allow him to proceed on to judgment upon any petition however crude, irregular, or informal. The learned gent. had intimated something of the plan of his attack on the Court of Chancery, whenever his day should come, by the assertions which he had made of a usurpation effected by this court over the powers of the other jurisdictions. This was at variance with the fact, as might be proved from the circumstance, that from the time of the dispute between Lords Coke and Bacon respecting the remanding of a cause into Chancery, after verdict in the Court of King's Bench, no question of jurisdiction had arisen down to this time. The Court of Chancery had from time of human memory, exercised the same jurisdiction which it possessed now. The learned gent. must have forgotten his historical reading, when he said that no such jurisdiction had ever been known in any civilized country. In the constitution of republican Rome at the brightest period of her history, the Pretorian Court held a controlling and corrective power over the judgments of common law. The Court of Session in Scotland acted as a Court of Equity in those cases of unperformed contracts, which could not be brought within the proper cognizance of the common law, just as Chancery enforced specific performances and execution of contracts. In fact, the distinction of law and equity had always prevailed in civilized states. He contended that this was not the proper time to take the evils of the jurisdiction, whatever they might be, under their consideration, while they were without any information from the commissioners who were appointed to inquire into it.

Dr. Eusington, with a view to justify the delay in the report of the commissioners, said they were almost all men engaged in the duties of judicial situations, or the practice of their various courts. Few were the days which any of them had free from avocations, and fewer those upon which they could collect a full meeting. The Vice Chancellor, upon whom they had entirely depended, had been withheld from co-operation by long and severe illness. Another highly intelligent person had declined acting. He was himself most anxious for the fulfilment of the duty which had been imposed upon him, though he feared that the undertaking was beyond his powers. He was anxious, too, that the House should not be led to expect more from the commission than the persons delegated were able to effect. Those powers were very limited. Their inquiry into the practice did not allow them to consider the law of that court. It only went to a review of the forms of proceeding from the first commencement to the final issue. The other branch of their inquiry was only directed to ascertain whether some of the functions of this jurisdiction might not safely be separated from it, and given to the other courts. Had the commission directed an inquiry into the whole system of Chancery, he must have hesitated much before undertaking a task so greatly above his ability. He did not mean to say that it was actually impossible, or that it was not desirable to reform the system; but this commission could not effect it. He could have no doubt that much beneficial alteration might be effected in many branches of the law of England. It was not possible, for example, at present for the Court of Chancery to order a trial by jury to determine whether a settlement of personal property by will was made by a person of sound mind, though it had the power of doing it with questions of real property. It would be desirable to pass an act to give the Court of Chancery that power with which it was not now invested by law. He had had very considerable experience in the affairs of wills, and, though it would be seriously against his own interests, he must say, that such a regulation would benefit the country at large, and lighten the business of the courts. Very considerable abuses were manifest in the law which regulated the transfer of real property. He could not allow that there was any rational ground for a system, which required, in making out the abstract of a title, eight hundred brief sheets, prepared, as he knew the fact to be, by one of the most honest solicitors in London. This gentleman had found it impossible, with safety to his client, to compress the abstract of a title to an estate in less than eight hundred sheets. He wondered that the country gentlemen had not given their attention to this subject. If they considered what an enormous tax it levied, in the course of years, upon their property—the expense of stamps alone which it brought with it—and the dangerous intricacies which rendered their possessions wholly insecure, they would not remain satisfied. He knew of no reason sufficient to justify its continuance. A system of laws contrived, when the personal property of the kingdom was not one-five-hundredth of the real property, and when all property passed by rude conveyance, almost from hand to hand, could never be suitable to a period when commercial wealth and its transactions so infinitely transcended the value of all the real property in the kingdom. How, then, were they to proceed in this matter? He had always thought that a commission, such as was here called for, ought to consist of persons selected from a variety of the professions and classes of society, so that it should possess a combination of the talent and learning of the lawyer, the enlarged and enlightened views of the statesman, and of all the practical knowledge and acquirements of the merchant (hear). Such a combination as this should be concentrated, and brought to bear as much as possible on the great object of framing such a system of laws as might enable the subjects of Great Britain to obtain—what at present they could not obtain—justice cheaply and expeditiously (cheers). It was not his intention on this occasion to enter into any examination of what had passed heretofore in any of our courts of justice; much less did he mean to go into any examination of the faults of those who had presided in those courts. His object as a lawyer and a member of parliament was to find out where the evil existed, and to attempt to discover and apply a remedy for it, rather than to fix the blame on particular individuals (hear).

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, it was now long since he had first attempted to prove that the defects in the system of the Court of Chancery, and the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, amounted to a denial, and indeed a complete subversion of justice. The reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the nature of those evils stated, that so rapidly were causes accumulating at that time in the jurisdiction in question, that it was judged they could not be disposed of in less than 25 years. This was stated in both Houses of Parliament, and was not contradicted in the House of Lords. The public had been seriously aggrieved by the proceedings in the Court of Chancery; and this he would say, notwithstanding that he had the honour of being personally acquainted with the Lord Chancellor, and believed him to be one of the most upright and honourable minded men in the country (hear). With regard to the appellate jurisdiction, he (Mr. T.) had proposed some years ago to provide assistance in the House of Lords, either by an additional number of Lords for the determination of appeals, or by the appointment of an additional judge in that jurisdiction. After a twelve years' hard struggle, Lord Gifford had been at last appointed to preside with the Lord Chancellor at the hearing of appeals (hear, hear). The effect of this arrangement had been, that the lords had reduced the number of appeals in an astonishing degree, and were proceeding with them in a manner that reflected upon them the highest credit (hear, hear). Why should not some beneficial arrangement of a similar nature be adopted in the equity jurisdiction? He was not the individual who moved the question in respect of these delays in Chancery; but had he been present on that occasion, he would not have consented to such a commission as was then named. For who was nominated at the head of it (hear, hear)? The very individual whose conduct was complained of as tending to encourage those delays (hear). The fact was, that as it existed at present, this chancery jurisdiction was perfectly detested throughout the country (hear); and in an age like this, such cumbersome forms of proceeding could not much longer be endured. By and by there would be that acceleration effected in the business of chancery, that he would scarcely despair of seeing a steam practice introduced (laughter). He knew an amicable suit which had been before the court 33 years (hear, hear). It was admitted by the best and most experienced practitioners, that under some circumstances, to recover a property of 3000*l.* out of Chancery, would not cost less than 1500*l.* (hear, hear). What was such monstrous injustice as this owing to? To the immoderate amount of fees accruing and accumulating upon such long delays (hear.) He could scarcely imagine why it was that the Solicitor-General should quarrel so much with that case of Mr. Palmer, which had been mentioned before that evening. Mr. Palmer's case had been depending or hanging up three whole years.

The Solicitor-General begged pardon; two years only.

Mr. M. A. Taylor—Only two years (a laugh). Then on the learned gent.'s own admission, it was another case to prove the hardships that were produced by this fatally constituted court. The Fleet and other prisons of the metropolis, which he (Mr. T.) had visited, contained numerous victims, without clothes, and almost in a state of despondency, who would not have been in those melancholy abodes, and in so wretched a condition, but for the injuries which they had suffered through the Court of Chancery (hear). Perhaps the house was already aware of that affecting case of the two widow ladies, who were interested in a property, which an attorney managed to hang up in Chancery. Pending the proceedings one of the ladies died at the age of 81, nine years after she became invested with the right to a beneficial interest in that property. Her sister, too, survived her only by about half a year (hear, hear). With respect to the inefficiency of the commission he alluded to, and the causes assigned for the long delay of its report, he would only say, that if some of the members were incapacitated from attending it by reason of professional or other engagements, they ought never to have been placed upon it. Without some vigorous struggle on the part of the house, no good would be done in the business (hear).

Mr. Peel would not have said a word upon the question but for the direct allusions which had been made to him. The learned gent. had insinuated that he (Mr. P.) wished to impede or defeat the objects of an inquiry into the delays of Chancery. He denied any such imputation (hear); he wished for a full and open inquiry into the whole practice of the Court of Chancery. He denied that any inference to the contrary could be drawn from the manner in which the commission of last session had been constituted. Government had good reason to adopt that sort of constitution, from the success with which the Commission of Inquiry into the Judicature of Scotland had been attended (hear, hear). It was but the preceding evening that he had heard that commission very highly enlarged in that house, and yet it was composed entirely of lawyers—the very men whom the learned gent. thought to be the most unfit to be admitted upon committees of that kind, but who were in such commission associated with judges, as the best qualified to report on the condition of their own judicature. He had a much higher opinion of the conscientiousness and integrity of lawyers than the learned gent. opposite, who ought to know them so much better, seemed to give them credit for (a laugh). An hon. gent. had argued that a Mastery in Chancery was disabled from conducting any inquiry into matters of accounts because he was not an accountant. It was very odd, on the same evening, to hear it contended by the learned member that a man was disabled from inquiring into questions of legal proceedings because he was a lawyer (hear, hear). What possible object could he (Mr. P.) be supposed to have, if not a full and candid examination of this subject? He owned that he had hoped ere this, that the report of the commissioners would have been made (hear). He thought, too, it would have been much better had they determined to report in the first place on some specific branch of their inquiries, instead of waiting to prepare their general report upon the whole of the topics embraced by the commissioners, because it was evident that any such general report on the Court of Chancery, must of necessity be postponed for a considerable time. When he considered that these commissioners had already sat 70 days (hear); had examined 45 witnesses; and had rejected no witness who came forward voluntarily to tender his evidence or to furnish information; when he reflected that they had their own avocations also to attend to, and knew that it was their intention to publish the whole of the evidence taken before them, and not merely their general report upon it; what object could he have in view but a full and perfect examination? But what were the names which he found in this commission? There was the noble and learned lord at the head of his Majesty's law officers: could any thing like a toleration of unfairness or disingenuousness be dreaded from him? If the guarantee of his noble friend's integrity and character were insufficient to ensure the public confidence in this commission, would it not be confirmed even by the names of others who were his colleagues? Was there not the learned member for Ilchester (Dr. Lushington), whose speech of that evening had so well attested the manly independence of a mind that would not suffer any thing like evasion, or a want of faith, in any such inquiry as that which was the object of the commission (hear). The terms of the reference had been complained of as too much limitting the powers of the commission. But they were as comprehensive as those of the learned gent., "Inquiry into the delays and expenses of the Court of Chancery, and the causes thereof." The object of the commission of last session was thus stated, "Inquiry into the forms and process of a suit, from its first institution to its close." These terms surely opened every detail connected with the system of Chancery proceedings and the Chancery Court (hear). The reference then proceeded—"and whether any part of the present jurisdiction of the court can be removed" (hear). With respect to what had been said about the present defective state of the law as to the transfer of landed property, had he (Mr. P.) referred any such extensive subject to that commission to report on, besides its more immediate inquiries, would he not have rendered himself liable to the charge of purposely doing so, with the view of withdrawing and diverting the commission's attention from the great objects of its labours? If, indeed, that law could be altered, let it be altered; for it was due to the increasing wealth, and to the commerce, and to the property of the country, that a law regulating the transfer of real property should be left in no state of uncertainty or defectiveness. So much in answer to the objections touching the constitution of the commission. But when the learned gent. quoted Hudibras, to show that 150 years ago the same delays were charged against the Court of Chancery as now, it should appear that 13 months was no unreasonable period for the preparation of a report upon the nature and effect of those delays.

Mr. Hume referred to a passage in Mr. Miller's book on the abuses of Chancery. That author stated that it was in vain to hope for any reform or improvement in the system, so long as the power and patronage of a vast number of offices, such as the six clerks, master, curators, &c. remained in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who thus disposed of numerous posts, some of them mere sinecures, the united salaries of which amounted to not less than between £200,000. and 300,000. a-year (hear). The learned lord had appointed a near relation of his own to no less than six situations.

Mr. Brougham did not expect any satisfaction, from the partial report of the commission appointed to inquire into the state of chancery practice, of which report the learned gentleman (the Solicitor-General) had, he believed, given the exact description it would deserve, when he said he expected that it would be very unsatisfactory to all parties (hear). The powers of countenance possessed by the learned gentleman were very great, as were those of every gentleman who practised in Chancery; but he was quite convinced that the learned gentleman would find it impossible to retain the gravity of his features, if he declared that he expected the Chancery Commission to effect much benefit (hear). It was wrested from government by the force of public opinion, and by the expression of it which had been heard within those walls; but the objects which those who called for it had in view were entirely frustrated. The learned gentleman, in speaking of the Catholic relief bill, had said with regard to one of its provisions—that which was intended to control the correspondence of the Catholic clergy with the see of Rome,—“Was ever any thing so absurd! a popish beard to examine the despatches of the Pope! This is just as absurd, as if a charge having been advanced against the Chancellor of the Exchequer,"—by the way, it is strange that the learned gentleman should have stumbled on a Chancellor (a laugh).—"he were to request that a commission should be appointed, under the great seal, or under the seal of the Exchequer more properly, to look into his proceedings; that commission to consist of the secretary for the Home Department, the secretary for the Foreign Department, and so forth, those individuals being his colleagues in office. What would be thought of the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he acted thus?" Undoubtedly, such a proceeding would be very absurd, and very unsatisfactory; it would be a monstrous proposition—a great mockery. But certainly not so monstrous a proceeding, not so gross a mockery, as if they put the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself at the head of the commission (hear, hear). And yet the commission he was now speaking of was exactly of that sort (hear). That commission was appointed to inquire into the practice of the Court of Chancery, and the abuses thereof, and whether those abuses were owing to the system itself or to the conduct of John, Lord Eldon, the individual at the head of the court. And who was to decide? Who was called on to control these abuses, and to carry into effect the wishes of the legislature? Why, John, Lord Eldon. Most truly, no man knew better than he where the fault lay, if he wished to speak; but when he and the commission, of which he was the head, remained silent an entire year, to say that he entertained any hopes from their proceedings, would be to treat the House of Commons with a degree of levity at variance with the gravity they deserved (cheers). He (Mr. B.) expected nothing—absolutely nothing—he had got all he expected; he could not have got less (a laugh). Something has been said of the Scotch Commission; but that was widely different from this; for there were men coming from another country, free from local prejudices—men, too, under the control of a most superior man; above all, a man like Lord Eldon (hear); for although he (Mr. B.) conceived him to be a very bad man to correct the abuses in his own court, yet, if he wanted a persevering investigator into the faults of others—a rigid inquisitor (loud cheers)—he would do the talents of the learned lord the justice to say, that he did not know a person more eminently qualified for the office both as a subtle lawyer and an acute man (loud cheers). If he were a judge in any other court but his own (there he might shelter him (Mr. B.) with his protection,) but were he a judge in any other court in England, Ireland, or Scotland, he couldn't name the man by whom he should less like to be scrutinized (hear, hear). No man living would be less disposed to spare the faults of others, or more firmly determined to deal out even-handed justice towards the lapses of other institutions, but he was not the man to reform the abuses of his own court (cheers). In the olden time, there was a certain Pope at Rome, who requested the cardinals to judge him for certain offences, which he confessed he had committed: delays of justice (a laugh). The cardinals exclaimed they judge him, because he was the head of the court, but added, Judica leprum: in his mind, he exclaimed, "Ju- dica me crumet." The sentence was executed; for history informs us, that "Judicatus fuit, crumatus fuit, et sanctus fuit" (much laughter). Now, he, (Mr. B.) much doubted, whether the learned lord would not have certain conscientious scruples against following the example of a Pope of Rome (a laugh). Nothing but the hope of a subsequent sanctification, could prevail upon him to adopt the precedent; and even with this flattering prospect before his eyes, his interest in the estate for life being superior to his love of country, and the purification of his own soul, might not induce him to sacrifice the possession (much cheering and laughter).

Mr. J. Williams in reply referred to Blackstone, to prove that the ancient law-writers did not allow that extent to the Court of Chancery which was now contended for. He objected strongly to the two jurisdictions possessed by the Court of Chancery; and concluded by observing, that if he had thought proper, he could have brought forward much stronger cases than even those which he had laid before the house that evening.

The petitions were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.—Sir Francis Boddart moved "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to cause the evidence taken before the commissioners appointed to inquire into the Court of Chancery to be laid before the house."

Mr. Peel believed it was without precedent that a committee should be thus called on to report the evidence taken before it, without the opinion or determination at which it had arrived on that testimony. Unless the hon. bart. could lay some much stronger ground for his motion than he (Mr. P.) was yet aware of, he could not accede. It seemed to him, moreover, that no kind of public good could be derived, under present circumstances, from the production of this evidence; and he should even object to a more modified proposition—for instance, to the production of any separate portion of the evidence that might be expected to have been taken before this committee. Supposing that this evidence could be printed in the course of the present session of Parliament, within a fortnight or three weeks, could any public measure, even in that case, be founded upon it (hear)? The commission had already sat seventy days, and had examined five-and-forty witnesses; and it was to be presumed they were unprepared for the hon. bart.'s motion; so that a considerable time must necessarily elapse before the whole of the evidence which they had taken could be copied out and prepared. Even after it should have been printed, it might readily be imagined that members would require some time properly to digest and consider it; for without time, how could they be prepared to form an opinion on such important matters? He could not help thinking that it would have a very prejudicial effect to publish this evidence without the statement of such measures as the commissioners might feel it expedient to recommend upon the result of their investigations. He considered this inquiry as an extremely valuable and important one; and he utterly disclaimed all imputation of opposing the motion of the hon. bart. with any view to conceal the evidence which might have been taken before the committee. He seriously, and upon his honour, assured the hon. bart., that he earnestly hoped some efficient remedy might be provided for the evils which he believed to be occasioned by the present condition of the Court of Chancery (hear, hear). Without meaning, in any degree, to impute blame to any body connected with that court, he certainly could not hear these serious complaints of the dreadful delays of Chancery, without believing as an honest man, that these delays must be effectually remedied and provided against in future (hear, hear). He trusted that ere long the house would be in possession, not only of a careful, but of an ample report on the subject; and though he certainly could have wished that the commissioners would have rather reported, from time to time, on separate points of their inquiry, than have waited to produce a general report upon the entire objects of their commission; yet it would, in his opinion, be highly unadvisable now to interpose, when the completion of their labours might be so speedily anticipated. He had very recently had communication with an individual who, as being at the head of the jurisdiction in question, might be supposed by many to feel, in some degree, personally interested in this matter; but who, in reality, as he (Mr. Peel) conscientiously believed, felt no concern of that kind—he meant the Lord Chancellor (hear); and from what that noble lord, and, indeed, other members of the commission, had told him, he did unquestionably believe that a full report, including the evidence, might be printed before the next meeting of parliament. Now, if the fact were so, and if there could be no time in this session to allow of any measure, founded on the right hon. baronet's motion of that evening, to be produced to the house, he thought he must have satisfied the hon. bart. himself that it could not be proper for the house to accede to that motion. On these grounds, the house would perceive, that if the motion of the hon. bart. were carried, it would amount to a virtual superseding of the committee. He (Mr. Peel) had not the slightest objection, in the meantime, to produce the commission under which the commissioners were appointed and empowered to act, in order that the house might see what were the terms of it, and who they were that had been selected to discharge its duties (hear);—but he was compelled to resist the premature publication of the evidence.

Sir F. Burdett, notwithstanding the arguments which the rt. hon. gent. had just advanced, could not help thinking that so long a time having elapsed since the appointment of this commission, it was highly important the house should have before it, forthwith, the evidence which the commissioners had obtained. As to the commission itself, he meant not to impute any blame to it on account of the delay which had already taken place: but the individuals composing it were persons whose professional and other avocations could scarcely have left them sufficient time to perform the duties of commissioners with sufficient diligence, compatibly with the duties imposed upon them by their private pursuits. For this reason he complained of the constitution of such a commission (hear, hear). When he saw at the head of it the Lord Chancellor himself, he must say that the principal who presided over the very system out of which the delays arose, was not exactly the party who should be placed over a commission intended to remedy that which the learned lord might perhaps not consider an evil (hear). But the powers of those commissioners were extremely limited, and by no means going to the root of that evil. They went to the investigation of the practices of subordinates in this court; but not of the construction and nature of the court itself (hear). Now, since the committee had been so long employed in collecting information, it was proper that the house should be made acquainted with their proceedings. The evils to be inquired into were so extensive, so universal, that there was hardly a family in the kingdom which had not been embarrassed by their baneful operation. It was not so essentially necessary for the house to be in possession of the opinion of any set of commissioners, as to find out, upon the evidence offered to them, some speedy relief for evils, which from day to day were going on, increasing in number and amount, and becoming more and more oppressive on the subject. The business of the Court of Chancery was from day to day increasing. But its proceedings were not regulated by the common law of the land: it was altogether a sort of stolen-lan jurisdiction, affecting to proceed on the principles of the civil law, but really acting on a system that was repugnant to the principles of common law, and, he might almost say, of common sense (hear). It was obvious, that one great remedy which might be applied to the evils occasioned by the present constitution of this court, would be to provide for its proceeding upon principles of the common law (hear). If, instead of all that immense mass of affidavit evidence—if, instead of the Lord Chancellor's directing voluminous written statements to be prepared, and circuitous proceedings by interrogatories, when, perhaps, the man might be sitting under the very nose of his lordship who could explain the transactions in question before him—if this practice were done away, and the rule of the common law and of common sense were resorted to, of taking the best, and not the worst, testimony that could be obtained—of preferring oral testimony where it could be gotten, to artfully fabricated depositions—then, indeed, something like permanent good would be effected (hear, hear). The Lord Chancellor, however industrious he might be, however desirous to obtain information, however conscientious, was bound to observe the proper means for enabling him to form correct and accurate judgments (hear). By the existing modes of dilatory proceeding, under which a person was not considered bound to attend until he had been summoned three times, and by all those means which enabled a party, on paying up his fees punctually, to go over so many seals—a dishonest man, who could afford such measures, had it in his power to impose upon others the necessity of following him through a course of almost heart-breaking litigation. If a whole year had been employed in collecting information only about the fees of Chancery, enough had been done to enable parliament to proceed on the evidence taken before this committee. If the other avocations of the Lord Chancellor did not give him time to attend to the business of the Court of Chancery—a fact which was roundly stated,—let us have judges enough to do the business properly; let us not be placed under the necessity of pursuing justice by such dilatory and expensive methods (hear, hear). With respect to bankruptcy cases, some new provision ought to be adopted. There was not a more fertile source of abuse than the manner in which commissions of bankruptcy were sued out and prosecuted. In this department, there were no less than seventy judges, who might or might not attend at their pleasure, and hence a most ruinous delay was frequently produced. Those seventy places were in the gift of the Lord Chancellor; and they were generally bestowed upon young barristers to begin with; for no one would say that those who filled them were selected on account of their abilities, or peculiar fitness for the situation (hear). If there were only seven, or only two courts, attended by persons who would give themselves up wholly to the business, that business would be better done, and justice would be more speedily administered, than it was at present by this multitude of assistants. Twelve months ago a commission had been appointed to inquire into and to report on the practice of the court of Chancery. No report had yet been made, and the rt. hon. gent. now declared that it would be detrimental to the public to produce the evidence taken before that commission. He could not, however, perceive that any mischief was likely to be produced by placing that evidence before the public. It appeared that in the courts of Equity, the expense of procuring justice was much greater than in any other quarter, and it certainly was proper that the house and the public should get possession of every circumstance which could by possibility guide them to a remedy for so serious an evil (hear, hear). The first thing which ought to be placed in their hands was not the report of the commission, which appeared to him to be of no importance, but the evidence taken before the commissioners. That evidence ought to be produced immediately. So far from delay being advisable, he was strongly impressed with the idea, that much mischief would be occasioned by withholding the information which he now moved for. He relied on the good sense of the house for supporting this motion to make the evidence public. The minds of men, generally, and more especially the minds of members of parliament, would be directed to the consideration of those remedies which the nature of the case called for (hear, hear).

Mr. Hurst expressed himself in favour of the motion. In a suit in which he was engaged, and which he eventually succeeded in gaining, he was obliged to pay 8l. 17s. 6d. for every 10l. he recovered (hear).

Mr. Peel said, if the hon. bart. renewed his motion very early in the next session, he certainly would not oppose it. He had no desire to perpetuate abuses of any kind. This he had shewn by his bill to repress frivolous writs of error.

Mr. Denman observed, that the bill for repressing frivolous writs of error was brought in on account of the notoriousness of the evil which it was meant to correct; and this was a sufficient reason for the production of the evidence now required. It might be true, that no such proceeding as that now adopted by his hon. friend (Sir F. Burdett) had ever before been resorted to in that house; but the question was, whether the circumstances of the present case did not fully justify it? An hon. member who had recently spoken, stated, that he had been charged nearly 8l. for the recovery of 10l.; and on the last night when this subject was before the house, two or three gentlemen had related to him cases of amuitants as to whose right to recover certain sums of money no doubt existed, but who were unable to procure that to which they were entitled, until several of them joined to defray the expenses of an amicable suit. Many of those persons might die before a decree could be obtained; but, at all events, such delay must be a disgrace to this enlightened country. In the city, if an individual had a claim upon a small quantity of stock, placed in the name of executors, although there might be no doubt as to the right, still the answer was, "We cannot pay it, until you have instituted a suit in equity" (hear, hear). In many of these cases the attorneys said, "Don't move in such a suit, for the costs will carry away all the money" (hear, hear). These were matters of notoriety—matters long before the public, and they called loudly for legislative interference (hear, hear). Certain he was that these evils, tremendous as they were, would never be rectified, unless the members of the House of Commons applied their minds to the subject—unless they took the matter into their own hands (hear). In the year 1823, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. J. Williams) turned his attention to this subject. The friends of the Lord Chancellor opposed, and the motion was lost. In the following year, it was defeated by the rt. hon. Secretary of State, who proposed that a commission should be appointed to carry into effect the object which his learned friend (Mr. J. Williams) had in view. Commissioners were appointed; but up to this period they had made no report; and, in his opinion, they were not likely to make one for some time. It appeared that they had sat for seventy days, and had examined forty-five persons. They must, in such a period, and from so great a number of persons, have elicited much information which it was desirable the house should be possessed of. But they were told that some difficulty existed with respect to getting it through the press in time. He, however, believed that the evidence might be printed in three or four days. It had already been lithographed, and any person might have it. In fact, it was public, and he should be very sorry if it were otherwise. But this sort of publicity was not like placing it formally before that house (hear). He would quote a short extract from the evidence given before that commission, by a barrister, which would show of what importance that evidence was. The barrister was asked, "Whether he had ever seen the misery of those who had been obliged to embark in Chancery suits, and whose hopes had been delayed and disappointed?" He answered "No; I see no such things. The solicitor passes between me and the client. I can only speak of the probability of misery being created by those delays. But this I know, that after long litigation, the order of the court has been often drawn up to divide the remnant of the property, not for the benefit of the litigating parties, but in part payment of the solicitor's bill" (hear, hear). Surely the house could not be aware of such monstrous cases, without feeling the necessity of applying, and speedily applying, some effectual remedy.

(hear). A distinction was attempted to be drawn on this occasion, founded on the circumstance of this inquiry being conducted by commissioners. Now, he could not see what distinction could fairly be drawn between commissioners appointed by the crown, and a committee nominated by that house. Yet, in the latter instance, the evidence given had been considered a fit subject for legislation, without waiting for any report. Thus it was with respect to the committee on the state of Ireland. Such, he believed, was also the case with reference to the committee on the combination laws. A great deal of the evidence given before them consisted of complaints made by the masters against the journeymen, and the committee, he understood, were unwilling to hear any evidence on behalf of the journeymen (no, no). He understood the committee were ready to propose a severe law, before they heard what the men could advance in support of their conduct (no, no). Such, certainly, was the report. If evidence had been given before the commission, with respect to subpcenas, or any other process of the court of Chancery, he thought it was quite competent for the house to legislate on that branch of the subject, without waiting for any report. When the report came, it would of course be subject to the revision of that house, and to the scrutiny of public opinion; but, in the meantime, the best way to become conversant by degrees with the great and diversified subject before them, was by the publication of the evidence now called for. There was, he knew, a great degree of tenderness manifested towards the individual who presided in the court of Chancery (hear, and laughter). This proved nothing more than the extent of his influence (hear). No man wished less than he did to give that learned lord offence, but he could not help alluding to him when he heard gentlemen argue this question on the ground that no personal fault could be found with the individual who was at the head of the court of Chancery. He did not mean to say that there was any personal fault; but there might be personal fault; and that was a matter which he thought ought to be well considered. One fact alone would show the manner in which the business of the court of Chancery was conducted. In the beginning of last Michaelmas Term, 45 causes were set down in the paper to be heard in the term, and on the last day of the term they still remained on the paper (hear). Not one of those causes was touched; and he begged the house to recollect that every one of the parties connected with each cause had to pay 11. for setting it down, exclusive of incidental expenses. If there were ten parties plaintiffs, and twenty parties defendants, each of them had to pay 20s. for the privilege of not being heard. A great deal of praise had been bestowed on the Lord Chancellor because he disposed of much business by way of motion. But great interests ought not to be so disposed of. If the case came afterwards to be formally adjudicated, the hearing of it by motion tended only to instil prejudices in the mind of the judge; and if it were disposed of at once, it passed by without that solemn consideration which all cases of moment ought to receive. He wished to show that the system was not altogether to blame, and if so, the person at the head of the court ought not to escape all censure. The Lord Chancellor had been for twenty-five years a constant witness of all the evils arising from the system, and it was a little surprising that he had made no attempt whatever to remedy those defects of which the public complained. On the contrary, he opposed with all his power every effort which had been made in the Commons House of Parliament to remove those evils. As to the other house, no attempt had been made there to lessen them in any degree (hear). The rt. hon. gent. said, that if the proposition were made next session, he would give it his sanction; but a motion of this kind, made next year, would be just as unprecedented as at present. Why, then, should he refuse his sanction now? A great degree of distrust had been created throughout the country, in consequence of the way in which the commission had been formed; and he feared that the rt. hon. gent.'s interview that day with the Lord Chancellor would have the effect of rendering that distrust still greater.

Mr. W. Courtenay said, the commissioners had to enter into a more extensive range of inquiry than gentlemen on the other side of the house seemed to imagine. When this subject was first brought before the house, he resisted the motion for the appointment of a Parliamentary committee to investigate the cause of the delays in the Court of Chancery and the House of Lords, which were so much complained of, because he thought such a committee would be incompetent to apply a remedy to those abuses. He therefore approved of the commission. Prior to this year, specific charges were brought against the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. Certain abuses were pointed out, which it was said, rendered it difficult to obtain justice in that court. But now a different course was pursued, and the whole system of the court was arraigned. The authority of the commission extended over an immense range of inquiry; it was appointed to consider "whether any, and what alterations could safely be made in the practice established in the Court of Chancery, or in the offices connected with that Court; or in the practices established in those offices, whether in respect to law or equity." It also extended its inquiry into general matters of equity—into bankrupt cases—into the different stages of proceeding in all matters from the beginning to the end of a suit—into the mode of hearing and deciding causes, together with the expense attending the various proceedings, and the time which they occupied. Now, he was not aware of any set of words in the English language, that could give to a set of commissioners a better opportunity for taking a most extensive view of this subject, through all its ramifications (hear). But the commission did not stop here. It went on to meet a point, which had been suggested frequently in that house, relative to the variety of business transacted in the Court of Chancery; and the commissioners were called on to inquire "whether any and what part of the business can be usefully withdrawn from the Court of Chancery, and transferred to some other court." Words more comprehensive than those could not, he thought, have been selected. Whether the bankruptcy cases could with propriety be withdrawn—a point long contended for—was thus made a part of the subject to be investigated by the committee. There was no part of this inquiry, extensive as it might be, that would not be fully, fairly, and substantially met. If the present commission were not entitled to the confidence of the house and country, to whom

Known in the profession as "The Attorney-General v. the Skinners' Company;" and the object of it was to recover an estate for the school, worth from 4,000l. to 5,000l. a year. In the year 1820, the case was heard before his Honour, the Vice-Chancellor, and was promptly decided. There was an appeal, as there always would be where there was money to support it, from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor to that of the Lord Chancellor; and that appeal, after standing for just one year and eight months before his lordship, at last came on for hearing. It was heard, and the Lord Chancellor confirmed the decision of the court below, on the correctness of which he understood it was impossible to harbour a single doubt. In 1821, on another petition, the decision was the same way. The case then went into the Master's office, and there it remained two years. Death then took off the Master, and the case then went to another, who succeeded him. He had exerted himself no doubt to the utmost; but in spite of all his exertions, the matter was in Chancery still. It was now in the seventh year of its age, and how much older it might grow was a point he would not pretend to determine. The income in dispute he had before told them was between 4,000l. and 5,000l. a-year; and all parties had agreed that it should be applied in increasing the amount of exhibitions belonging to the school. One generation of boys had been defrauded of, or if that were too strong a word, had lost the benefit of these exhibitions; and another generation of boys was likely to have the same loss to submit to, for the Court of Chancery unfortunately laid fast hold of all the funds in dispute. Let the Vice-Chancellor decide promptly—nay, let the Lord Chancellor do the same; let there be doubt upon the question or no doubt; if property were involved, the Court of Chancery fixed its fangs into it; if there were money, it fattened upon it; if there were life, it fed upon it (hear). The evil was not of modern creation; it existed 150 years ago, as Butler bore testimony in Hudibras. For the knight, after he had tried every means to win the widow, direct and indirect,—and direct means were always the best to be pursued in such cases—after he had assailed her with all the artillery of sighs and glances,—after he had attempted to draw her into an epistolary correspondence, and had tried, but in vain, many other amatory proceedings, received the advice of his squire to write her "a love-letter in Chancery," which, he stated,

"Would bring her o'er to be his wife,
Or make her weary of her life" (a laugh).

He would undertake to say that the widow would have consented to take in the knight, the squire, "the camp, the pioneers, and all," rather than take in that bill of Chancery, which was as great a nuisance 150 years ago as it was at present (a laugh). Relief was to be obtained through the House of Commons, and through no other quarter (hear). Of the commission now sitting he would say nothing; into Chancery it had been cast and thrown, and he anticipated that at no distant time, the house would receive a suppliant petition from the members of it, praying to be delivered from the irremovable court into which they had been cast by the manoeuvre of the rt. hon. secretary. He expected no good from the sitting of that commission; in that house, and in that house alone, could the recovery of the Court of Chancery be effected from the diseases which beset it. A committee of that house or nobody must be the surgeon to accomplish the cure. It was in vain to tell him of lawyers reforming themselves (hear)—of courts of justice sitting upon their own abuses, and flogging themselves out of their jurisdictions and their fees as Saicho Panza flogged himself out of his vices and peccadillos (hear). Whatever might be thought or said within the walls of parliament, the people of England knew full well that from such proceedings no amelioration of the system could be rationally expected. It was therefore incumbent on the house—for the time was now come—to take some decisive step. The rt. hon. secretary opposite, had got rid of 400 statutes at one blow in his attempt to amend the system of juries. He trusted he would follow up the blow and give effective support to reformation in other quarters. There was one splendid act which bore the date of the reign of James I., and which required that that house should annually resolve itself into a committee for the consideration of matters of justice. The forms of this committee still remained; no great general benefit had accrued of late times from its application. Some specific and crying grievance, it was true, had occupied attention—some partial ameliorations had been attempted—some patch of purple, or black had been applied—"Purpureus late qui splendet unus et alter—Assuitur pannus"—but no great leading reformation had been effected. The subject had never been considered as a whole—never looked upon with an enlarged and comprehensive eye, and therefore the microscopic glances which were occasionally taken at it, had only served to render confusion worse confounded, to bring the general system from bad to worse, and make it what it was—a disgrace to the country (hear, hear). What else but a disgrace was it, to be behind a neighbouring country, in so valuable an institution as that of law, and in such essential requisites as the expedition and cheapness of its administration? And yet this was the condition of England at this time as compared with France. When he deplored on the part of his own country this imperfect condition of her laws, he did not venture upon any thing so foolish as to propose any remedy; but whether the reformation were practicable or not, it was due to the people of England that the attempt should be made (hear, hear). The enlightened feelings of the nation were at variance with the existing system of the Court of Chancery: it put men to the blush, and stopped the channel of justice. At Athens, officers of knowledge and reputation were annually appointed, whose sole business it was to consider what reformation the alteration of circumstances and times required: they were bound to consider what had grown useless, what had grown foolish in the Athenian code, to report upon it, and to move for its repeal. Where had this country so excellent and useful a mode of revision, to chasten the prurency which the lapse of time had occasioned in its laws? They had, indeed, in its full operation, the machinery of legislation, which added largely to the already encumbering bulk of their code, giving enough to its dimensions, but nothing to its utility (hear, hear). It had been a long established maxim, that every thing which was worthy of being attended to was difficult to be obtained; but they had instances enough in other countries of simi-

his attempts being made with success in reforming old and bad institutions. The King of Bavaria had introduced an improved penal code into his dominions. They need not look, indeed, beyond the neighbouring country of France, to see the beneficial results which attended a revision of the old law: there indeed it was effected by a usurper, a man of great and singular qualities, and of great and singular fortunes—a soldier, but one, who while engaged, it could not be said absorbed, in these military achievements, had left behind him a code of law, which would eternize his fame, and form a monument to his greatness that would last, and be remembered with gratitude, when the history of his wars and the vices of his military ambition would have long passed away (hear, hear). What a great neighbouring country had so well done, might surely be tried in this. A professional gentleman had lately published a book upon the crying grievance of this Court of Chancery, in which, after quoting the Chancellor D'Aguesseau's opinion of what ought to be the constitution of a court of equity, he adverted to what that court had practically become in this country, and said, "Lord Eldon had not thought fit to follow these directions throughout the length of his reign, and had, unfortunately for the people, and for his own reputation, taken a different course." (The learned gentleman then continued to refer to Mr. Miller's book, from which he extracted, among others, the following passage concerning the Lord Chancellor:) "Perhaps he thought that the surest way to keep his place was to refrain from innovation, and this was the course he has invariably pursued since he held the office: that he will continue to do so, is not to be doubted, when we consider how difficult it is to change the habits of a man of 75 years of age. But this is a reason why an ancient person ought not to be continued in such an office. It is probable he has no conception of the sense generally entertained of his judicial career. It is one of the misfortunes of his life, that he has made mediocrity and submissiveness the passports to his favour (hear, hear). He is a grievous hindrance to the improvement of the law as a science: he has always ridiculed and resisted all fair improvements; nevertheless they are advancing; and if he remain, he will at length find himself carried away by the current" (hear). Had not these opinions been thus publicly promulgated by this author, he (Mr. W.) should not himself have proclaimed them; but when he found them thus submitted to public consideration, and that, too, at the moment he was calling public attention to the Court of Chancery, he felt himself warranted in quoting them (hear). Before he sat down, he begged to make this appeal to the character and to the sense of public duty of the House of Commons. They knew the enlightened state of public opinion, and that the country looked to them for a redress of grievances; he called upon them not to act upon the opinions of lawyers, who were under the influence of narrow professional views; but in a manner conformable to the march of public intelligence, and the glorious progress of arts and sciences: these were the signs to which they must attend, an indifference to which would convey severe censure upon those who permitted any longer the existence of a system which was as much at variance with the intelligence and information, as it was

with the happiness and justice of the country (cheers).

Mr. John Smith, without intending to cast the slightest reflection upon the Lord Chancellor as an individual, wished to state his opinion of the grievances which the people of this country, especially those engaged in commerce, laboured under, from the operation of the existing administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. The system was looked upon with terror by men of business: it was not an uncommon practice for a dishonest debtor to threaten to file a bill, which would terrify the creditor into suffering the greatest impositions (hear, hear). He could state a fact in illustration of this, which had happened in his own affairs. He had lent a sum of £500l. to an individual, on the bond of a most respectable surety. The bond fell due 18 months after this loan, and when application was made to the surety for payment, the answer was, "True, I signed this bond, but I do not now owe the obligor so much; I have since had other transactions in money matters with him, and now only owe him 4000l. instead of £500l, and that is all which I shall pay." Thinking this answer very extraordinary, he (Mr. Smith) took the bond to his solicitor, and stated the circumstances; when he was informed, as he had expected, that the subsequent pecuniary affairs between the surety and obligor, had nothing to do with the original obligation of the bond as affecting the obligee who had advanced the money; and his solicitor offered to serve the surety with a notice of action for the recovery of the debt, but he added, "Just as your claim is, this man can apply to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain you from proceeding at law; and though he must ultimately be defeated with costs, still my costs, that will ultimately fall upon you in the progress of this litigation, will probably amount to more than the 500l. at issue" (hear). Startled at this prospect, he accepted the 4,000l. and put an end to the matter (hear). In another case, he had acted as one of the assignees of a bankrupt; a defendant had converted a matter of business into a suit in Chancery; and that suit had lasted for 23 years (hear, hear). When he named the period of its duration, he meant not to cast any blame in the particular instance upon the Lord Chancellor, for he believed no judge would have been competent to have settled so voluminous a mass of accounts. Ashamed of this delay, and happening to meet his hon. friend Mr. Baring, who was a creditor upon the estate, they consulted what had better be done to relieve the parties from their existing difficulties. His hon. friend then sat down to unravel the accounts, and in three hours put into order that which the Court of Chancery had failed to do in 23 years (hear, hear), and assisted in terminating the litigation. He suspected that there was something inherently wrong in the whole form and nature of the Court of Chancery. The system, he was persuaded, was in itself erroneous (hear, hear). Let any man who had ever read a bill in Chancery—the bill in the case to which he had alluded was as bulky as the table before him (alluding to the large table on the floor of the house)—let any man who had ever read such a bill, say whether he could understand its import? It abounded in words, but they were words without corresponding ideas—the whole bill was constructed in a language used two centuries ago. Ought required, in making out the abstract of a title, eight hundred brief sheets, prepared, as he knew the fact to be, by one of the most honest solicitors in London. This gentleman had found it impossible, with safety to his client, to compress the abstract of a title to an estate in less than eight hundred sheets. He wondered that the country gentlemen had not given their attention to this subject. If they considered what an enormous tax it levied, in the course of years, upon their property—the expense of stamps alone which it brought with it—and the dangerous intricacies which rendered their possessions wholly insecure, they would not remain satisfied. He knew of no reasons sufficient to justify its continuance. A system of laws contrived, when the personal property of the kingdom was not one-five-hundredth of the real property, and when all property passed by rude conveyance, almost from hand to hand, could never be suitable to a period when commercial wealth and its transactions so infinitely transcended the value of all the real property in the kingdom. Now, then, were they to proceed in this matter? He had always thought that a commission, such as was here called for, ought to consist of persons selected from a variety of the professions and classes of society, so that it should possess a combination of the talent and learning of the lawyer, the enlarged and enlightened views of the statesman, and of all the practical knowledge and acquirements of the merchant (hear). Such a combination as this should be concentrated, and brought to bear as much as possible on the great object of framing such a system of laws as might enable the subjects of Great Britain to obtain—what at present they could not obtain—justice cheaply and expeditiously (cheers). It was not his intention on this occasion to enter into any examination of what had passed heretofore in any of our courts of justice; much less did he mean to go into any examination of the faults of those who had presided in those courts. His object as a lawyer and a member of parliament was to find out where the evil existed, and to attempt to discover and apply a remedy for it, rather than to fix the blame on particular individuals (hear).

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, it was now long since he had first attempted to prove that the defects in the system of the Court of Chancery, and the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, amounted to a denial, and indeed a complete subversion of justice. The reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the nature of those evils stated, that so rapidly were causes accumulating at that time in the jurisdiction in question, that it was judged they could not be disposed of in less than 25 years. This was stated in both Houses of Parliament, and was not contradicted in the House of Lords. The public had been seriously aggrieved by the proceedings in the Court of Chancery; and this he would say, notwithstanding that he had the honour of being personally acquainted with the Lord Chancellor, and believed him to be one of the most upright and honourable minded men in the country (hear). With regard to the appellate jurisdiction, he (Mr. T.) had proposed some years ago to provide assistance in the House of Lords, either by an additional number of Lords for the determination of appeals, or by the appointment of an additional judge in that jurisdiction. After a twelve years' hard struggle, Lord Gifford had been at last appointed to preside with the Lord Chancellor at the hearing of appeals (hear, hear). The effect of this arrangement had been, that the lords had reduced the number of appeals in an astonishing degree, and were proceeding with them in a manner that reflected upon them the highest credit (hear, hear). Why should not some beneficial arrangement of a similar nature be adopted in the equity jurisdiction? He was not the individual who moved the question in respect of these delays in Chancery; but had he been present on that occasion, he would not have consented to such a commission as was then named. For who was nominated at the head of it (hear, hear)? The very individual whose conduct was complained of as tending to encourage those delays (hear). The fact was, that as it existed at present, this chancery jurisdiction was perfectly detested throughout the country (hear); and in an age like this, such cumbrous forms of proceeding could not much longer be endured. Bye and bye there would be that acceleration effected in the business of chancery, that he would scarcely despair of seeing a steam practice introduced (laughter). He knew an amicable suit which had been before the court 33 years (hear, hear). It was admitted by the best and most experienced practitioners, that under some circumstances, to recover a property of 3000l. out of Chancery, would not cost less than 1500l. (hear, hear). What was such monstrous injustice as this owing to? To the immoderate amount of fees accruing and accumulating upon such long delays (hear.) He could scarcely imagine why it was that the Solicitor-General should quarrel so much with that case of Mr. Palmer, which had been mentioned before that evening. Mr. Palmer's case had been depending or hanging up three whole years.

The Solicitor-General begged pardon; two years only.

Mr. M. A. Taylor—Only two years (a laugh). Then on the learned gent.'s own admission, it was another case to prove the hardships that were produced by this fatally constituted court. The Fleet and other prisons of the metropolis, which he (Mr. T.) had visited, contained numerous victims, without clothes, and almost in a state of despondency, who would not have been in those melancholy abodes, and in so wretched a condition, but for the injuries which they had suffered through the Court of Chancery (hear). Perhaps the house was already aware of that affecting case of the two widow ladies, who were interested in a property, which an attorney managed to hang up in Chancery. Pending the proceedings one of the ladies died at the age of 81, nine years after she became invested with the right to a beneficial interest in that property. Her sister, too, survived her only by about half a year (hear, hear). With respect to the inefficiency of the commission he alluded to, and the causes assigned for the long delay of its report, he would only say, that if some of the members were incapacitated from attending it by reason of professional or other engagements, they ought never to have been placed upon it. Without some vigorous struggle on the part of the house, no good would be done in the business (hear).

Mr. Peel would not have said a word upon the question but for the direct allusions which had been made to him. The learned gent. had insinuated that he (Mr. P.) wished to impede or defeat the objects of an inquiry into the delays of Chancery. He denied any such imputation (hear); he wished for a full and open inquiry into the whole practice of the Court of Chancery. He denied that any inference to the contrary could be drawn from the manner in which the commission of last session had been constituted. Government had good reason to adopt that sort of constitution, from the success with which the Commission of Inquiry into the Judicature of Scotland had been attended (hear, hear). It was but the preceding evening that he had heard that commission very highly eulogized in that house, and yet it was composed entirely of lawyers—the very men whom the learned gent. thought to be the most unfit to be admitted upon committees of that kind, but who were in such commission associated with judges, as the best qualified to report on the condition of their own judicature. He had a much higher opinion of the conscientiousness and integrity of lawyers than the learned gent. opposite, who ought to know them so much better, seemed to give them credit for (a laugh). An hon. gent. had argued that a Mastership in Chancery was disabled from conducting any inquiry into matters of accounts because he was not an accountant. It was very odd, on the same evening, to hear it contended by the learned member that a man was disabled from inquiring into questions of legal proceedings because he was a lawyer (hear, hear). What possible object could he (Mr. P.) be supposed to have, if not a full and candid examination of this subject? He owned that he had hoped ere this, that the report of the commissioners would have been made (hear). He thought, too, it would have been much better had they determined to report in the first place on some specific branch of their inquiries, instead of waiting to prepare their general report upon the whole of the topics embraced by the commissioners, because it was evident that any such general report on the Court of Chancery, must of necessity be postponed for a considerable time. When he considered that these commissioners had already sat 70 days (hear); had examined 45 witnesses; and had rejected no witness who came forward voluntarily to tender his evidence or to furnish information; when he reflected that they had their own avocations also to attend to, and knew that it was their intention to publish the whole of the evidence taken before them, and not merely their general report upon it; what object could he have in view but a full and perfect examination? But what were the names which he found in this commission? There was the noble and learned lord at the head of his Majesty's law officers: could any thing like a toleration of unfairness or disingenuousness be dreaded from him? If the guarantee of his noble friend's integrity and character were insufficient to ensure the public confidence in this commission, would it not be confirmed even by the names of others who were his colleagues? Was there not the learned member for Litchester (Dr. Lushington), whose speech of that evening had so well attested the manly independence of a mind that would not suffer any thing like evasion, or a want of faith, in any such inquiry as that which was the object of the commission (hear). The terms of the reference had been complained of as too much limitting the powers of the commission. But they were as comprehensive as those of the learned gent., "Inquiry into the delays and expenses of the Court of Chancery, and the causes thereof." The object of the commission of last session was thus stated, "Inquiry into the forms and process of a suit, from its first institution to its close." These terms surely opened every detail connected with the system of Chancery proceedings and the Chancery Court (hear). The reference then proceeded—"and whether any part of the present jurisdiction of the court can be removed" (hear). With respect to what had been said about the present defective state of the law as to the transfer of landed property, had he (Mr. P.) referred any such extensive subject to that commission to report on, besides its more immediate inquiries, would he not have rendered himself liable to the charge of purposely doing so, with the view of withdrawing and diverting the commission's attention from the great objects of its labours? If, indeed, that law could be altered, let it be altered; for it was due to the increasing wealth, and to the commerce, and to the property of the country, that a law regulating the transfer of real property should be left in no state of uncertainty or defectiveness. So much in answer to the objections touching the constitution of the commission. But when the learned gent. quoted Hudibras, to show that 150 years ago the same delays were charged against the Court of Chancery as now, it should appear that 13 months was no unreasonable period for the preparation of a report upon the nature and effect of those delays.

Mr. Hume referred to a passage in Mr. Miller's book on the abuses of Chancery. That author stated that it was in vain to hope for any reform or improvement in the system, so long as the power and patronage of a vast number of offices, such as the six clerks, master, curators, &c. remained in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who thus disposed of numerous posts, some of them mere sinecures, the united salaries of which amounted to not less than between £200,000. and 300,000. a-year (hear). The learned lord had appointed a near relation of his own to no less than six situations.

Mr. Brougham did not expect any satisfaction, from the partial report of the commission appointed to inquire into the state of chancery practice, of which report the learned gentleman (the Solicitor-General) had, he believed, given the exact description it would deserve, when he said he expected that it would be very unsatisfactory to all parties (hear). The powers of countenance possessed by the learned gentleman were very great, as were those of every gentleman who practised in Chancery; but he was quite convinced that the learned gentleman would find it impossible to retain the gravity of his features, if he declared that he expected the Chancery Commission to effect much benefit (hear). It was wrested from government by the force of public opinion, and by the expression of it which had been heard within those walls; but the objects which those who called for it had in view were entirely frustrated. The learned gentleman, in speaking of the Catholic relief bill, had said with regard to one of its provisions—that which was intended to control the correspondence of the Catholic clergy with the see of Rome,—
 "Was ever any thing so absurd! a popish

peases above enumerated, 861 odd, were wise and necessary. He could not quite understand why it was wise and necessary that five years should pass away during which the whole or at least part of the charity was suspended. In that time, out of 40 individuals who benefited by this charity, nine had died, and none had been elected to fill their places. In that time 1001. had been accumulated to the funds of the charity; and the petitioner could not see how it was in theory just, or in practice useful, that this accumulation should be withheld from those for whose benefit it was intended. Indeed, the petitioner could not comprehend the wisdom and necessity of many of the charges in this bill of costs, of which, with their permission, he would read a few items to the house. Although there had been all these attendances on the part of the solicitor, and all these promises on the part of the Lord Chancellor, the matter had not yet been brought to a decision (hear). The next petition which he had to present was that of Mr. Walter Honeywood Yate, who described himself as an individual entitled to estates in the counties of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, which, however, it was in vain for him to attempt to recover, as he had not the pecuniary means which a man ought to possess before he embarked in the dangerous voyage through the shoals of Chancery. To give the house an idea of the enormous expenses to which it was believed that proceedings in that court necessarily gave rise, he stated that a late respected member of that house, Mr. Ricardo, had left by his will the sum of 50,000*l.* as a nest-egg to provide funds for the defraying of any expenses to which his heirs might be put in the Court of Chancery, in defence of their title to the estates in question, thereby giving his opinion of what he conceived likely to be the result of being drawn by any unfortunate circumstance into that most dreadful and most vexatious of English courts. He would read the last paragraph but one in this petition to the house, because he considered it as worthy of its most deliberate attention. It was as follows:—“Your petitioner humbly submits that the means of addressing that court should be afforded to all subjects of the realm with equal facility, and that in affording such means, the House of Commons will be conferring a great benefit on the subject, which will be more sensibly felt by all classes than the reduction of any impost, or the repeal of any tax.” The next petition which he had to present, was a petition from a person of the name of Gower, who, he believed, was connected with the family of the Marquis of Stafford. The petitioner stated, that he had been left by the late Duke of Queensberry an annuity of 800*l.* a year; and declared that there was a provision in his grace's will requiring the trustees to invest, immediately after his death, as much stock in the 3 per cent. consolidated annuities as would secure in the petitioner such an annuity. Shortly after the Duke's decease, his property was thrown into Chancery by the executors of his will—a measure of which the petitioner did not complain, though he did of the delays of the Court of Chancery. This was in 1810. For seven years, though there were avowedly large funds in the court belonging to the estate, the petitioner did not receive one farthing of his annuity (cries of no, from the ministerial benches). He believed the fact to be so—at any rate, such was the assertion of the petitioner. At the end of those seven years the petitioner received one-fourth part of the arrears due to him. Three years had since elapsed, but the petitioner had received nothing more; so that there were now arrears to the amount of 1,366*l.* due to him, though the funds belonging to the estate were ample and almost inexhaustible. The petitioner calculated the loss he had suffered by the non-payment of these arrears at simple interest at 100*l.*, and at compound interest at 1400*l.* He further calculated, that if the money, as it had accumulated, had been purchased into the funds, it would at this time have made a difference to him of 2,800*l.* To compensate him for this damage, he had the satisfaction of being told that every thing was done according to the ordinary rules of equity (hear). That might be very fine satisfaction for the hon. gentls. opposite, but it was very cold comfort to this petitioner. He therefore thought his case worthy of the notice of the house, and recommended it to their consideration, with this piece of information—that many assaults under the Duke of Queensberry's will had been compelled to hide their heads in workhouses, in consequence of the non-payment of their annuities, for which there were funds enough in the Court of Chancery, had they not been locked up by the proceedings instituted in it. The next petition which he had to present came from an individual who had applied to him with almost as much importunity as he had used towards the ri. hon. gent. opposite—he meant Mr. Gourlay. The petitioner stated that he had presented two petitions before, to which the house had paid little attention. He dated the origin of his ruin from the day in which he was forced to enter into the Court of Chancery. He detailed some of the struggles in which he had been engaged. In it, stated that he had recently been victorious in two issues, but added, that his victories, like those of Pyrrhus, had almost been as fatal to him as defeats. He declared that the benefit of them had been nothing, and that retreat from the contest appeared to him now to be the only good he could obtain. He prayed the house to assist him in that object. He said he had a manuscript of his own case in readiness, and that he wished the house would afford him aid to print it. The next petition which he had to present was from an individual of the name of Joseph Eastcote, who was now confined in the Fleet-prison, under an attachment from the Court of Chancery. This individual stated himself to be more than 71 years of age, and that he had been committed for not answering certain interrogatories. He had now been in confinement two years and five months. The petition stated, that before his commitment, he was living at a village near Lincoln; that he was utterly ignorant of the nature of law proceedings; and that he had trusted every thing relating to this suit to his friend Brown, and to the solicitor whom he had employed. It then proceeded to say, that certain interrogatories were filed; that an answer to them was not put in in time; and that the consequence was that he had been committed, not to the county gaol at Lincoln, but to the Fleet-prison in London, by a special messenger, at an expense of no less than 50*l.* Until those costs were paid, the contempt of the petitioner could not be cleared, and he himself could not be heard in court. For more than a year and a half, immediately subsequent to his commitment to the Fleet, he was entirely bereft of his intellects; that in that interval his friend Brown died, and that he must have died too from want, had it not been from the kindness of the Warden of the Fleet prison, and the humanity of one of his fellow-prisoners. The petitioner further stated, that he had no means whereby to defray the expenses which had been incurred in the execution of the attachment against him, though he had now put in his answer to the interrogatories. He remained in the Fleet prison at this moment, and there, he said, he must remain till the end of his life, if the house did not exercise its humane and necessary interference in his behalf. He asserted that many individuals in that prison were similarly situated, and that the course of the Court of Chancery was, not to inquire why no answer had been put in, but to proceed to imprison the offender, no matter whether his offence proceeded from ignorance and inadvertency, or from deliberate obstinacy. The only remaining case which he had to state was that of Tushbridge school; The case was

The only remaining case which he had to state was that of Tushbridge school: The case was

Known in the profession as "The Attorney-General v. the Skinners' Company;" and the object of it was to recover an estate for the school, worth from 4,000l. to 5,000l. a year. In the year 1820, the case was heard before his Honour, the Vice-Chancellor, and was promptly decided. There was an appeal, as there always would be where there was money to support it, from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor to that of the Lord Chancellor; and that appeal, after standing for just one year and eight months before his lordship, at last came on for hearing. It was heard, and the Lord Chancellor confirmed the decision of the court below, on the correctness of which he understood it was impossible to harbour a single doubt. In 1821, on another petition, the decision was the same way. The case then went into the Master's office, and there it remained two years. Death then took off the Master, and the case then went to another, who succeeded him. He had exerted himself no doubt to the utmost; but in spite of all his exertions, the matter was in Chancery still. It was now in the seventh year of its age, and how much older it might grow was a point he would not pretend to determine. The income in dispute he had before told them was between 4,000l. and 5,000l. a-year; and all parties had agreed that it should be applied in increasing the amount of exhibitions belonging to the school. One generation of boys had been defrauded of, or if that were too strong a word, had lost the benefit of these exhibitions; and another generation of boys was likely to have the same loss to submit to, for the Court of Chancery unfortunately laid fast hold of all the funds in dispute. Let the Vice-Chancellor decide promptly—nay, let the Lord Chancellor do the same; let there be doubt upon the question or no doubt, if property were involved, the Court of Chancery fixed its fangs into it; if there were money, it fattened upon it; if there were life, it fed upon it (hear). The evil was not of modern creation; it existed 150 years ago, as Butler bore testimony in Hudibras. For the knight, after he had tried every means to win the widow, direct and indirect,—and direct means were always the best to be pursued in such cases—after he had assailed her with all the artillery of sighs and glances,—after he had attempted to draw her into an epistolary correspondence, and had tried, but in vain, many other amatory proceedings, received the advice of his squire to write her "a love-letter in Chancery," which, he stated,

"Would bring her o'er to be his wife,
Or make her weary of her life" (a laugh).

He would undertake to say that the widow would have consented to take in the knight, the squire, "the camp, the pioneers, and all," rather than take in that bill of Chancery, which was as great a nuisance 150 years ago as it was at present (a laugh). Relief was to be obtained through the House of Commons, and through no other quarter (hear). Of the commission now sitting he would say nothing; into Chancery it had been cast and thrown, and he anticipated that at no distant time, the house would receive a suppliant petition from the members of it, praying to be delivered from the irrelievable court into which they had been cast by the manoeuvre of the rt. hon. secretary. He expected no good from the sitting of that commission; in that house, and in that house alone, could the recovery of the Court of Chancery be effected from the diseases which beset it. A committee of that house or nobody must be the surgeon to accomplish the cure. It was in vain to tell him of lawyers reforming themselves (hear)—of courts of justice sitting upon their own abuses, and flogging themselves out of their jurisdictions and their fees as Sancho Panza flogged himself out of his vices and peccadillos (hear). Whatever might be thought or said within the walls of parliament, the people of England knew full well that from such proceedings no amelioration of the system could be rationally expected. It was therefore incumbent on the house—for the time was now come—to take some decisive step. The rt. hon. secretary opposite, had got rid of 400 statutes at one blow in his attempt to amend the system of juries. He trusted he would follow up the blow and give effective support to reformation in other quarters. There was one splendid act which bore the date of the reign of James I., and which required that that house should annually resolve itself into a committee for the consideration of matters of justice. The forms of this committee still remained; no great general benefit had accrued of late times from its application. Some specific and crying grievance, it was true, had occupied attention—some partial ameliorations had been attempted—some patch of purple, or black had been applied—"Purpureus late qui splendet unguis et alter—Assuitur pannus"— but no great leading reformation had been effected. The subject had never been considered as a whole—never looked upon with an enlarged and comprehensive eye, and therefore the microscopic glances which were occasionally taken at it, had only served to render confusion worse confounded, to bring the general system from bad to worse, and make it what it was—a disgrace to the country (hear, hear). What else but a disgrace was it, to be behind a neighbouring country, in so valuable an institution as that of law, and in such essential requisites as the expedition and cheapness of its administration? And yet this was the condition of England at this time as compared with France. When he deplored on the part of his own country this imperfect condition of her laws, he did not venture upon any thing so foolish as to propose any remedy; but whether the reformations were practicable or not, it was due to the people of England that the attempt should be made (hear, hear). The enlightened feelings of the nation were at variance with the existing system of the Court of Chancery: it put men to the blush, and stopped the channel of justice. At Athens, officers of knowledge and reputation were annually appointed, whose sole business it was to consider what reformation the alteration of circumstances and times required: they were bound to consider what had grown useless, what had grown foolish in the Athenian code, to report upon it, and to move for its repeal. Where had this country so excellent and useful a mode of revision, to chasten the pruriency which the lapse of time had occasioned in its laws? They had, indeed, in its full operation, the machinery of legislation, which added largely to the already encumbering bulk of their code, giving enough to its dimensions, but nothing to its utility (hear, hear). It had been a long established maxim, that every thing which was worthy of being attended to was difficult to be obtained; but they had instances enough in other countries of almost

his attempts being made with success in reforming old and bad institutions. The King of Bavaria had introduced an improved penal code into his dominions. They need not look, indeed, beyond the neighbouring country of France, to see the beneficial results which attended a revision of the old law: there indeed it was effected by a usurper, a man of great and singular qualities, and of great and singular fortunes—a soldier, but one, who while engaged, it could not be said absorbed, in these military achievements, had left behind him a code of law, which would eternize his fame, and form a monument to his greatness that would last, and be remembered with gratitude, when the history of his wars and the vicissitudes of his military ambition would have long passed away (hear, hear). What a great neighbouring country had so well done, might surely be tried in this. A professional gentleman had lately published a book upon the crying grievance of this Court of Chancery, in which, after quoting the Chancellor D'Aguesseau's opinion of what ought to be the constitution of a court of equity, he adverted to what that court had practically become in this country, and said, "Lord Eldon had not thought fit to follow these directions throughout the length of his reign, and had, unfortunately for the people, and for his own reputation, taken a different course." (The learned gentleman then continued to refer to Mr. Miller's book, from which he extracted, among others, the following passage concerning the Lord Chancellor:) "Perhaps he thought that the surest way to keep his place was to refrain from innovation, and this was the course he has invariably pursued since he held the office: that he will continue to do so, is not to be doubted, when we consider how difficult it is to change the habits of a man of 75 years of age. But this is a reason why an ancient person ought not to be continued in such an office. It is probable he has no conception of the sense generally entertained of his judicial career. It is one of the misfortunes of his life, that he has made mediocrity and submissiveness the passports to his favour (hear, hear). He is a grievous hindrance to the improvement of the law as a science: he has always ridiculed and resisted all fair improvements; nevertheless they are advancing; and if he remain, he will at length find himself carried away by the current" (hear). Had not these opinions been thus publicly promulgated by this author, he (Mr. W.) should not himself have proclaimed them; but when he found them thus submitted to public consideration, and that, too, at the moment he was calling public attention to the Court of Chancery, he felt himself warranted in quoting them (hear). Before he sat down, he begged to make this appeal to the character and to the sense of public duty of the House of Commons. They knew the enlightened state of public opinion, and that the country looked to them for a redress of grievances; he called upon them not to act upon the opinions of lawyers, who were under the influence of narrow professional views; but in a manner conformable to the march of public intelligence, and the glorious progress of arts and sciences: these were the signs to which they must attend, an indifference to which would convey severe censure upon those who permitted any longer the existence of a system which was as much at variance with the intelligence and information, as it was

with the happiness and justice of the country (cheers).

Mr. John Smith, without intending to cast the slightest reflection upon the Lord Chancellor as an individual, wished to state his opinion of the grievances which the people of this country, especially those engaged in commerce, laboured under, from the operation of the existing administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. The system was looked upon with terror by men of business: it was not an uncommon practice for a dishonest debtor to threaten to file a bill, which would terrify the creditor into suffering the greatest impositions (hear, hear). He could state a fact in illustration of this, which had happened in his own affairs. He had lent a sum of 4500l. to an individual, on the bond of a most respectable surety. The bond fell due 18 months after this loan, and when application was made to the surety for payment, the answer was, "True, I signed this bond, but I do not now owe the obligor so much; I have since had other transactions in money matters with him, and now only owe him 4000l. instead of 4500l, and that is all which I shall pay." Thinking this answer very extraordinary, he (Mr. Smith) took the bond to his solicitor, and stated the circumstances; when he was informed, as he had expected, that the subsequent pecuniary affairs between the surety and obligor, had nothing to do with the original obligation of the bond as affecting the obligee who had advanced the money; and his solicitor offered to serve the surety with a notice of action for the recovery of the debt, but headed, "Just as your claim is, this man can apply to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain you from proceeding at law; and though he must ultimately be defeated with costs, still my costs, that will ultimately fall upon you in the progress of this litigation, will probably amount to more than the 500l. at issue" (hear). Startled at this prospect, he accepted the 4,000l. and put an end to the matter (hear). In another case, he had acted as one of the assignees of a bankrupt; a defendant had converted a matter of business into a suit in Chancery; and that suit had lasted for 23 years (hear, hear). When he named the period of its duration, he meant not to cast any blame in the particular instance upon the Lord Chancellor, for he believed no judge would have been competent to have settled so voluminous a mass of accounts. Ashamed of this delay, and happening to meet his hon. friend Mr. Baring, who was a creditor upon the estate, they consulted what had better be done to relieve the parties from their existing difficulties. His hon. friend then sat down to unravel the accounts, and in three hours put into order that which the Court of Chancery had failed to do in 23 years (hear, hear), and assisted in terminating the litigation. He suspected that there was something inherently wrong in the whole form and nature of the Court of Chancery. The system, he was persuaded, was in itself erroneous (hear, hear). Let any man who had ever read a bill in Chancery—the bill in the case to which he had alluded—was as bulky as the table before him (alluding to the large table on the floor of the house)—let any man who had ever read such a bill, say whether he could understand its import? It abounded in words, but they were words without corresponding ideas—the whole bill was constructed in a language used two centuries ago. Ought

this form to be continued? But, independently of its incompatibility with common sense and justice, he objected to the system, on account of the enormous power which it vested in the hands of the lawyers. In a facetious periodical work, called "The Covent-garden Journal," published by Fielding, he said, "It is erroneous and foolish to think that the English government is only composed of three estates, meaning those of the King, the Lords, and Commons: there is a fourth estate—the mob" (a laugh). It was true, as the writer had put it, that the mob had considerable power at the time when he wrote; but a great change had since taken place; the mob were dispossessed of their power, and supplanted by a different class. He (Mr. S.) would, in defining the government, describe it to have four estates—the King, Lords, Commons, and the Lawyers (hear, and a laugh). The lawyers were legislators—they made new laws, and their dicta had the force of enactments. When his learned friend (Mr. Williams) had touched upon the reformation of the French law—when he had alluded to the genius of Bonaparte, whose code of law he had truly said would serve the memory of his conquests and his crimes, he had omitted to praise it for one of its most essentially useful qualities. That law, if not so purely administered as the British, was at least more readily afforded to the suitor, and twenty times cheaper (hear). This forced upon their attention the comparative demerits of their own system, and it was a case in which every individual in the land owed it to his country to state what he felt and knew upon the subject (hear, hear). When he said thus much, he repeated that he meant not to disparage the Lord Chancellor. He knew that learned lord laboured harder in his office than any other judge: he believed he devoted much more of his time to business, and much less to pleasure, than any other man; but he equally believed that his whole system was bad, and required entire revision (hear, hear); a revision, too, which he did not expect from the commission which had the business in hand, for he knew that the members of it were unable to do what was essentially necessary for a beneficial change, namely, to turn the system itself upside down: to that they must come, before they could accomplish the reformation which was called for (hear, hear).

Mr. Ellice had been long aware of the grievances attending the system of business in the Court of Chancery; and had as those cases were which had just been brought to light by his learned friend (Mr. Williams), he believed they were trivial in comparison of those which could be brought forward by many individuals connected with the trade and industry of the country. He was also convinced, that no good could arise from the labours of the commission appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Court of Chancery: besides having persons of legal knowledge, it ought to have had the assistance of men of business. Why did not the Court of Chancery, in matters of accounts, adopt the practice of the Civil Court? There such matters were referred to the registrar, assisted by mercantile men (hear), who sat continuously until they made their report. If an improvement could be made in the administration of the affairs of the Court of Chancery, it ought to be made quickly and efficiently; and he begged to direct their attention to one point of practice which he knew to be attended with very injurious consequences—he alluded to the investing money in Chancery: it was a hopeless task to manage the money of others when it became once deposited there. He had represented the grievance of such a case some time ago to one or two of his Majesty's ministers, and the monstrous inconvenience and loss which it imposed upon the guardians of minors. He could more particularly speak of one case, in which he was himself, for his own security, obliged to lodge the money of children, the eldest of whom was only eleven years of age, in the Accountant-General's office. There was the evil—the party lodging money in the Court of Chancery, had no option; it must be invested in the three per cent. stock, at 94 or 95—so that it was not impossible, before the eldest child became of age, the stock would fall to 50 (hear). Above 30 or 35 millions of property were sunk in that disadvantageous manner—an amount nearly equalling the whole floating debt of the country. Why not allow the suitors the benefit of investing the money so as to obtain a sort of exchequer-bill interest? In a case in which he was personally concerned, it had been required of him to make an affidavit for the satisfaction of the court. His affidavit was deemed inadmissible, and his succeeding attempts were equally abortive. His solicitor then tried, and after him, his counsel; but their efforts were equally unavailing. The point was of little importance, but after the court had refused to admit five successive affidavits, it at last accepted and was satisfied with that which was first made. The property in dispute was about 1,500*l.*, and the expenses of litigation amounted to between 300*l.* and 400*l.* A good deal had been said of the Lord Chancellor, but he thought it not right to throw the odium of this branch of the judicial system upon the individual Judge. Let the rt. hon. gent. opposite (Mr. Peel) follow up what he had already done, in reforming abuses in the administration of justice (hear, hear). The blame ought not to be cast upon a single individual, who, if he had the disposition, had not the power to remedy them (hear).

The Solicitor-General said, that before he noticed the observations of his learned friend (Mr. Williams), respecting the constitution of the Court of Chancery, he would advert a little to the five petitions upon which he had chiefly founded his speech. His learned friend had, properly enough, abstained from vouching for the accuracy of the statements in those petitions; and, indeed, it would have disparaged his understanding, had he done otherwise. Mr. Palmer's petition came first in order, and related to some alleged abuse in what was called "the Elephant and Castle charity." In the Elephant and Castle charity, the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury had formerly possessed the property, and they still held the right of visitation; being, in fact, according to the settlement at the Reformation, entitled to a reversion of the property. Their claim, however, could not so easily be brought into consideration, because the affairs of the Dean and Chapter must undergo discussion in the Diocesan Court in the first instance. The consequence was, that the cause was only ripe for judgment in January last. But this was not all. The convenience of counsel, as in every other court, was consulted in this; and many of the delays of hearing must be set to the account of their accommodation, which was equally called for by the courtesy of the judge and the interest of the writers generally. It was not very surprising that, under these complicated accidents and causes of delay, 50l. should have been laid out in the expenses of the hearing. The next petition was that of Mr. Honeywood Yate, who by his absurd and preposterous suggestions, would have the House to believe, that the late enlightened Mr. Ricardo had left 50,000l. upon some contingency of litigation; but if it were so, that circumstance would furnish no reason for inferring that the expense of a Chancery suit would be 50,000l. The fact was, that at the time that Mr. Ricardo made the purchase of his Gloucestershire estate, the title was disputed by this Mr. H. Yate, and it was to defend the estate from that particular claim that Mr. Ricardo set apart the 50,000l. But if there were any justice in the claim, Mr. Yate might sue in formd paparia. The third petition from Mr. Gower was more preposterous than the others. He was an annuitant upon the estate of the Duke of Queensberry along with other creditors, whose united claims amounted to 400,000l. The Duke of Buccleuch obtained judgments in the Scotch courts against the estates for 100,000l., the amount of fines improperly levied. In the common course of proceeding the creditors could have had no claim to a settlement until the final decision of the appeals in that which was well known by the name of the Queensberry cause. An accidental rise in the funded portion of the property took place, and the Lord Chancellor finding that he had it in his power to do something for the creditors, and yet leave enough to answer the suit of the Duke of Buccleuch, and make compensation to the tenants, went out of his way to do them this service, and ordered a dividend of one half to be paid them. The next petition was from Mr. Gourlay, who was a madman. Mr. Kesteven had refused to put in an answer to a bill, and for that contempt of Court had incurred the expense of an attachment. He probably would wish to have a Court of Chancery that could not imprison delinquents. Such were the petitions which his learned friend had thought proper to present. Mr. Gourlay had no objection to a Court of Chancery which would decide quickly, however atrociously. Mr. Gower wanted a Court of Chancery which would pay him his debt out of other money than that which belonged to his debt. Mr. M. Yate wanted a Court of Chancery which would allow him to defer his claim to an estate till twenty years after the decease of the purchaser. Mr. Palmer wanted a Court of Chancery which would allow him to proceed on judgment upon any petition however crude, irregular, or infernal. The learned gent. had intrusted something of the plan of his attack on the Court of Chancery, whenever his day should come, by the assertions which he had made of a usurpation effected by this court over the powers of the other jurisdictions. This was at variance with the fact, as might be proved from the circumstance, that from the time of the dispute between Lords Coke and Hilcomb respecting the remanding of a cause into Chancery, after verdict in the Court of King's Bench, no question of jurisdiction had arisen down to this time. The Court of Chancery had from time of human memory, exercised the same jurisdiction which it possessed now. The learned gent. must have forgotten his historical reading, when he said that no such jurisdiction had ever been known in any civilized country. In the constitution of republican Rome at the brightest period of her history, the Pretorian Court held a controlling and corrective power over the judgments of common law. The Court of Session in Scotland acted as a Court of Equity in those cases of unperformed contracts, which could not be brought within the proper cognizance of the common law, just as Chancery enforced specific performances and execution of contracts. In fact, the distinction of law and equity had always prevailed in civilized states. He contended that this was not the proper time to take the evils of the jurisdiction, whatever they might be, under their consideration, while they were without any information from the commissioners who were appointed to inquire into it.

Dr. Eddington, with a view to justify the delay in the report of the commissioners, said they were almost all men engaged in the duties of judicial situations, or the practice of their various courts. Few were the days which any of them had free from avocations, and fewer those upon which they could collect a full meeting. The Vice Chancellor, upon whom they had entirely depended, had been withheld from co-operation by long and severe illness. Another highly intelligent person had declined acting. He was himself most anxious for the fulfilment of the duty which had been imposed upon him, though he feared that the undertaking was beyond his powers. He was anxious, too, that the House should not be led to expect more from the commission than the persons delegated were able to effect. Those powers were very limited. Their inquiry into the practice did not allow them to consider the law of that court. It only went to a review of the forms of proceeding from the first commencement to the final issue. The other branch of their inquiry was only directed to ascertain whether some of the functions of this jurisdiction might not safely be separated from it, and given to the other courts. Had the commission directed an inquiry into the whole system of Chancery, he must have hesitated much before undertaking a task so greatly above his ability. He did not mean to say that it was actually impossible, or that it was not desirable to reform the system; but this commission could not effect it. He could have no doubt that much beneficial alteration might be effected in many branches of the law of England. It was not possible, for example, at present for the Court of Chancery to order a trial by jury to determine whether a settlement of personal property by will was made by a person of sound mind, though it had the power of doing it with questions of real property. It would be desirable to pass an act to give the Court of Chancery that power with which it was not now invested by law. He had had very considerable experience in the affairs of wills, and, though it would be seriously against his own interests, he must say, that such a regulation would benefit the country at large, and lighten the business of the courts. Very considerable abuses were manifest in the law which regulated the transfer of real property. He could not allow that there was any rational ground for a system, which required, in making out the abstract of a title, eight hundred brief sheets, prepared, as he knew the fact to be, by one of the most honest solicitors in London. This gentleman had found it impossible, with safety to his client, to compress the abstract of a title to an estate in less than eight hundred sheets. He wondered that the country gentlemen had not given their attention to this subject. If they considered what an enormous tax it levied, in the course of years, upon their property—the expense of stamps alone which it brought with it—and the dangerous intricacies which rendered their possessions wholly insecure, they would not remain satisfied. He knew of no reasons sufficient to justify its continuance. A system of laws contrived, when the personal property of the kingdom was not one-five-hundredth of the real property, and when all property passed by rude conveyance, almost from hand to hand, could never be suitable to a period when commercial wealth and its transactions so infinitely transcended the value of all the real property in the kingdom. How, then, were they to proceed in this matter? He had always thought that a commission, such as was here called for, ought to consist of persons selected from a variety of the professions and classes of society, so that it should possess a combination of the talent and learning of the lawyer, the enlarged and enlightened views of the statesman, and of all the practical knowledge and acquirements of the merchant (hear). Such a combination as this should be concentrated, and brought to bear as much as possible on the great object of framing such a system of laws as might enable the subjects of Great Britain to obtain—what at present they could not obtain—justice cheaply and expeditiously (cheers). It was not his intention on this occasion to enter into any examination of what had passed heretofore in any of our courts of justice; much less did he mean to go into any examination of the faults of those who had presided in those courts. His object as a lawyer and a member of parliament was to find out where the evil existed, and to attempt to discover and apply a remedy for it, rather than to fix the blame on particular individuals (hear).

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, it was now long since he had first attempted to prove that the defects in the system of the Court of Chancery, and the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, amounted to a denial, and indeed a complete subversion of justice. The reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the nature of those evils stated, that so rapidly were causes accumulating at that time in the jurisdiction in question, that it was judged they could not be disposed of in less than 25 years. This was stated in both Houses of Parliament, and was not contradicted in the House of Lords. The public had been seriously aggrieved by the proceedings in the Court of Chancery; and this he would say, notwithstanding that he had the honour of being personally acquainted with the Lord Chancellor, and believed him to be one of the most upright and honourable minded men in the country (hear). With regard to the appellate jurisdiction, he (Mr. T.) had proposed some years ago to provide assistance in the House of Lords, either by an additional number of Lords for the determination of appeals, or by the appointment of an additional judge in that jurisdiction. After a twelve years' hard struggle, Lord Gifford had been at last appointed to preside with the Lord Chancellor at the hearing of appeals (hear, hear). The effect of this arrangement had been, that the lords had reduced the number of appeals in an astonishing degree, and were proceeding with them in a manner that reflected upon them the highest credit (hear, hear). Why should not some beneficial arrangement of a similar nature be adopted in the equity jurisdiction? He was not the individual who moved the question in respect of these delays in Chancery; but had been present on that occasion, he would not have consented to such a commission as was then named. For who was nominated at the head of it (hear, hear)? The very individual whose conduct was complained of as tending to encourage those delays (hear). The fact was, that as it existed at present, this chancery jurisdiction was perfectly detested throughout the country (hear); and in an age like this, such cumbrous forms of proceeding could not much longer be endured. Bye and bye there would be that acceleration effected in the business of chancery, that he would scarcely despair of seeing a steam practice introduced (laughter). He knew an amicable suit which had been before the court 33 years (hear, hear). It was admitted by the best and most experienced practitioners, that under some circumstances, to recover a property of 3000l. out of Chancery, would not cost less than 1500l. (hear, hear). What was such monstrous injustice as this owing to? To the immoderate amount of fees accruing and accumulating upon such long delays (hear.) He could scarcely imagine why it was that the Solicitor-General should quarrel so much with that case of Mr. Palmer, which had been mentioned before that evening. Mr. Palmer's case had been depending or hanging up three whole years.

The Solicitor-General begged pardon; two years only.

Mr. M. A. Taylor—Only two years (a laugh). Then on the learned gent.'s own admission, it was another case to prove the hardships that were produced by this fatally constituted court. The Fleet and other prisons of the metropolis, which he (Mr. T.) had visited, contained numerous victims, without clothes, and almost in a state of despondency, who would not have been in those melancholy abodes, and in so wretched a condition, but for the injuries which they had suffered through the Court of Chancery (hear). Perhaps the house was already aware of that affecting case of the two widow ladies, who were interested in a property, which an attorney managed to hang up in Chancery. Pending the proceedings one of the ladies died at the age of 81, nine years after she became invested with the right to a beneficial interest in that property. Her sister, too, survived her only by about half a year (hear, hear). With respect to the inefficiency of the commission he alluded to, and the causes assigned for the long delay of its report, he would only say, that if some of the members were incapacitated from attending it by reason of professional or other engagements, they ought never to have been placed upon it. Without some vigorous struggle on the part of the house, no good would be done in the business (hear).

Mr. Peel would not have said a word upon the question but for the direct allusions which had been made to him. The learned gent. had indicated that he (Mr. P.) wished to impede or defeat the objects of an inquiry into the delays of Chancery. He denied any such imputation (hear); he wished for a full and open inquiry into the whole practice of the Court of Chancery. He denied that any inference to the contrary could be drawn from the manner in which the commission of last session had been constituted. Government had good reason to adopt that sort of constitution, from the success with which the Commission of Inquiry into the Judicature of Scotland had been attended (hear, hear). It was but the preceding evening that he had heard that commission very highly eulogized in that house, and yet it was composed entirely of lawyers—the very men whom the learned gent. thought to be the most unfit to be admitted upon committees of that kind, but who were in such commission associated with judges, as the best qualified to report on the condition of their own judicature. He had a much higher opinion of the conscientiousness and integrity of lawyers than the learned gent. opposite, who ought to know them so much better, seemed to give them credit for (a laugh). An hon. gent. had argued that a Mastership in Chancery was disabled from conducting any inquiry into matters of accounts because he was not an accountant. It was very odd, on the same evening, to hear it contended by the learned member that a man was disabled from inquiring into questions of legal proceedings because he was a lawyer (hear, hear). What possible object could he (Mr. P.) be supposed to have, if not a full and candid examination of this subject? He owned that he had hoped ere this, that the report of the commissioners would have been made (hear). He thought, too, it would have been much better had they determined to report in the first place on some specific branch of their inquiries, instead of waiting to prepare their general report upon the whole of the topics embraced by the commissioners, because it was evident that any such general report on the Court of Chancery, must of necessity be postponed for a considerable time. When he considered that these commissioners had already sat 70 days (hear); had examined 45 witnesses; and had rejected no witness who came forward voluntarily to tender his evidence or to furnish information; when he reflected that they had their own avocations also to attend to, and knew that it was their intention to publish the whole of the evidence taken before them, and not merely their general report upon it; what object could he have in view but a full and perfect examination? But what were the names which he found in this commission? There was the noble and learned lord at the head of his Majesty's law officers: could any thing like a toleration of unfairness or disingenuousness be dreaded from him? If the guarantee of his noble friend's integrity and character were insufficient to ensure the public confidence in this commission, would it not be confirmed even by the names of others who were his colleagues? Was there not the learned member for Ilchester (Dr. Lushington), whose speech of that evening had so well attested the manly independence of a mind that would not suffer any thing like evasion, or a want of faith, in any such inquiry as that which was the object of the commission (hear). The terms of the reference had been complained of as too much li-

mitting the powers of the commission. But they were as comprehensive as those of the learned gent., "Inquiry into the delays and expenses of the Court of Chancery, and the causes thereof." The object of the commission of last session was thus stated, "Inquiry into the forms and process of a suit, from its first institution to its close." These terms surely opened every detail connected with the system of Chancery proceedings and the Chancery Court (hear). The reference then proceeded—"and whether any part of the present jurisdiction of the court can be removed" (hear). With respect to what had been said about the present defective state of the law as to the transfer of landed property, had he (Mr. P.) referred any such extensive subject to that commission to report on, besides its more immediate inquiries, would he not have rendered himself liable to the charge of purposely doing so, with the view of withdrawing and diverting the commission's attention from the great objects of its labours? If, indeed, that law could be altered, let it be altered; for it was due to the increasing wealth, and to the commerce, and to the property of the country, that a law regulating the transfer of real property should be left in no state of uncertainty or defectiveness. So much in answer to the objections touching the constitution of the commission. But when the learned gent. quoted Hudibras, to show that 150 years ago the same delays were charged against the Court of Chancery as now, it should appear that 13 months was no unreasonable period for the preparation of a report upon the nature and effect of those delays.

Mr. Hume referred to a passage in Mr. Müller's book on the abuses of Chancery. That author stated that it was in vain to hope for any reform or improvement in the system, so long as the power and patronage of a vast number of offices, such as the six clerks, master, curators, &c. remained in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who thus disposed of numerous posts, some of them mere sinecures, the united salaries of which amounted to not less than between £200,000. and £300,000. a-year (hear). The learned lord had appointed a near relation of his own to no less than six situations.

Mr. Brougham did not expect any satisfaction, from the partial report of the commission appointed to inquire into the state of chancery practice, of which report the learned gentleman (the Solicitor-General) had, he believed, given the exact description it would deserve, when he said he expected that it would be very unsatisfactory to all parties (hear). The powers of countenance possessed by the learned gentleman were very great, as were those of every gentleman who practised in Chancery; but he was quite convinced that the learned gentleman would find it impossible to retain the gravity of his features, if he declared that he expected the Chancery Commission to effect much benefit (hear). It was wrested from government by the force of public opinion, and by the expression of it which had been heard within those walls; but the objects which those who called for it had in view were entirely frustrated. The learned gentleman, in speaking of the Catholic relief bill, had said with regard to one of its provisions—that which was intended to control the correspondence of the Catholic clergy with the see of Rome,—

board to examine the despatches of the Pope! This is just as absurd, as if a charge having been advanced against the Chancellor of the Exchequer,"—by the way, it is strange that the learned gentleman should have stumbled on a Chancellor (a laugh).—"he were to request that a commission should be appointed, under the great seal, or under the seal of the Exchequer more properly, to look into his proceedings; that commission to consist of the secretary for the Home Department, the secretary for the Foreign Department, and so forth, those individuals being his colleagues in office. What would be thought of the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he acted thus?" Undoubtedly, such a proceeding would be very absurd, and very unsatisfactory; it would be a monstrous proposition—a great mockery. But certainly not so monstrous a proceeding, not so gross a mockery, as if they put the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself at the head of the commission (hear, hear). And yet the commission he was now speaking of was exactly of that sort (hear). That commission was appointed to inquire into the practice of the Court of Chancery, and the abuses thereof, and whether those abuses were owing to the system itself or to the conduct of John, Lord Eldon, the individual at the head of the court. And who was to decide? Who was called on to control those abuses, and to carry into effect the wishes of the legislature? Why, John, Lord Eldon. Most truly, no man knew better than he where the fault lay, if he wished to speak; but when he and the commission, of which he was the head, remained silent an entire year, to say that he entertained any hopes from their proceedings, would be to treat the House of Commons with a degree of levity at variance with the gravity they deserved (cheers). He (Mr. B.) expected nothing—absolutely nothing—he had got all he expected; he could not have got less (a laugh). Something has been said of the Scotch Commission; but that was widely different from this; for there were men coming from another country, free from local prejudices—men, too, under the control of a most superior man; above all, a man like Lord Eldon (hear); for although he (Mr. B.) conceived him to be a very bad man to correct the abuses in his own court, yet, if he wanted a persevering investigator into the faults of others—a rigid inquisitor (loud cheers)—he would do the talents of the learned lord the justice to say, that he did not know a person more eminently qualified for the office both as a subtle lawyer and an acute man (loud cheers). If he were a judge in any other court but his own (there he might shelter him (Mr. B.) with his protection,) but were he a judge in any other court in England, Ireland, or Scotland, he could not name the man by whom he should less like to be scrutinized (hear, hear). No man living would be less disposed to spare the faults of others, or more firmly determined to deal out even-handed justice towards the lapses of other institutions, but he was not the man to reform the abuses of his own court (cheers). In the olden time, there was a certain Pope at Rome, who requested the cardinals to judge him for certain offences, which he confessed he had committed: delays of justice (a laugh). The cardinals exclaimed they could not judge him, because he was the head of the church, but added, Judica te ipsum: in the anguish of his mind, he exclaimed, "Ju- dica me cruentum." The sentence was executed; for history informs us, that "Judicatus fuit, cruentus fuit, et sanctus fuit" (much laughter). Now, he, (Mr. B.) much doubted, whether the learned lord would not have certain conscientious scruples against following the example of a Pope of Rome (a laugh). Nothing but the hope of a subsequent sanctification, could prevail upon him to adopt the precedent; and even with this flattering prospect before his eyes, his interest in the estate for life being superior to his love of country, and the purification of his own soul, might not induce him to sacrifice the possession (much cheering and laughter).

Mr. J. Williams in reply referred to Blackstone, to prove that the ancient law-writers did not allow that extent to the Court of Chancery which was now contended for. He objected strongly to the two jurisdictions possessed by the Court of Chancery; and concluded by observing, that if he had thought proper, he could have brought forward much stronger cases than even those which he had laid before the house that evening.

The petitions were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.—Sir Francis Burdett moved "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to cause the evidence taken before the commissioners appointed to inquire into the Court of Chancery to be laid before the house."

Mr. Peel believed it was without precedent that a committee should be thus called on to report the evidence taken before it, without the opinion or determination at which it had arrived on that testimony. Unless the hon. bart. could lay some much stronger ground for his motion than he (Mr. P.) was yet aware of, he could not accede. It seemed to him, moreover, that no kind of public good could be derived, under present circumstances, from the production of this evidence; and he should even object to a more modified proposition—for instance, to the production of any separate portion of the evidence that might be expected to have been taken before this committee. Supposing that this evidence could be printed in the course of the present session of Parliament, within a fortnight or three weeks, could any public measure, even in that case, be founded upon it (hear)? The commission had already sat seventy days, and had examined five-and-forty witnesses; and it was to be presumed they were unprepared for the hon. bart.'s motion; so that a considerable time must necessarily elapse before the whole of the evidence which they had taken could be copied out and prepared. Even after it should have been printed, it might readily be imagined that members would require some time properly to digest and consider it; for without time, how could they be prepared to form an opinion on such important matters? He could not help thinking that it would have a very prejudicial effect to publish this evidence without the statement of such measures as the commissioners might feel it expedient to recommend upon the result of their investigations. He considered this inquiry as an extremely valuable and important one; and he utterly disclaimed all imputation of opposing the motion of the hon. bart. with-any view to conceal the evidence which might have been taken before the committee. He seriously, and upon his honour, assured the hon. bart., that he earnestly hoped some efficient remedy might be provided for the evils which he believed to be occasioned by the present condition of the Court of Chancery (hear, hear). Without meaning, in any degree, to impute blame to any body connected with that court, he certainly could not hear these serious complaints of the dreadful delays of Chancery, without believing as an honest man, that those delays must be effectually remedied and provided against in future (hear, hear). He trusted that ere long the house would be in possession, not only of a careful, but of an ample report on the subject; and though he certainly could have wished that the commissioners would have rather reported, from time to time, on separate points of their inquiry, than have waited to produce a general report upon the entire objects of their commission; yet it would, in his opinion, be highly unadvisable now to interpose, when the completion of their labours might be so speedily anticipated. He had very recently had communication with an individual who, as being at the head of the jurisdiction in question, might be supposed by many to feel, in some degree, personally interested in this matter; but who, in reality, as he (Mr. Peel) conscientiously believed, felt no concern of that kind—he meant the Lord Chancellor (hear); and from what that noble lord, and, indeed, other members of the commission, had told him, he did unquestionably believe that a full report, including the evidence, might be printed before the next meeting of parliament. Now, if the fact were so, and if there could be no time in this session to allow of any measure, founded on the right hon. baronet's motion of that evening, to be produced to the house, he thought he must have satisfied the hon. bart. himself that it could not be proper for the house to accede to that motion. On these grounds, the house would perceive, that if the motion of the hon. bart. were carried, it would amount to a virtual superseding of the committee. He (Mr. Peel) had not the slightest objection, in the meantime, to produce the commission under which the commissioners were appointed and empowered to act, in order that the house might see what were the terms of it, and who they were that had been selected to discharge its duties (hear),—but he was compelled to resist the premature publication of the evidence.

Sir F. Burdett, notwithstanding the arguments which the rt. hon. gent. had just advanced, could not help thinking that so long a time having elapsed since the appointment of this commission, it was highly important the house should have before it, forthwith, the evidence which the commissioners had obtained. As to the commission itself, he meant not to impute any blame to it on account of the delay which had already taken place: but the individuals composing it were persons whose professional and other avocations could scarcely have left them sufficient time to perform the duties of commissioners with sufficient diligence, compatibly with the duties imposed upon them by their private pursuits. For this reason he complained of the constitution of such a commission (hear, hear). When he saw at the head of it the Lord Chancellor himself, he must say that the principal who presided over the very system out of which the delays arose, was not exactly the party who should be placed over a commission intended to remedy that which the learned lord might perhaps not consider an evil (hear). But the powers of those commissioners were extremely limited, and by no means going to the root of that evil. They went to the investigation of the practices of subordinates in this court; but not of the construction and nature of the court itself (hear). Now, since the committee had been so long employed in collecting information, it was proper that the house should be made acquainted with their proceedings. The evils to be inquired into were so extensive, so universal, that there was hardly a family in the kingdom which had not been embarrassed by their baneful operation. It was not so essentially necessary for the house to be in possession of the opinion of any set of commissioners, as to find out, upon the evidence offered to them, some speedy relief for evils, which from day to day were going on, increasing in number and amount, and becoming more and more oppressive on the subject. The business of the Court of Chancery was from day to day increasing. But its proceedings were not regulated by the common law of the land: it was altogether a sort of stolen-in jurisdiction, affecting to proceed on the principles of the civil law, but really acting on a system that was repugnant to the principles of common law, and, he might almost say, of common sense (hear). It was obvious, that one great remedy which might be applied to the evils occasioned by the present constitution of this court, would be to provide for its proceeding upon principles of the common law (hear). If, instead of all that immense mass of affidavit evidence—if, instead of the Lord Chancellor's directing voluminous written statements to be prepared, and circuitous proceedings by interrogatories, when, perhaps, the man might be sitting under the very nose of his lordship who could explain the transactions in question before him—if this practice were done away, and the rule of the common law and of common sense were resorted to, of taking the best, and not the worst, testimony that could be obtained—of preferring oral testimony where it could be gotten, to artfully fabricated depositions—then, indeed, something like permanent good would be effected (hear, hear). The Lord Chancellor, however industrious he might be, however desirous to obtain information, however conscientious, was bound to observe the proper means for enabling him to form correct and accurate judgments (hear). By the existing modes of dilatory proceeding, under which a person was not considered bound to attend until he had been summoned three times, and by all those means which enabled a party, on paying up his fees punctually, to go over so many seals—a dishonest man, who could afford such measures, had it in his power to impose upon others the necessity of following him through a course of almost heart-breaking litigation. If a whole year had been employed in collecting information only about the fees of Chancery, enough had been done to enable parliament to proceed on the evidence taken before this committee. If the other avocations of the Lord Chancellor did not give him time to attend to the business of the Court of Chancery—a fact which was roundly stated,—let us have judges enough to do the business properly; let us not be placed under the necessity of pursuing justice by such dilatory and expensive methods (hear, hear). With respect to bankruptcy cases, some new provision ought to be adopted. There was not a more fertile source of abuse than the manner in which commissions of bankruptcy were sued out and prosecuted. In this department, there were no less than seventy judges, who might or might not attend at their pleasure, and hence a most ruinous delay was frequently produced. Those seventy places were in the gift of the Lord Chancellor; and they were generally bestowed upon young barristers to begin with; for no one would say that those who filled them were selected on account of their abilities, or peculiar fitness for the situation (hear). If there were only seven, or only two courts, attended by persons who would give themselves up wholly to the business, that business would be better done, and justice would be more speedily administered, than it was at present by this multitude of assistants. Twelve months ago a commission had been appointed to inquire into and to report on the practice of the court of Chancery. No report had yet been made, and the rt. hon. govt. now declared that it would be detrimental to the public to produce the evidence taken before that commission. He could not, however, perceive that any mischief was likely to be produced by placing that evidence before the public. It appeared that in the courts of Equity, the expense of procuring justice was much greater than in any other quarter, and it certainly was proper that the house and the public should get possession of every circumstance which could by possibility guide them to a remedy for so serious an evil (hear, hear). The first thing which ought to be placed in their hands was not the report of the commission, which appeared to him to be of no importance, but the evidence taken before the commissioners. That evidence ought to be produced immediately. So far from delay being advisable, he was strongly impressed with the idea, that much mischief would be occasioned by withholding the information which he now moved for. He relied on the good sense of the house for supporting this motion to make the evidence public. The minds of men, generally, and more especially the minds of members of parliament, would be directed to the consideration of those remedies which the nature of the case called for (hear, hear).

Mr. Hurst expressed himself in favour of the motion. In a suit in which he was engaged, and which he eventually succeeded in gaining, he was obliged to pay 8l. 17s. 6d. for every 10l. he recovered (hear).

Mr. Peel said, if the hon. bart. renewed his motion very early in the next session, he certainly would not oppose it. He had no desire to perpetuate abuses of any kind. This he had shewn by his bill to repress frivolous writs of error.

Mr. Denman observed, that the bill for repressing frivolous writs of error was brought in on account of the notoriety of the evil which it was meant to correct; and this was a sufficient reason for the production of the evidence now required. It might be true, that no such proceeding as that now adopted by his hon. friend (Sir F. Burdett) had ever before been resorted to in that house; but the question was, whether the circumstances of the present case did not fully justify it? An hon. member who had recently spoken, stated, that he had been charged nearly 9l. for the recovery of 10l.; and on the last night when this subject was before the house, two or three gentlemen had related to him cases of amoultants as to whose right to recover certain sums of money no doubt existed, but who were unable to procure that to which they were entitled; until several of them joined to defray the expenses of an amicable suit. Many of those persons might die before a decree could be obtained; but, at all events, such delay must be a disgrace to this enlightened country. In the city, if an individual had a claim upon a small quantity of stock, placed in the name of executors, although there might be no doubt as to the right, still the answer was, "We cannot pay it, until you have instituted a suit in equity" (hear, hear). In many of these cases the attorneys said, "Don't move in such a suit, for the costs will carry away all the money" (hear, hear). These were matters of notoriety—matters long before the public, and they called loudly for legislative interference (hear, hear). Certain he was that these evils, tremendous as they were, would never be rectified, unless the members of the House of Commons applied their minds to the subject—unless they took the matter into their own hands (hear). In the year 1823, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. J. Williams) turned his attention to this subject. The friends of the Lord Chancellor opposed, and the motion was lost. In the following year, it was defeated by the rt. hon. Secretary of State, who proposed that a commission should be appointed to carry into effect the object which his learned friend (Mr. J. Williams) had in view. Commissioners were appointed; but up to this period they had made no report; and, in his opinion, they were not likely to make one for some time. It appeared that they had sat for seventy days, and had examined forty-five persons. They must, in such a period, and from so great a number of persons, have elicited much information which it was desirable the house should be possessed of. But they were told that some difficulty existed with respect to getting it through the press in time. He, however, believed that the evidence might be printed in three or four days. It had already been lithographed, and any person might have it. In fact, it was public, and he should be very sorry if it were otherwise. But this sort of publicity was not like placing it formally before that house (hear). He would quote a short extract from the evidence given before that commission, by a barrister, which would show of what importance that evidence was. The barrister was asked, "Whether he had ever seen the misery of those who had been obliged to embark in Chancery suits, and whose hopes had been delayed and disappointed?" He answered "No; I see no such things. The solicitor passes between me and the client. I can only speak of the probability of misery being created by those delays. But this I know, that after long litigation, the order of the court has been often drawn up to divide the remnant of the property, not for the benefit of the litigating parties, but in part payment of the solicitor's bill" (hear, hear). Surely the house could not be aware of such monstrous cases, without feeling the necessity of applying, and speedily applying, some effectual remedy.

(hear). A distinction was attempted to be drawn on this occasion, founded on the circumstance of this inquiry being conducted by commissioners. Now, he could not see what distinction could fairly be drawn between commissioners appointed by the crown, and a committee nominated by that house. Yet, in the latter instance, the evidence given had been considered a fit subject for legislation, without waiting for any report. Thus it was with respect to the committee on the state of Ireland. Such, he believed, was also the case with reference to the committee on the combination laws. A great deal of the evidence given before them consisted of complaints made by the masters against the journeymen, and the committee, he understood, were unwilling to hear any evidence on behalf of the journeymen (no, no). He understood the committee were ready to propose a severe law, before they heard what the men could advance in support of their conduct (no, no). Such, certainly, was the report. If evidence had been given before the commission, with respect to subpoenas, or any other process of the court of Chancery, he thought it was quite competent for the house to legislate on that branch of the subject, without waiting for any report. When the report came, it would of course be subject to the revision of that house, and to the scrutiny of public opinion; but, in the meantime, the best way to become conversant by degrees with the great and diversified subject before them, was by the publication of the evidence now called for. There was, he knew, a great degree of tenderness manifested towards the individual who presided in the court of Chancery (hear, and laughter). This proved nothing more than the extent of his influence (hear). No man wished less than he did to give that learned old offence; but he could not help alluding to him when he heard gentlemen argue this question on the ground that no personal fault could be found with the individual who was at the head of the court of Chancery. He did not mean to say that there was any personal fault; but there might be personal fault; and that was a matter which he thought ought to be well considered. One fact alone would show the manner in which the business of the court of Chancery was conducted. In the beginning of last Michaelmas Term, 45 causes were set down in the paper to be heard in the term, and on the last day of the term they still remained on the paper (hear). Not one of those causes was touched; and he begged the house to recollect that every one of the parties connected with each cause had to pay 11. for setting it down, exclusive of incidental expenses. If there were ten parties plaintiffs, and twenty parties defendants, each of them had to pay 20s. for the privilege of not being heard. A great deal of praise had been bestowed on the Lord Chancellor because he disposed of much business by way of motion. But great interests ought not to be so disposed of. If the case came afterwards to be formally adjudicated, the hearing of it by motion tended only to instil prejudices in the mind of the judge; and if it were disposed of at once, it passed by without that solemn consideration which all cases of moment ought to receive. He wished to show that the system was not altogether to blame, and if so, the person at the head of the court ought not to escape all censure. The Lord Chancellor had been for twenty-five years a constant witness of all the evils arising from the system, and it was a little surprising that he had made no attempt whatever to remedy those defects of which the public complained. On the contrary, he opposed with all his power every effort which had been made in the Commons House of Parliament to remove those evils. As to the other house, no attempt had been made there to lessen them in any degree (hear). The rt. hon. gent. said, that if the proposition were made next session, he would give it his sanction; but a motion of this kind, made next year, would be just as unprecedented as at present. Why, then, should he refuse his sanction now? A great degree of distrust had been created throughout the country, in consequence of the way in which the commission had been formed; and he feared that the rt. hon. gent.'s interview that day with the Lord Chancellor would have the effect of rendering that distrust still greater.

Mr. W. Courtenay said, the commissioners had to enter into a more extensive range of inquiry than gentlemen on the other side of the house seemed to imagine. When this subject was first brought before the house, he resisted the motion for the appointment of a Parliamentary committee to investigate the cause of the delays in the Court of Chancery and the House of Lords, which were so much complained of, because he thought such a committee would be incompetent to apply a remedy to those abuses. He therefore approved of the commission. Prior to this year, specific charges were brought against the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. Certain abuses were pointed out, which it was said, rendered it difficult to obtain justice in that court. But now a different course was pursued, and the whole system of the court was arraigned. The authority of the commission extended over an immense range of inquiry: it was appointed to consider "whether any, and what alterations could safely be made in the practice established in the Court of Chancery, or in the offices connected with that Court; or in the practices established in those offices, whether in respect to law or equity." It also extended its inquiry into general matters of equity—into bankrupt cases—into the different stages of proceeding in all matters from the beginning to the end of a suit—into the mode of hearing and deciding causes, together with the expense attending the various proceedings, and the time which they occupied. Now, he was not aware of any set of words in the English language, that could give to a set of commissioners a better opportunity for taking a most extensive view of this subject, through all its ramifications (hear). But the commission did not stop here. It went on to meet a point, which had been suggested frequently in that house, relative to the variety of business transacted in the Court of Chancery; and the commissioners were called on to inquire "whether any and what part of the business can be usefully withdrawn from the Court of Chancery, and transferred to some other court." Words more comprehensive than those could not, he thought, have been selected. Whether the bankruptcy cases could with propriety be withdrawn—a point long contended for—was thus made a part of the subject to be investigated by the committee. There was no part of this inquiry, extensive as it might be, that would not be fully, fairly, and substantially met. If the present commission were not entitled to the confidence of the house and country, to whom would his learned friend commit this inquiry? When he called for the evidence, were he and his friends ready to examine into minute technical points, and to decide whether certain rules of the court should be altered? The learned gentleman then quoted two extracts from Mr. Miller's work, in favour of the constitution of the Court of Chancery, in which that gentleman stated that the forms of the Court being of comparatively modern date, were originally more intelligible than those of the courts of common law; that they at length became vitiated by the course of practice, but that the general principles on which that court was conducted, were still entitled to commendation (hear). He next read an extract from the work of a lawyer of New York, Mr. Rumbold, in which that gentleman greatly praised the constitution of the Court of Chancery. The Code Napoleon had been pointed out to them as a standard which all nations ought to follow; but Mr. Rumbold, in his work on "the office and duties of a Master in Chancery," expressed it as his opinion, that the Americans, the rivals of this country in arms and commerce, could not do better in the formation of their system of jurisprudence, than to follow the system which had for so many ages prevailed in England.—He could not understand upon what ground objections had been taken to the Lord Chancellor being placed at the head of that commission, because he thought it must be obvious that the experience and knowledge which that illustrious person must possess on this subject would make his assistance worth more than any other which could be obtained. Personally he had no objection to the production of the evidence; but he thought, for the reasons he had stated, that it was not expedient now to publish it.

Dr. Lushington saw no reason to depart from the universal principle that publication was in all cases likely to elicit the truth (hear).—He wished that the evidence taken before this committee should be published, in order that it might undergo a full discussion in every possible shape, by pamphlets, reviews, and otherwise; because this discussion would, among its other good effects, afford assistance to the commissioners themselves, and the more the subject was examined, the more likely was it that the great object of the inquiry would be attained. He was anxious also, that it should be produced, that it might prove the commission had been mindful of their duty, and that they had discharged it with faithfulness and impartiality. A very short space of time would suffice for its production; and all that remained to be done would not be prejudiced by the production of that which had gone before, because he verily believed no further evidence remained to be taken, excepting for the purpose of elucidating such parts as exhibited a discrepancy of opinion among the persons examined. In order to the due administration of justice, three things were necessary—first, that the system should be a good one; secondly, that the practice should be judicious; and thirdly, that the judge should discharge his duty with ability, integrity, and dispatch. If any one of these items were wanting, it was impossible that justice could be duly administered. The first point was not within the province of the commission to inquire into. The second was conveyed in the instructions to this commission in so comprehensive a manner that it was impossible to extend them. Whether the Chancellor had been a good judge or not, the commission was not directed in precise terms to inquire; but it was impossible for them to give their opinion whether any part of the jurisdiction of the Chancellor ought to be transferred, unless they first came to a conclusion as to the manner in which the Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the Vice-Chancellor, had discharged their high duties; because, until it was ascertained by what means the arrears had been occasioned, the delay complained of could not be attributed to the proper quarter. He was not one of those who would object, if it became incidentally a part of his duty, to speak plainly his opinion as to where the blame ought to rest; and in justice to his brother commissioners, he must say that he had seen in none of them the slightest disposition to shrink from that duty (hear). He felt it also necessary to assure the house, that no opposition had been offered to impede the course of the inquiry in which they were engaged. The conduct of the Lord Chancellor in that inquiry had been perfectly consistent and honourable. He would not attend any of the examinations of witnesses, but when they should have been gone through, and the commissioners came to the discussion of that evidence, he offered any explanation which might be in his power. The illness of the Vice-Chancellor had occasioned some delay in the preparation of the report, and he thought the house would agree that the committee ought not to close their inquiry without the valuable assistance which his experience and knowledge would afford them.

Mr. Abercrombie thought he had a right to conclude, from what had been said by the hon. gent. on the other side of the house, and by the members of the commission, that there could be no objection to the production of the evidence. The advantage to the public in its immediate publication would be this—it would save a year, it would give more time for the consideration of the subject, and would enable persons in and out of the house to arrive the sooner at a conclusion. All that could be expected in this shape must be effected, as all had hitherto been effected, by the public (hear). The house had resisted as long as it could all attempts to obtain this inquiry, and at length it had been granted only in consequence of the unanimous and loud cry of the whole community (hear, hear). There was perhaps no question which so deeply interested the great body of the people of England as this. They ought to have an immediate opportunity of seeing what had been done,—what questions had been asked, and what answers had been given,—that the truth might be elicited, and that they might arrive at that conclusion which they ought to form. He was convinced that upon this subject no man could give a better or sounder opinion than Lord Eldon. As far as high attainments in his profession went, that judge was inferior to none. But here he must stop. The loudest complaint which had been made, others, if they would, might call it clamour, but he called it reasonable and well-founded complaint—was against Lord Eldon himself, and the manner in which he administered justice. The gravamen of the numerous petitions on this subject was the inconvenience which suitors experienced in consequence of the practice of putting causes day after day in Lord Eldon's paper, purporting to contain the business of each day, and which causes did not come on (hear, hear).—They were postponed over and over again, each postponement was attended with a very considerable expense; and even when causes had been decided, the judgment was delayed some times for weeks, sometimes for months, sometimes for years (hear, hear). These were among the heaviest complaints made against Lord Eldon, and he asked whether the commissioners had examined into them? Whether any thing had been done to ascertain their truth, whether the cause papers had been produced, which would at once decide the point (loud cries of hear). Any person who knew any thing of the practice of the Court of Chancery would agree with him that this was the greatest inconvenience the public had to complain of, and that this brought upon the whole system a greater degree of discredit than fairly fell to its share. He thought that system, if properly administered, was admirably contrived for the public advantage; for the sake of the system then (in favour of which he might perhaps be prejudiced) he wished the subject to be fully examined. With respect to the manner in which the commission was composed; it was the first time in an inquiry into the proceedings of a particular court that the person selected to be at the head of the commission, was the person who presided over the court.

Sir M. W. Ridley, in reply to an assertion which had been made by the hon. member for Nottingham (Mr. Denman) respecting the combination laws, said, there had been a greater number of men than of masters examined. He recommended that the attention of the house should be directed, not only to the court of Chancery, but to the other courts of equity, and particularly to the court of Exchequer, which required at least as much reform. He had had a case twelve years in that court, and had gained 40l. a-year by a decree in his favour at an expense of between 7 and 8,000l. He objected, however, to the mode in which an eminent individual had been attacked. Such attacks did no good, for Lord Eldon stood very high in the estimation of the people of England. The hon. member proceeded to read a passage in the Edinburgh Review in proof of this.

Mr. Brougham rose amidst loud cries of question.—With respect to the Lord Chancellor, he would say, that in the amiability of his habits, and in his courteous manner in all public business, he far surpassed every other judge, from the highest to the lowest, that he had ever seen. This made him feel considerable reluctance at being obliged to use harsh expressions against Lord Eldon. He had heard the late Sir Samuel Romilly express the same reluctance, and for the same reason. He had often heard him deplore the necessity of saying harsh things concerning a judge, who in his judicial capacity had never displayed any thing but courtesy. As a politician, Lord Eldon acted very differently; for in the House of Lords there was no man who said more harsh things, or who spoke with less respect of his enemies, and of those who were opposed to him in political opinions. The hon. member for Newcastle (Sir M. Ridley) had quoted a passage from what he was pleased to call a great authority, in favour of the Lord Chancellor; and in the way in which he had done it, he had exhibited a degree of subtlety which would have done credit even to the great lawyer to whom it referred. The hon. member had stated only a tenth part of what was to be found in the work to which he had alluded—he had given only a tithe of the lamb's wool, and had omitted all the other nine parts, which—if his recollection served him rightly, composed a very severe and unsparing, but by no means exaggerated or unjust picture of the judicial merits of the noble and learned lord (hear, hear). Certainly, as he had before observed, he had never seen the noble and learned lord do any thing more clever than to quote the tithe of what a writer had said respecting an individual, and to suppress the other nine parts, which qualified the opinion, valde quantum, which was contained in the tenth. He remembered that Mr. Butler—for whom he entertained the very highest respect, but who certainly was overflowing with the milk of human kindness towards friends and foes—had done something of a similar nature on one occasion. Mr. Butler stated that he had heard Sir Samuel Romilly say, that he had never known a judge more able than the Lord Chancellor, or one more remarkable for his courtesy towards practitioners. That was very true. He (Mr. B.) had heard Sir Samuel Romilly make the observation over and over again; but Mr. Butler omitted to state what Sir Samuel Romilly never failed to add—namely, that he considered his lordship, from the peculiar constitution of his mind, one of the very worst judges that ever sat in the Court of Equity (a laugh). This opinion of Sir Samuel Romilly was entitled to some weight, on account of his connexion with the court over which the learned lord presided; indeed, he might be said to have been “brought up at the feet of Gamaliel.” If ever a motion stood on irrefragable grounds it was that which had been submitted by his hon. friend the member for Westminster. It had been said, “Put off the motion till the next session.” But what was this more than saying, “Wait for six or seven, or eight months—wait until after Easter: the calamities of Ireland, the renewals of the Insurrection Act, all the wrongs of that country shall be discussed and left undressed in the early part of the session; foreign affairs shall also be disposed of; the boisterous torrent of the early part of the session shall have passed away, and then this measure may sail in on the quiet back-waters;” but then the house would be told, as now, “It is too late” (hear, hear). “What, will you suspend a threat over the head of the learned judge, and send him to try causes in the long vacation?” The house knew very well how successful those appeals were in producing fresh delays. The question, therefore, was not whether the house should receive the evidence now, but whether the abuses of Chancery should be inquired into in the next session, or in the session after; unless the evidence was received now, he despaired of seeing any thing done within that period (hear). His learned friend (Dr. Lushington) had told the house that the commission, as far as he was concerned, was impartially constituted. That he most readily admitted; but when he looked at the other component parts of the commission—when he recollected the infirmities of human nature—when he considered how himself should feel if he were to be placed in a commission of which he would be the only opposition member—he could not help imagining that his learned friend might be influenced in his opinions by something like a feeling of generosity towards an adversary (hear). When he recollected, too, that the commission was bereaved of the assistance of his learned friend the member for Lincoln (Mr. J. Williams), who was carefully excluded only because he had brought the subject under the notice of parliament—when he recollected that the commission was likewise bereaved of the assistance of his hon. friend the member for Durham (Mr. M. A. Taylor), who first (some laughing)—he would say that there was not a man in that house who deserved better of his country than that hon. member, and he should like to see the man who would take upon him to sneer when he uttered his conscientious opinion in favour of that hon. and learned individual. He saw members whose learning amounted to no more than the capacity of counting ten upon their fingers, who presumed to sneer at what he said—members who never opened their mouths in that house but to cover themselves with ridicule, and whose silence was the most prudent part of their conduct—he saw these men presume to sneer at a panegyric which was echoed by every person who had the honour of knowing the individual to whom it referred. Sir S. Romilly—who, to be sure, was no great lawyer, who was a person of contracted faculties compared with the gent. opposite, thought that he could not better employ his valuable time than in consulting the hon. member for Durham in private, and supporting him in public, on the subject of the Court of Chancery (hear). Sir Samuel Romilly did not think it beneath him to back the hon. member in the committee which was appointed with reference to the Court of Chancery; and then began that chapter of frustration of hope to the house and the country which was not yet brought to a conclusion. In that committee no obstruction was offered to inquiry on points of practice; but no sooner did Sir Samuel Romilly and the hon. member for Durham proceed to the too delicate part of the question—no sooner did they direct their inquiries to the time which had elapsed from the final hearing of a cause to the giving of judgment, than an adjournment was moved, and members who had never heard of what had been stated on the subject crowded in to befriend the Lord Chancellor by their votes. There was no more honesty, or, to use a gentler phrase, no more delicacy or adherence even to the ordinary forms of justice in that committee, than if it had been a committee on private business up stairs (cheers and laughter). The present commission, immaculate as it was, would go on like that. There were one or two points in the speech of his learned friend to which he felt it necessary to advert. His learned friend stated that the Lord Chancellor, out of delicacy to the members of the commission, and in order that it should not be supposed that he overawed them by his presence, had resolved never to attend the commission during the examination of witnesses, or except when a charge was brought against him; in short, that he was boldly resolved to meet any charge which might be brought against him. At the courage which the Lord Chancellor displayed he did not feel much surprised, for nothing certainly could be a better foundation for boldness than a consciousness of absolute security; but he thought that his learned friend was mistaken with respect to the fact, that the Lord Chancellor had never attended the examination of witnesses. He was given to understand that the examination of the first witness, who was an eminent practitioner of the court, who had just then published a letter on the subject, occupied four days. The Lord Chancellor, according to his own rule, should not have attended at all: he attended two days. The Lord Chancellor had not, therefore, exhibited that strict conformity to the rule which he had laid down, which would have been requisite to give satisfaction, supposing the rule in itself to have been of any value. If the Lord Chancellor could not trust men whom he had himself sent to inquire into his conduct, his absence from the committee might have been of some importance; but as it happened, looking at the constitution of the commission, it did not matter two straws whether he was absent or not (hear). How was that commission composed? At the head of it was the noble and learned Lord himself. He might very well declare that he would not attend the examination of witnesses, because he at the same time said, "but you must take care what you are about, for I can come down upon you at any time like a thief in the night" (a laugh). Next on the list of commissioners came the noble lord's intimate and tried friend, Lord Redesdale, who had mounted the ladder of political preferment with his lordship, always a step behind (a laugh)—who got into the office of Irish Chancellor when his noble friend got into that of English Chancellor (hear, hear). The next commissioner was the Vice-Chancellor, an officer of the noble lord's own court. Next came a noble lord, just raised to the dignity of the peerage, who owed his advancement in every respect to the favour of the Lord Chancellor. He had never seen any man raised to eminence in so extraordinary a manner as the noble lord to whom he alluded. He was seen practising at the Exchequer sessions, and three weeks after he was made Solicitor-general (a laugh). The man who had been raised in this extraordinary and unprecedented manner certainly owed a great deal to the architect of his fortunes, being in no respect the architect of them himself (laughter). He was bound to declare that the noble lord had been raised to his present eminence upon the credit of possessing abilities which he had never exhibited—he had got every thing upon tick (much laughter). All that he said of the noble lord he said at his own risk of loss and disadvantage, for he was a judge before whom he was called upon sometimes to practice; but he could, in truth, declare, that he had never spoken to any individual in his profession who did not consider the noble lord's rise the most extraordinary flight upwards, of any thing, except a balloon, which had ever been witnessed (laughter). After the noble lord had been raised to the highest point, not of royal, but of Chancellarian favour (a laugh)—after having sat for a short time in the Common Pleas (and, he believed, he was the youngest judge who had ever sat on the bench), he was, by a sort of legerdemain known only to the Lord Chancellor, advanced to the office of Master of the Rolls, the easiest of all the judicial offices. Then, as if to make assurance doubly sure, and that no latent seed of partiality should lurk in the noble lord's mind which might bias his judgment in favour of his patron, he was made a sort of Deputy Chancellor to the House of Lords, to do the Lord Chancellor's journey-work (great laughter). In order, if possible, to make this person the victim of what Horace Walpole called political gratitude, he was pointed out as the individual to whom the Lord Chancellor meant to leave his office by way of legacy. It was understood that the noble and learned lord meant to make him his legatee, by devising to him the great seal for the term of his natural life—that being the term for which it appeared that office was in future to be held (hear). The other members of the commission were the Solicitor-General, Master Cox, and several other persons who expected to be Masters (a laugh). They would be in attendance: for commissioners did not go out of the way of preferment; and though they might linger a little in the valley of the shadow, not of death, but of inquiry, they would inevitably enjoy the delights of a happy resurrection, and the learned lord, the great dispenser of official bounties, would be their staff and comforter, to bear them up against whatever public obloquy they might have to encounter. It was proposed to enquire into the conduct of the Lord Chancellor, and the noble and learned lord said, "Let me name my judge." That was granted, and the first judge he named was himself. His lordship's conduct reminded him of a ludicrous circumstance which occurred at an assizes in Westmorland. In a case of Thompson v. Jenkins, a man of the plaintiff's name got into the jury-box, but his name attracting attention, he was asked, very naturally, whether he was any relation of the plaintiff; to which he replied, "I is the plaintiff" (a laugh). Was not this just like the conduct of the Lord Chancellor? A commission was appointed to try the Lord Chancellor; Lord Eldon presented himself as first commissioner; he was asked whether he was any relation to the Lord Chancellor, and he answered at once, "I is Chancellor" (continued laughter). The judge who presided in the trial in Westmorland, requested Mr. Thompson to step out of the jury-box, and yet Mr. Thompson was as conscientious a man as the Lord Chancellor (a laugh). He had taken an oath, too, that he would well and truly try the issue joined between the parties, and a true verdict give, so help him God. The judge, however, was not willing to let Mr. Thompson do that under the sanction of an oath which the Lord Chancellor had undertaken to do without. Let no more be heard about the challenging of juries. The Chancellor's golden rule was best, for it would render the decision as speedy and satisfactory to one party, as his practice in his own court was unspeedy and unsatisfactory to all parties. He had been informed that the commission were very careful of touching upon the tender point—namely, the time which the Lord Chancellor suffered to elapse between the final hearing of a cause and the delivery of judgment upon it. For instance, where a question had been proposed to a witness on this point, the witness was desired to withdraw, the room was cleared, and the question was not repeated (hear, hear). This was the account given by the witness himself. The tone which hon. members on the opposite side of the house now adopted, was quite different from that which they had formerly held. He remembered the time when, if the system of the Court of Chancery were attacked, the Tories would have said, "For God's sake don't attack systems; they are the corner-stones of our national prosperity, the sheet-anchor of our hopes, the ground-work, the pillar, the bulwark of our laws, religion, and constitution. Defend all our systems—by all means defend them; whether it be our parliamentary system, with our rotten boroughs (cheers), our ecclesiastical system with exorbitant tithes, or our judicial system with special juries and translations of judges. Be it the profligacy of the one, the hypocrisy of the other, and the subserviency of the third, still defend them; for, depend upon it, they are right" (great applause). But now the whole of the blame was laid upon the Court of Chancery, and not any upon the Chancellor. Really the Court of Chancery had not fair play when its system was blackened, night after night, in order to screen the Lord Chancellor. Had the question ever been put to any of the witnesses, "Do you think that such or such a person could, with the assistance of a journeyman Chancellor and a Deputy Speaker of the House of Lords, do what Lord Hardwicke, Lord Thurlow, or Lord Rosslyn did without such aid?" He had seen some of the questions which had been proposed to the witnesses before the commission; one of them was—"Can any man sit more than six hours in the Court of Chancery, having his mind during that time constantly on the stretch?" The inference which it was intended should be drawn from that question was evident; but the question should have been followed by another, "Does the Lord Chancellor sit for six hours in his court every day except Sunday, with his mind on the stretch during that time?" (hear.) He hoped the commissioners would take an early opportunity of putting that question, and also of supplying other deficiencies: for instance, it was absolutely necessary that they should have the cause papers before them, which would shew at once what delay took place between the final hearing of, and the giving judgment on, causes in the Court of Chancery. Unless the commission took measures for probing the evil to the bottom, they might sit for seven times seventy days, but their labours would only be a mockery, to be equalled by nothing but the manner of their constitution. In conclusion, he must state, that he had heard no substantial objection offered to the motion, which, if agreed to, would go far to correct the evils which were complained of, but which, if frustrated by a ministerial majority, would nevertheless have the opinion of all the people of England in its favour (hear).

Dr. Lushington rose to state, that the commission had taken particular pains to ascertain the causes of the delay which intervened between the final hearing of causes and the delivery of judgment.

Mr. Tindal believed the report of the commission would be presented previously to the commencement of the next session of parliament (hear, hear). He could see no good purpose that would be answered by agreeing to the present motion. The measure now proposed, would place the commission in a dilemma: as soon as the evidence was produced, they would be overwhelmed with communications from all quarters, some to contradict, and others to affirm, the statements which it contained. They would thus be left in the inconvenient situation of being compelled to reject what would be called important additional facts; or else they must go on receiving fresh evidence, without knowing when they might come to a termination. And for these reasons he should give his decided opposition to the motion before the house.

Mr. Canning was desirous to state the grounds upon which his vote would be given. Throughout the whole speech of the learned member for Winchelsea, able and entertaining as it had been, there ran one grand misapprehension, which practically destroyed its value. The learned gent. seemed to imagine that the commission had been instituted as a criminal inquiry into the conduct of the Chancellor; whereas no one in the house had ever voted for it with any such view, nor was it to any such purpose that the commissioners had acted. In former times the learned gent. said, the custom had been, to attack not systems but men; but now, as he took it, that practice was reversed, for the house screened the individual, and gave up the system; but, without desiring to screen any individual, he (Mr. C.) had understood that the peculiar object of the commission which was sitting, was to inform the house whether it was the man or the system that deserved to be reprobated. The learned member set out by assuming that the fault was in the individual, and actually complained of the commissioners because they had not proceeded directly in furtherance of his theory. Now, from all that had been stated by the members of the commission themselves, it was clear that they shrunk from the investigation. The course of their inquiry had been described by the learned member for Ilchester; nor could it be doubted that in their hands the error of the Court of Chancery, whatever it was, would be brought before the house. And then it was that the speech of the learned member for Winchelsea would be in its proper place—if the house, upon the report of the commission as to the existence of the evil, refused to adopt the necessary measures to remove it. In the same way the learned member's dissection of the commission was spirited and powerful—taking it to be a commission set up expressly to criminate Lord Eldon; but if it had been instituted in order to inquire impartially whether the system was right or wrong, it ceased to be open to those objections which the hon. and learned member took to it. For whatever purpose, however, the commission had been intended, it was clear that to agree to the vote proposed was to destroy its efficacy. After the 70 days which the commissioners had sat, if this vote were carried, it could not sit even a 71st day with any prospect of advantage to the country. To what purpose then could it tend to put an end to an enquiry already so far advanced; and, in doing so, to throw imputation upon the characters of men who, in their individual stations, were known to be of the highest credit, and who certainly, in their collective capacity, lost none of their personal respectability? Was it to avoid delay that the house was asked to take this course—to put an end to all that the commission had already effected—and to start afresh at the conclusion of a session, when to find time even for printing the evidence, and putting it into the hands of members, was impossible? In answer to the call for any such proceeding, the house had a pledge from the members of the commission itself.

Certainly, if that pledge was not redeemed—if the report was not forthcoming at the time when it was promised—he did not know that, as an honest man, he could then resist the adoption of some other measures. At present, however, it was impossible for him to doubt the assurance which the house had received—that the report of the commission would be upon the table, in due course, as early as, even supposing the evidence to be produced now, any proceeding could be taken upon it. As to the progress which the commission had made, or the effect of the inquiries into which it had entered, he should at present rest silent, because the subject was one upon which he was not informed. It was with a view of being informed that he desired to see the evidence which had been taken before the commission, together with the inferences which in the report would be drawn from that evidence, and the recommendations with which it would be accompanied. How far he might agree in those inferences or be inclined to adopt those recommendations, it was impossible for him to say; but being ignorant, as he was, of the practice of the Court of Chancery, an ignorance which he shared, he believed, with the great majority of those persons whom the learned member opposite wished to take the arrangement of it into their own hands, he looked to be enlightened by the report of men whom he believed capable of instructing him. The advanced and valuable labours, therefore, of such men, he was not disposed very lightly to throw away; nor, placing, as he did, the highest confidence in their integrity and zeal, would he be party to a vote which went to consign their characters to infamy.

The house then divided, when the numbers were—For the motion, 73—Against it, 154—Majority, 81.

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 20.—Earl Grosvenor presented a petition complaining that the petitioner had been kept out of an annuity bequeathed to him by the Duke of Queensberry, and had received no interest upon it.

The Lord Chancellor had no objection to receiving the petition. He conceived it entitled to their lordships' consideration, and he was glad that it was brought before them, as it gave him an opportunity of shewing their lordships how little reason there was for many of the complaints which were made against the delays of the Court of Chancery. The late Duke of Queensberry left immense property, but had left it more involved than any he ever recollected. There were estates let out to lease, on which large premiums had been taken, and the question as to the legality of these leases had first to be decided. There was a great number of similar questions, which were all to be tried before the Court of Sessions in Scotland; and before the Court of Chancery could move one step, it was obliged to keep in its hands assets to meet the various demands which might arise on the property from these litigated claims. It was not possible to know the amount of these claims, and till they were all settled in the other Courts, it was impossible for the Court of Chancery to proceed. In this case, the Court had done whatever was in its power; he would even say, that it had done more than ever had been done in any similar case. It had called on the tenants to whom the farms had been let, to state the amount of their claim, whichever way the question concerning their leases might be decided. All that could be safely paid out, was paid by order of the Court from time to time. In fact, the payments had been accelerated more than in any other case. He would stake his credit and character, that not a single respectable Counsel could be found who would not say more had been done in this case than any Judge ever before was known to do. As to the rule of Court complained of, that was a rule over which the Judge had no power. It was part of the law, and he could not alter it. If it were to be brought under discussion, he must say that more argument must be addressed to his mind than his noble friend had yet brought forward to justify an alteration. He could only for the present say, that the rule complained of had been established by some of the ablest men who ever sat in the Court, and none of their successors had yet thought it possible to go on without adhering to it. Whatever delays might be imputed to the Court of Chancery in other cases, in the case brought before their Lordships by this petition, the conduct of that Court had been praiseworthy.

Earl Grosvenor thought it remarkable that this case, which the learned lord regarded as the most favourable for the Court of Chancery, had been standing for ten years without a decision.

The Lord Chancellor declared that there had been much clamour and calumny on the subject of proceedings in Chancery—not by persons who meant ill, but by persons who did not well consider the consequences of what they talked about. If any of their lordships thought the rule of law with respect to the non-payment of interest wrong, they might propose to alter it; but his answer to any proposition of that kind would be, that he thought the rule right. It was impossible to know whether a person was entitled to interest or not when it was not ascertained whether he could be paid the principal. Much had been said about common law and common law lawyers, but if there was any lawyer who would say that this country could go on without a Court of the nature of the Court of Chancery, he would say that their lordships might send him to the Old Bailey, and put him to death.

The petition was laid on the table.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 27.—Mr. Berrill presented a petition from Frances Helligar, complaining of the grievous and intolerable oppression and delay of Chancery proceedings. The petitioner was a widow, reduced to pauperism, in the Greenwich workhouse, although her husband left £400l. and more, to her, in 1809, of which 300l. had been claimed by his creditors, and 1,100l. wasted by a common proceeding in Chancery for the distribution of the effects; while she, at the age of seventy-eight, was now in prison because she could not pay 35l. the expense of an attachment under which she had been taken for not delivering up deeds which were not in her possession. He had hitherto abstained from taking part in the discussion upon Chancery abuses, but it was not because he was ignorant of them; on the contrary, he could speak with certainty of the abuses of the practice in the master's office, which were too expensive and dilatory to be countenanced by any persons, the masters themselves not excepted.

Mr. Peel said that he would take care that the substance of the petition should be referred to the commissioners of inquiry. He admitted that the evils complained of were considerable.

Writs of Error.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.—Mr. Peel said, that the bill which he was going to ask leave to introduce into the house was the first fruits of that liberal provision which it had recently made on behalf of the judges of the land. The object of his present bill was to throw an impediment in the way of writs of error, sued out only for the purpose of delay. A writ of error was an appeal from the judgment of the court, and superseded it for a considerable time. In the Court of King's Bench, as well as in the Court of Common Pleas, any individual had the power of suspending a judgment by suing out one of those writs, which was granted as a matter of course. It was found in consequence of the inquiries instituted by the commission to inquire into the abuses of Courts of Justice, that the number of writs of error, in the years 1817, 1818, and 1819, received in the Exchequer Chamber from the Court of King's Bench, was 1,197. Out of these 1,197 writs of error, 158 were never prosecuted at all; in 336 the proceedings were abandoned; in 702 of them the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was affirmed, and only in one of them was it reversed. Out of the whole number there were only nine cases in which the parties thought proper to argue the grounds on which they had appealed, and in eight of them the argument was clearly against them. The delay which these proceedings had created to the suitor in obtaining his judgment was about a year in each case, and was an evil of such a magnitude as called loudly upon the house for redress. On each of these writs the chief officer of the Court was entitled to certain fees; but in consequence of the arrangement which had recently been made, these fees would cease to be paid to that officer and would be carried over to the consolidated fund for the benefit of the public. By an act passed in the reign of James I., a check had been put upon frivolous appeals to the House of Lords; and he now intended, by a similar provision, to put an end to frivolous appeals to the other Courts of Justice. His bill would provide, that every party suing out a writ of error, should enter into recognizances for the payment of twice the amount of debt, or damages, already found against him: so that hereafter any person suing out such a writ, would do it at his own peril, and would therefore take care that he had a valid point on which to object to the existing judgment. He concluded by asking leave to bring in a bill to prevent the practice of suing out frivolous writs of error.—Leave granted; after which,

The bill was read a first time.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.—Mr. Peel moved that a clause be added to the Writs of Error bill, authorising the crown to appoint commissioners to report on the amount of fees received, and to award to the present holders a just compensation for them during the term of their natural lives.

Lord Clive did not rise to object to the clause, but to mention the case of an hon. friend of his (Mr. Kenyon), the second son of the late Lord

Kenyon, who would be utterly deprived of the fees from which he derived his income by the operation of the present measure.

Mr. Peel said that public reforms ought not to interfere with the rights of individuals, but compensation must be given with a due regard to the interests of the public. If the fees to be lost were legal fees, he was perfectly ready to allow such compensation as the commissioner under the circumstances should think fairly due.—The house went into the committee, when, on the motion of Mr. Peel, a resolution was agreed to, for the compensation of certain officers whose incomes were affected by the operation of the bill.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.—Mr. Peel moved the order of the day for going into a Committee upon the Writs of Error bill.

On the question that the Speaker should leave the chair,

Mr. J. Williams said, that he approved of the principles of the bill, but he thought it might be carried much further. In cases where persons sued out Writs of Error needlessly, and put the other party to expence, the Court should be allowed to award something more than taxed costs, and to double and treble them! He wished also to have a remedy provided against the putting in of sham pleas. He knew not whether the right hon. gent. clearly understood this part of the subject, and he felt that he was treading on the most ticklish and delicate part of his (Mr. W.'s) trade or profession, call it which they would, in maintaining it. What he meant by a sham plea, was a plea put in only to gain time; such for instance, as that the plaintiff had accepted a horse in satisfaction of the debt, or that judgment had been entered up in the action, when, in point of fact, the horse and the judgment were mere fictions of the imagination. In all such cases he would give to the Court the power of apportioning costs to the circumstances of the case.

Mr. Secretary Peel thanked the learned member for his suggestion; but he feared that in the first instance it would throw an obstruction in the way of appeals. With respect to the case of sham pleas, he wished for further information on the subject, and then, perhaps, it would be best to provide against them, by a separate enactment.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for the second reading of the Writs of Error bill. He thought it a disgrace to the law of England, that people could allow judgment to go by default, and then take out a writ of error to delay execution. A different course had already been followed in the county Palatine of Lancaster with the greatest benefit.

The Lord Chancellor did not deny that these writs were a great evil; but he was afraid the abolition of them would produce a greater evil than they caused. If persons could now allow judgment to go by default, and afterwards stay execution by writs of error, those persons who had heretofore adopted this mode of gaining time would now plead the general issue. This would cause more delay and expence to the plaintiffs than the other mode of proceeding, and this bill would probably saddle the plaintiffs with greater expence. He did not say, however, that some general measure should not be passed to compel those who allowed judgment to go by default, and then sued out a writ of error, to follow up their writ. He thought before the present measure was adopted, some other step ought to be taken to forbid all sham pleas. He spoke, he believed, in this respect, the opinions of the greatest lawyers of the age.—The bill was then read a second time, and was, after certain amendments, ultimately passed.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 1.—On the motion of Mr. Peel, the Lords' amendments to the Writs of Error bill were taken into consideration.

In answer to a question from Mr. Hume,

Mr. Peel stated, that he had, in conformity with the address of that house, recommended to his Majesty the appointment of commissioners to revise the statute book. At the same time, he did not look upon that as the best mode of effecting so desirable an object. He himself meant to proceed as he had begun, in consolidating the law upon different subjects (hear). Next session he hoped to be able to introduce a measure for the consolidation of the statutes relating to larceny and several other offences.—The amendments were then agreed to.

Consolidation of Jury Laws.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1.—Mr. Peel, in moving for leave to bring in his bill to consolidate the laws relative to juries, dwelt upon the advantage of uniting masses of statutes into one clear and intelligible law. There were at present no less than 85 statutes which, in one way or other, had reference to the subject of juries. Some of these acts bore titles under which no such matter ever would be looked for. One related to the recovery of small debts, and lands held in coparcenary; another to the building goals and preventing apothecaries from filling certain parish offices; another to prohibiting the exportation of leather; some were expired; some in force;

"Mortua quiescit jurebat corpora vivis;" in fact, they were so numerous and so various, that no one but a lawyer—and scarce he—could fail to be puzzled by them. In consolidating these laws, there were some which it would be found advisable to repeal, as, the laws relating to attain, which affixed penalties to juries giving an improper verdict. The denouncement against this offence was of such a character as hardly to be credited. The jurors were to lose their liberam legem, to forfeit their goods and chattels, and to be imprisoned; their wives and children were to be cast out of doors; their houses to be razed, their trees to be rooted up. It was true that this statute had not been put in force for 200 years; but an attempt had been made of late years to revive the wager of battle, when the legislature, seeing the absurdity of the law, had wisely abolished it; it was therefore advisable to get rid of the law of attain, because it was just possible that an attempt might be made to revive it in the same way. Alterations of terms in those laws which were to continue to exist would be made with great nicety and caution; the old phraseology would be every where preserved, unless where it was contradictory or absurd. The substantial changes proposed in the law relative to juries might be divided under two heads—those peculiar to common, and those affecting special juries. With respect to common juries, the first change would be in the manner of making out the lists. At present, the lists in all the parishes were made out by the petty constable—an individual frequently incapable of reading or writing; and sometimes a little open to corruption: he was, in fact, the arbiter as to who should, or should not, serve upon juries within his domain. In this way it frequently happened—the fact was notorious—that the richest and best qualified man in a parish escaped; while those who were poorer, less competent, and less able to spare time to perform the duty, were unfairly added with it. His present intention was, that the churchwarden or overseer should make the list in all places where such an officer existed; where they could not be found, the constable must continue to reign; but a more distinct account of the names, qualifications, and residences of persons than had heretofore been given, would be demanded. A distinct petty session would also be assembled to discuss the appeals of persons who thought themselves unfairly called on, or omitted. With respect to the special juries, it was intended, first, to extend the list of persons qualified to serve in counties. Instead of taking, as at present, only esquires, all persons described as merchants or bankers—as in the city of London—would be eligible. The old system was full of inconvenience. It had happened but a few years since in a political trial (that of Major Cartwright), that while the special jury struck was necessarily to consist of 48 names, there were but 54, exclusive of those serving on the grand jury (and who found the bill), in all the county.—With regard to the manner of striking special juries—a plan was devised which he hoped would give universal satisfaction. His proposal was, that the name of every special juror, either in London, Westminster, or in the counties, should be entered in a book, with the place of his residence, and a description of his rank and quality. The list in this book should be alphabetical, and to each juror's name there should be a number, as 1, 2, 3, &c. Then the number of all these jurors should be written upon different cards; those cards should be put into a glass or box, and 48 of them should be drawn successively, from the whole number, by some person regularly appointed. The 48 gentlemen thus ballotted were to be the jury to try the cause, and they were to be reduced to 24 in the ordinary way (hear, hear). This was to be the general practice, and in all political cases, the invariable one. In civil and commercial cases, it was proposed to allow an occasional deviation. Parties agreeing to have their jury selected in the old way, might accomplish that object by sending their joint consent, in writing, to the proper officer. In civil cases also, a jury selected to try the cause of two parties, might be allowed, upon consent, to try the causes of others. If the course proposed were found beneficial as regarded the law of juries, he hoped that the principle of revision and consolidation would not stop at that point. It was impossible to look at the condition of our Statute Book, without feeling that a great diminution might be effected in the mass of matter which it contained. He was not disposed to be hasty; but would try the effect of alteration by degrees (hear, hear). The criminal code ought to be first looked at, for it was most important that the subject should know what was the law which he was called upon to obey. The laws with respect to forgery abounded with anomalies, and needed great consideration. In the statutes against larceny also, he thought a great reform might be effected. Formally, there would be no difficulty as to the going into an inquiry of this description. An address had some time since been presented to the Crown, praying the appointment of a commission for the purpose, and that address might be proceeded upon. The matter, as regarded the juries, he had looked into very narrowly, and had been assisted in so doing by persons of more competency than himself; but if the experiment were generally to be proceeded in, he thought the appointment of a commission would be the better way. The inquiry wanted would necessarily be of a very minute and laborious description; such as it was scarcely possible, in these times, that the Lord Chancellor or the Attorney-General could find time for. At present, however, his object was confined to the law of juries, in which he was quite sure a great deal of alteration was desirable. The rt. hon. gent. concluded by moving for leave to bring in “a bill to regulate and consolidate the laws relative to juries.”

Dr. Lushington highly approved of the principles of the rt. hon. Sec.'s proposed measure. The alteration intended in the law of juries would be most beneficial; and the commission suggested generally should have his cordial support. The first point, however, was to consolidate: alterations must be made with great caution, and only step by step. It would be very material, also, that the existing forms of the statutes should be preserved as far as possible, in order that decided cases might not be unnecessarily interfered with.

Mr. Hume felt that the country was indebted to the rt. hon. Sec.; but he wished that in the course of the intended alteration the common law could be placed upon some fixed system; for at present he considered it as tantamount to no law at all.

Mr. Peel suggested, that it would be almost impertinent to enact the common law by statute at this time of day. Who would think of passing a law now, to say that juries must be unanimous in their decision, or that they must be formed of twelve persons each?

Mr. Bright wished to introduce a clause to prevent the separation of juries until they came to a decision. Great inconvenience had already arisen from a contrary practice. He would not allow a jury to be discharged, even with the consent of the parties.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

FRIDAY, MAY 30.—Mr. Peel rose to move the order of the day for the re-commitment of this bill. He briefly stated its objects, as upon the motion for leave to bring it in, adding, that it was proposed to extend considerably the qualifications of those who might be called upon to administer the law as jurors. A vast number who were not qualified as the law now stood, would be rendered liable to serve. Thus all leaseholders to the amount of 50*l.* per ann. for 21 years, would be now qualified, instead of the qualification being confined, as at present, to those who had a freehold of 5*l.* a year. Another object was, to remedy the inconvenience occasioned by a challenge to the array, because there was not a knight among the number. This was a very inconvenient enactment; and he proposed to repeal it. It was also intended to repeal that part of the present law which required, in many cases, that so many jurors should be returned from the same hundred. Justice was more likely to be administered with strict impartiality where men were chosen from different parts.

Mr. Scariatt offered his sincere applause to the rt. hon. gent. for the introduction of this most useful measure. It was of the utmost importance that the trial by jury should be made as perfect as possible. One of the greatest blessings resulting from the free constitution of this country was, that the people had, as jurors, the administration of the laws in their own hands, and were thus in a great degree the distributors of the punishment with which the infraction of those laws were visited.

Mr. Brougham observed, that that part of the bill which went to alter the present mode of selecting special juries, more particularly in crown cases, would produce the best results; for a selection, though made with the most scrupulous impartiality, would still leave a suspicion not favourable to the due administration of justice. Indeed, when this subject was first mooted, about three years ago, the Master of the Crown-office had declared, that there was no person to whom the proposed alteration would afford more satisfaction than to himself. He (Mr. B.) hoped that the passing of this bill would be a useful lesson to those who were so wedded to the system of things as they are, as to be seriously alarmed at even the mention of any change. He remembered the well-known case a few years ago, in which the present mode of selecting special juries was objected to, and in which it was urged that the power of the returning officer to run over the list, and mark off a name here and a name there, skipping over several names in each interval, was, to say the least of it, a power liable to abuse—in that case it was gravely held, by those to whom he alluded, that such a mode was the best of all possible modes of returning special juries. Now, however, he hoped their eyes would be opened by this act of the legislature, and that they would at length admit, that things as they are might possibly be improved.

The question was then put, and the bill went through a committee.

Mr. Peel, on moving the third reading of the bill, wished to add one clause—that nothing in it should affect any privileges of parliament. The reason of this addition was, that as the law now stood, no member of Parliament could be called upon to serve on a jury during the continuance of the session; and he thought that it would be wise to leave that part of the law just as it was.

The clause in question was then added; after which the bill was read a third time and passed.

Consolidation of Acts relating to the Customs:—Prevention of Smuggling.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.—The house having resolved itself into a committee,

Mr. Harries stated, that this was one of the bills which his Majesty's government had felt it necessary to bring forward, for the purpose of condensing, into a comparatively small compass, the laws relating to the customs. The whole of the laws, which would be abrogated by this and several other bills, amounting altogether to twelve, amounted to not less than 500 (hear). There were some new points connected with this bill which he deemed it necessary to state to the committee. The first related to foreign smuggling. Formerly vessels belonging in the whole or in part to his Majesty's subjects, or whereof half the persons on board were subjects of this realm, were, if suspected of being employed on a smuggling expedition, liable to be seized if found within eight leagues of the coast between North Foreland, in Kent, and Beachy Head, in Sussex. It was now provided, that four leagues should be substituted for eight. As much observation had taken place with respect to the right of searching individuals on their arrival in this country from foreign parts, it was proposed to be enacted, that every person challenged with having contraband goods on his or her person, should have the right of requiring the revenue-officer to take him or her before a justice of peace, or before his superior officer, where he should make oath that he had a reasonable ground for his suspicion, before the liberty to search should be granted; and, in order still more effectually to guard the subject, it was provided, that if it appeared that the revenue officer had frivolously or unnecessarily detained the person so brought before the justice of peace, or superior officer, to be searched, he should be subject to a penalty. Under the act of the 9th of Geo. I. persons skulking, under suspicious circumstances, within five miles of the shore, were liable to be taken into custody. It was now provided, that if it appeared to the magistrate, that a person taken into custody on the alleged ground of skulking near the shore for the purpose of assisting in smuggling, had been arrested vexatiously and unnecessarily, that the officer so conducting himself should also be liable to a penalty.

On reading the clause relative to the capture of vessels within four leagues of the coast between the North Foreland and Beachy Head,

Dr. Lushington observed that if this country assumed such a right of search on her shores, other states would insist on a similar right with respect to theirs, and much trouble and inconvenience would probably arise. This had been the case very recently with Sweden. He knew not how Great Britain could refuse to other nations this right of search, while such a law remained on her statute-book.

The Attorney-General said, that the same principle was pursued by France, at this moment, both in Europe and the West Indies. If a vessel were seen lying off the shore, without any apparent pretext for remaining in that position, and were found to contain spirits or other contraband goods, slang in a particular way, would his learned friend say that circumstances of this kind would not justify a seizure?

Mr. Denman objected to the principle of the bill, because it went far beyond that which appeared to him to be just and fair. They were told that, to justify seizure, half the crew, in some instances, must be British subjects. Huddos and Lascars were British subjects. Did they come under the operation of this clause? They were told of a new clause, to prevent persons from being unnecessarily searched. The officer, if it appeared that he acted from improper motives, was to be subjected to a penalty; but it was clear that very few penalties would be recovered. The officer, in almost every instance, would be more or less connected with the magistrate, and unless the case was of the most glaring description, would escape unpunished. Where an action was brought for improper seizure, if the judge certified that the seizure was made with reasonable and probable cause, the claim of the plaintiff was cut down, after all his trouble and vexation, to 2d. damages and 2d. costs.

The 35th clause, empowering Custom-house officers to search the persons of individuals on board ships coming from foreign parts, was opposed.

Mr. B. Gordon objected to this clause. The loss which the revenue would sustain by giving up this personal search would be very trifling, and it was an interference with the liberty of the subject, and a violation of female delicacy peculiarly offensive.

Mr. Herries said that the loss to the revenue, if their right were given up, would be enormous. It would then be understood that every body, upon his own person, was to have the liberty of smuggling to any extent he thought proper. It was peculiarly desirable that the law should be clearly defined.

Mr. Huskisson said that there were persons, well known upon the coast, who made a regular livelihood by smuggling goods concealed about their persons.

Mr. Hume thought the practice of search, especially as it applied to females, disgraceful.

Mr. G. Lamb said, ladies might obviate the inconveniences by staying at home.

The clause was postponed, and the chairman then reported progress.

Apothecaries' Act.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 23.—Mr. Brougham moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend an act of the 55th year of the late King, for regulating the practice of the apothecaries in England and Wales. A great inconvenience had been found to arise from the manner in which the bill had been framed, although in its principle it was highly beneficial. Under the present act, an apothecary could neither recover payment of his bill, nor defend a qui tam action, which might be brought against him for penalties, without bringing into court some person to prove the handwriting of the Warden and Examiner of the Apothecaries' Company on the certificate, which was his licence for practising. The learned gent. proposed to make the seal of the Company evidence in all cases, guarding against the possibility of that seal being forged, by providing for the punishment of persons committing such a fraud. It happened that men frequently came from Scotland and Ireland, to settle in London, who were as well qualified to practise as those who had been licensed by the Apothecaries' Company. He proposed therefore to extend to persons who had been properly examined by the universities of Dublin, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, the same privileges as were possessed by those who had received the certificate of the London Apothecaries. The other Scotch Universities, owing to the laxity of their practice with respect to examinations, could not at present be included in the bill consistently with a due regard for the public safety. If the sum of 15*l.* were transmitted to Aberdeen, or St. Andrew's College, the diploma of which it was the price was regularly transmitted by the post. This practice he regretted, because it added little to the revenues of those colleges, while it dispirited them of that reputation which they derived from their predecessors, among whom had been some very eminent men.—Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Attornies' Clerks Bill.

LORDS, TUESDAY, MARCH 22.—Lord Ellenborough presented a petition from certain attornies, and clerks, against the attornies' clerks bill. By the existing law, a duty of 12*l.* was paid on the articles when persons entered as attornies, and this duty was required to be paid within six months. A bill, however, had been brought in, by which persons who had not paid the duty, though articulated five years ago, might, if they paid the duty previously to the 1st of July next, obtain the same advantages as those who had regularly complied with the law. The petitioners opposed the bill, both on public and private grounds—on public, because the number of attornies was already sufficient—on private, because it was not just that persons who had failed to obey the law should be placed on an equal footing with those who had scrupulously observed it.

Naturalization Oaths.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.—Lord Melville rose to move the second reading of a bill for amending the law relative to the oaths taken on naturalization and on reversal of attainder. According to the law as it now stood, foreigners naturalized, or subjects restored to honours, were obliged to appear at the bar of the house to be sworn, and to have taken the sacrament according to the forms of the church of England. It was understood at the Union that no test should be required of the natives of Scotland; but, notwithstanding the stipulation on that subject, the law had since been differently interpreted, so that the great age of the Earl of Mar could not excuse him from coming to that house, and he was obliged to comply with the usual practice of taking the test. It was very unreasonable that the sacramental test should be required of natives of Scotland, or of foreign Calvinists on being naturalized. He thought it would be sufficient if the law provided that the person naturalized was a Protestant, without inquiring whether he belonged to the church of England or any other sect. With regard to cases of restoration and reversal of attainder, it might often be a great hardship on persons to require their attendance at the bar of their lordships' house. A case of this kind had occurred, with respect to a young officer (Mr. Fitzgerald) who was obliged to appear and take the test, before he could enjoy the advantage of the restoration, though he was in the public service, and in a situation on account of which their lordships would have been disposed to extend indulgence to him. He therefore proposed that the necessity of appearing at the bar in cases of sickness, bodily infirmities, and under some other circumstance, should be done away with; the object of his bill was to provide, that in such cases it might be referred to a committee of their lordships to see whether the requisite oaths had been taken, and all that the law required complied with elsewhere.

The bill was read a second time.

FRIDAY, APRIL 22.—Lord Holland rose to bring in a bill to prevent the consequences of attainder for high treason, and other crimes mentioned in it, from extending to the heirs of the offenders, or to their properties and titles, and to confine them to the persons of the offenders themselves. The object of the bill, was to confine the consequences of the attainder of persons for certain crimes to themselves, and not extend them, as they were now extended, to their families and descendants. In one sense, the bill would revive two acts of parliament, viz. 7th Ann. c. 2. and 17th Geo. II. c. 39. In another sense, however, the bill would repeal the 39th Geo. III. c. 93. He should therefore move that those acts be read, pro forma, and that the bill be printed. He should give timely notice when it was his intention to move the second reading.—The acts mentioned by the noble lord were accordingly read, pro forma.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.—Lord Holland, after the act of Queen Anne, and the subsequent statutes relative to attainder, had been read, proceeded to call the attention of their lordships to the bill he had introduced. In submitting the motion for the second reading of this bill, though convinced that it was founded on sound principles, and called for by a regard to good faith, he still thought some apology necessary for his undertaking to bring the measure forward. He was conscious that he was attempting to procure the alteration of a law of which some of the greatest and best men had in vain endeavoured to procure the repeal. The subject had occupied the attention of Lord Somers, Dr. Burnet, Blackstone, and Sir Samuel Romilly. If the interests of the people of Scotland, the influence of their peers in their lordships' house, and their representatives in the other, had as yet brought about no change of this law, it might be considered presumptuous in him, unaided by any authority, and standing there alone, to expect to accomplish so great an object. But he was induced to make the attempt by a train of circumstances and appearances in the times, which led him to conclude that the present was the most favourable moment which could be chosen for an experiment of a liberal kind. Several reasons concurred to support him in this opinion. Through two successive sessions their lordships had been most laudably occupied in amending the law of Scotland; they had also been employed in reversing attainders; and it was needless for him to remind their lordships, that there was no longer any competitor for the crown: the chief ground on which the apology for the law of attainder had been rested did not now exist. All these reasons induced him to think the present the fittest time, in which he could submit to their lordships such a proposition as that which was contained in the bill he had introduced. Still, however, he wished that one better qualified to do justice to the subject, and who would have had more weight with their lordships, had undertaken the task. The noble viscount opposite (Lord Melville) knew the sincerity with which he spoke, when he said that he would have wished that noble viscount to have taken this business upon himself. He had, indeed, that night brought forward a measure which, though affording no direct argument in support of the bill now before their lordships, shewed some of the cruel consequences which had been occasioned by the laws it was now proposed to repeal. The object of the present bill was not to lessen the punishment of offenders, but to confine punishment to the guilty. It was brought forward to afford a shelter to the innocent. It was not founded on any morbid sensibility opposed to the punishment of crimes. Its effect, if it should be adopted, would merely be to restore to Scotland what once was the law of the country, and to which that nation had been strongly attached. It would bring the general principle of the law into effect; for the general principle was, that the consequences of attainder should not affect the descendants of any criminal except in cases of treason and murder: he wished only to abolish the exception to the general rule. He knew he should be opposed by that bugbear, the dread of innovation. He did not wish to condemn a proper repugnance to innovation; but whatever reason there might be for resisting measures on that ground, no such reason could apply to the present bill. In principle, the proposition had received the sanction of their lordships' predecessors. But it might be said that a measure which appeared reasonable in itself might be attended by great inconvenience, in consequence of the inconsistency to which it would give birth. But neither the objection of innovation nor inconsistency could be sustained. With regard to Scotland, the measure could not be innovation, for it was a restoration; it would remove an anomaly in the law of that country, which, if suffered to remain, might be attended with very serious consequences to the rights of succession. With regard to England, it was surely impossible to give the name of innovation to a measure which parliament had, during the last century, wished to adopt, and had only not carried into execution on account of the existence of a particular party. The principle, however, had been sanctioned, and that sanction was recorded on the statute book. The forfeiture of entailed estates, and corruption of blood, was done away in all cases except those of the attainder now under consideration. The adoption of the measure he proposed would, therefore, contribute to render the law consistent and uniform. The noble and learned lord on the woolsack could not, he thought, object to the measure either on the ground of innovation or consistency, for he had prevailed on their lordships to do away that most ancient practice according to which their jurisdiction used to be exercised—a practice more ancient than the woolsack on which the noble and learned lord was seated—and to delegate the hearing of appeals to a few of their lordships. He had also consented to the doing away the trial by battle in cases of murder. Why had the noble and learned lord done so? Because public convenience required the former alteration; and because in the latter case the law was not suitable to the times, because the people of England, for whose interest the practice must have been established, had now better means of obtaining justice. If the same principle were applied in the present case, his motion could not be rejected. The law of attainder and corruption of blood was felt to be as objectionable in Scotland, that the parliament of that country in the reign of James II., with them James VII., enacted the law of entail as an indemnification against the law of attainder. He had the authority of one of the most eminent men in Scotland, and one of those best acquainted with the effect and operation of the laws in his time—he meant Lord Perceval—for saying, that in 1745, the great inducement of the people who adhered to the cause of the Pretender was to obtain some alleviation of the law by which entails were attained and destroyed. Bishop Burnet said, that at the Union it was intended to have introduced a provision respecting this law, but that the Scotch steadily refused to be deprived of the immunity which they had always before enjoyed from so cruel and unjust a regulation. In the year 1709, an act was passed for improving the act of Union with Scotland, and in this it was attempted to extend the law respecting corruption of blood to that country. But this attempt was opposed, as contrary to reason, and justice, and humanity. In the valuable memoirs which Bishop Burnet had left, this was distinctly stated; and even in the House of Lords the venerable Earl Cowper, and the upright Lord Somers, had not scrupled to recognize the principle, although they had supported the bill on the ground of existing danger—treason being then actually affiant. That act passed into a law, but there was a protest entered on the journals of the house, signed by twenty persons, of whom there were thirteen or fourteen out of the sixteen, representative peers of Scotland. It then went down to the House of Commons, where the Scotchmen and Englishmen who composed it, and who seldom agreed in any thing, united to oppose it, and added a clause providing an immunity in both countries from the operation of the law of attainder and corruption of blood. In those days the House of Lords did not think it wise or prudent to treat with contempt the voice and the wishes of the people of England, expressed through their representatives. They judiciously acquiesced in the clause, under certain modifications, and thus the law stood, making those crimes high treason in Scotland which were so in England, and that forfeiture and corruption of blood should continue until the death of the Pretender. The case with respect to Scotland stood thus:—Originally that country was exempted from the law of attainder and corruption of blood: after the Union this law was extended to it, and though subsequently suspended, was reproduced in 1715 and 1745, when the Pretender put forward his claims. This, however, was not done without considerable opposition; and Lord Hardwicke, who introduced the measure, admitted that it was only to be justified on the ground of then existing circumstances. Those circumstances existed no longer; all the objections which might have been urged to the measure he now proposed were at an end, and it came recommended to their lordships upon every principle of justice as well as of expediency. The opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone was decidedly in favour of that which he had now ventured to express, although that learned judge quoted, in the course of his discussion, a passage from one of the epistles of Cicero*, and the Treatise of Mr. Chas. Yorke on the law of forfeiture, both of which were opposed to his own views. It was whimsical enough that neither of those quotations would now be received as authorities against the opinion of our great English jurist, because it was doubted whether the epistle which contained the quotation was really written by Cicero; and Mr. Yorke's treatise was denied to be law. He feared he had unnecessarily wearied their lordships by alluding to the authorities on the subject, for, even if they had all been against him, still, upon every principle of justice, of humanity, of sound policy, and of prudence, he hoped to induce their lordships to adopt the bill before them. He believed he could prove, and but that the house was already wearied he would attempt to do so, that the whole course of history showed that the effect of the cruel laws which he wished to see repealed was rather to create than to repress treasons. In a neighbouring country the effect of a confiscation, which had not, indeed, been adopted by any legislative authority, but by an universal revolution, was now felt and seen, and demonstrated upon a large scale what must necessarily be the result of such circumstances. The Bourbons, with all the advantages of their legitimacy and the other advantages, legitimate or not, which they possessed, found the kingdom over which they ruled in a state of such discord and disaffection, that their utmost efforts were necessary to prevent actual disturbance; and this was produced merely by the struggle and jarring between that part of the nation who had lost their property, and that part who had gained it. It was enough, however, for an English House of Lords to know, that the principle of the bill which he had brought in was one which was implanted more strongly in the heart of man than perhaps any other—that the innocent should not be punished for the crimes of the guilty (cheers.) He concluded by moving the second reading of the bill.

Lord Colchester said, that as the bill before the house went to repeal one which he had submitted to the other House of Parliament, and which had been passed twenty-six years ago, he would trouble their lordships with a few words upon it. With respect to the principle, that he understood to be one which had been recognized and adopted in almost every civilized nation and in almost every age. In times of political trouble men would always be found who would not scruple to risk their own lives upon any hazard which might hold out a sufficient temptation to their ambition, and it was only by involving in the consequences of their doing so interests which were dearer to them than their own, that such security as the general interests of society demanded could be obtained. This principle had at least always been acted upon in this country. With respect to the facts connected with the history of this law, he only felt it necessary to observe, that the whole question had come under discussion at the time of the Union; that then, and subsequently, it had undergone the examination of many eminent men, all of whom agreed in its political justice and its expediency. Sir M. Foster said, speaking of this statute, it was highly reasonable that such a law should not be suffered to expire. It was the best, if not the only means of preventing the commission of the crimes against which it was directed; and by the strong ties of domestic affection, to arrest the mad career of desperate ambition. If the object of the bill had been to alter the law as it affected some of the minor offences with which attainder had at present coupled, he would not have opposed it; but in its present shape, and applying as it did to high treason, he could not bring himself to approve of it. He therefore moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read that day six months.

The Earl of Roxbury supported the bill. The existing law was, he insisted, a direct breach of the 18th article of the Union. Even if it were thought right still to continue the law in England, where it had of old been the law of the land, yet the act of 1799 ought not to exist in Scotland, because it was an innovation upon the law of that country, and had been forced upon it only as a temporary measure. No man abhorred the crime of treason more than he; but his wish to see this law repealed was because it inflicted upon the innocent a punishment which had been deserved only by the guilty. The bill before the house was founded upon the principles of good faith and sound policy, and now that the fears and the feelings which had influenced the adoption of different measures had ceased, this ought to be allowed to prevail. He should therefore vote for the original motion.

Lord Melville said, the argument of the law of attainder and corruption of blood being founded on a breach of one of the articles of the Union, had been overrated. The ancient and common law of Scotland, down to the year 1690, had authorized the forfeiture of lands and honours, and for this he had the authority of Baron Hume. If the bill had been limited in its operation, and had only gone to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England, he should not have opposed it; but he was not prepared to go the length of repeating it altogether in cases of high treason. The bill which had been introduced by Sir S. Romilly in 1814, and in which the offences of petit treason and murder were included, was one which seemed to meet the justice of the subject. He was prepared to consent to such a bill as that, or to one which should restore the operation of the ancient law of Scotland; but he felt obliged to oppose the bill before the house in its present shape, and he should therefore vote for the amendment.

Lord Edwards said it was impossible for any effort of human ingenuity to frame a law upon the principles of public policy which might not in its operation infringe upon some private rights. He therefore put out of view this argument, upon which some stress had been laid in the course of the debate. He looked at the existing law rather as founded upon the principle, that it was wise to deter men from the commission of crimes; for this reason, it had formed a part of the law of this land and of Scotland for many centuries. That it had such an operation was by some persons denied, but, as it appeared to him, without any reason for that denial. A feeling of affection for their families had often deterred men from joining in factions, which they would have united themselves to without a moment's hesitation but for that single consideration. He remembered to have heard a story of a Scotch nobleman who was on the point of engaging himself in the rebellion of 1745, and was prevented by a stratagem of his wife. She forged a warrant from the Secretary of State for his apprehension, and had him taken up until the danger was over, when she wrote to the Secretary of State informing him of what she had done, and she always afterwards boasted of having preserved the family estate and honours. In rebellions, the greatest danger was to be feared from the co-operation of men of rank and wealth with the disaffected. Could it, then, be denied, that a law which secured the fidelity and obedience of men who had honours and property to transmit to their descendants, was highly efficacious? Annexed to this bill, he perceived some provisions which were not in themselves objectionable. They ought, however, to stand alone, that their merits might be separately judged and ascertained; he objected to the practice of coupling both together for the sake of securing the votes of a few individuals who were unwilling to relinquish the good because it was attended with evil. He concluded by expressing his intention to support the amendment.

The Lord Chancellor felt the importance of the measure before the house, and entertaining, as he did, a very sincere respect for the noble lord by whom it was introduced, he regretted that he could not approve of it as it stood. The law of forfeiture and corruption of blood, as applied to cases of high treason, afforded a vast security to the public peace. With respect to other crimes to which the same penalties attached, he was not prepared to say that he thought the law might not be safely and judiciously altered. If their lordships would take the trouble to read this bill, as he had done, they would see that it was extremely doubtful whether, under the terms of it, corruption of blood was taken away. Of honours to which it was evidently meant to apply, no mention occurred until the latter end of the bill; and although it was evident that honours were meant to be included, no lawyer would say that the words "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," which were the words of the bill, could be made to extend to honours. Another objection to the bill also was, that the course of the common law would in some instances be opposed and interfered with; because persons entitled to remainders in tail would, under the operation of this bill, become seized in fee upon the attainder of the tenant, and without the process of common recovery, by which alone an estate-tail could be legally converted into a fee. With respect to the principle of the law of attainder and corruption of blood, he thought, when it was considered how extensively ruinous the consequences of treasonable practices might be to the peace and the very existence of families, almost out of number, there was no reason to complain if some portion of the punishment of a defeated treason was made to fall upon the families of those by whom it had been set on foot. He saw how difficult it would be to restore to Scotland the law as it had existed before the Union; but he thought the best course that could be adopted would be to bring in another bill. If this should, however, go into a committee, he should be obliged to propose that high treason should be left out, and that petit treason and murder should alone be the subjects of the proposed alterations. Unless this were done, he should support the amendment.

Amendment of the Criminal Law :— Threatening Letters :—Pardons.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MARCH 24.—Mr. Peel said, that the intent of his motion was to obtain leave to bring in two bills to amend certain points in the criminal law. The first regarded the law for sending letters, containing a charge of having attempted to commit abominable offences. A threat to charge any individual with an unnatural offence was punishable with transportation for life. But if, instead of threatening a charge of the crime itself, the charge should be limited to an attempt to commit that crime, it was only a misdemeanor. The moral offence, and the danger to the individual wrongly accused, were precisely the same, and there could be no reason for any difference in the punishment.—The other bill was to facilitate the benefit of the Royal grants of pardon. At present they must pass the great seal—a proceeding of considerable expense and delay—before the pardoned persons could be restored to what the law termed their credit and capacities. And until the grant had passed the great seal, their testimony, however necessary, could not be received in a court of justice. The bill would have the effect of restoring parties to their full privileges, upon a pardon being extended to them bearing the sign-manual, counter-signed by the Secretary of State, to all intents and purposes as if the same pardon had passed the great seal. The bill would also remedy a considerable defect in the law with respect to clergyable offences. For those who successfully pleaded their clergy, the punishment of death was formerly commuted to branding on the left thumb. This was not considered open enough to common observation, and the left cheek was afterwards substituted. This punishment becoming incompatible with modern civilization, the judges were empowered to impose a pecuniary fine or other punishment, according to their discretion : but the law which authorized this alteration did not give that complete restoration which was attainable by persons who had been punished in the old way : under the present bill, the infliction of the substituted punishment, whether fine or whipping, or imprisonment, would restore the parties to their civil rights. The whipping of females had been abolished by a recent statute, which, however, did not effectually restore them after suffering the punishment substituted. His bill also had relation to the offences of clergymen or clerks in orders, which at present formed an anomaly in the law. A clergyman might be hanged for highway robbery ; if he committed a misdemeanor, he might be transported ; if a clergyable offence, he could not be punished at all. The ground of distinction, if ever it had been good in policy, had long ceased to be so, and should have been done away. It was an obsolete principle at variance with the present state of society ; and, much as he inclined to support the privileges of the clergy, he could not uphold them in this instance. The bill would put clerks in orders upon the same footing with other offenders.—Leave granted.

Commitments of Felons.

THURSDAY, JUNE 18.—Mr. Western moved for returns of all persons committed to gaol on charges of felony, except upon the Home Circuit. His motive for moving for these papers was, to ascertain the period of confinement which persons had suffered previously to their being brought to trial, and the proportion between commitments and convictions. The evil of long confinements previous to trial was excessive, and called for some alternative measures. In the last seven years, out of fifty-two thousand persons committed, no less than thirty thousand were either acquitted, or no bills were found against them. Nearly one half of the persons committed to prisons were acquitted upon trial, although in many cases, these persons, previously to their acquittal, had suffered an imprisonment more than adequate to punish the crimes with which they had been charged.

Mr. Peel admitted that this was a circumstance which was not creditable to the judicial institutions of the country. He was almost in despair of finding a proper remedy for it. He thought that much might be done by increasing the lists of the country juries. In the increase of wealth and power, too much of the business of justice fell upon that body of gentlemen who formed the grand jury, who had to find almost all the bills, and who had in most instances, duties as members of Parliament to attend to besides. To increase the number of judges might be an advisable experiment, with a view to the more speedy clearing of the goals. No reason could be advanced for holding to the particular number of 12, if the interests of the country could be benefited by increasing it.

Mr. Denman thought that by extending the business of the quarter-sessions, and letting the King's commissioners go into places where the goals were unusually full, they might put off, for the present, the formidable expenses of new judges and an additional circuit.—The motion was agreed to.

Bradford Gaol.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.—Mr. J. Smith, in rising to move for an address to his Majesty, for a copy of all correspondence between the Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding of York and the Secretary of State, respecting certain abuses and mismanagement in the gaol of Bradford, said, that an individual had been arrested for a small sum of money ; he soon after escaped from the bailiff, was speedily retaken, and lodged in this gaol, where, owing to the gaoler being an imbecile man, this prisoner was loaded with irons and handcuffs, and so kept for seven weeks, except at intervals of five minutes once a week, to enable him to change his linen. The prisoners at large complained of their treatment in this gaol ; and such was the petty tyranny which had been exercised, that on application to the Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding of York, and on reference to the Secretary of State, a prosecution was ordered, and one miscreant was convicted of cruelty to a prisoner in this gaol. He was glad to hear that no opposition was intended to his motion, and that every desire had been expressed to correct such abuses and punish the delinquents. He believed that in the treatment of paupers in some of the gaols, the utmost barbarity was inflicted.

Mr. Peel said that the hon. gent. had only done him justice when he anticipated that he would not oppose such a motion as this. If such abuses as were represented had been committed, he should not attempt to vindicate the delinquents, or to oppose the production of any correspondence which was calculated to throw a light on the subject. He then stated, that upon receiving a communication from the Lord Lieutenant of this district, who had done himself great credit by his conduct in the business, he had referred the subject to the Attorney and Solicitor-general, and eventually ordered a prosecution, in which one of the parties had been convicted. He was most anxious to see the small local jurisdictions throughout the country avail themselves of the power which they now had of sending their prisoners to the general county gaol, upon paying a small quota of expense: indeed, he was disposed to go farther, and to say, that he did not think the general administration of the justice of the country would be injured if these petty courts were abrogated (hear).

Mr. Abercrombie concurred in the expediency of abolishing these petty jurisdictions.

Boundaries of Counties.

TUESDAY, FEB. 22.—Mr. F. Palmer rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to empower magistrates at quarter sessions to effect exchanges between counties of insulated parcels of land, for the more convenient administration of justice. To provide a remedy for the inconvenience and perplexity which resulted from having certain parcels of land belonging to particular counties, situated at a considerable distance from those counties, was the object of the bill which he called upon the house to give him leave to introduce. The best method of prevailing upon persons to apply a remedy was to prove the existence of the evil: that he would endeavour to do by stating a few short facts. In the first place, Holy Island, which lay off the coast of Northumberland, did not, as one would naturally suppose from the situation, belong to that county, but to the county palatine of Durham. Another place belonging to Durham, called Crake, was situated in the centre of Yorkshire, 50 miles from the courts of the county of which it was called a part. In the same way a part of Derbyshire was to be found in Leicestershire; and a part of Huntingdonshire in Bedfordshire. From the town of Oakingham, a tract of land belonging to Wiltshire ran into Berkshire for about four miles in length. It was, in some places, two miles in breadth, and in others not half a mile; and there was no notorious mark by which the boundaries of the two counties could be defined. In like manner Swallowfield East, and Swallowfield West, both belonging to Wiltshire, were situated in Berkshire. He had the authority of all the magistrates on the Oakingham bench for stating, that the situation of the three parcels of land which he had mentioned had for many years produced a great inconvenience. He had seen a bill which had been framed with reference to this very subject, by Lord Chancellor Hyde, afterwards Lord Clarendon, who had resided for some time in the parish of Swallowfield. The bill was drawn up with great accuracy: it enumerated every parish, tithing, and village within the three parcels of land before mentioned, as well as all the evils which had arisen, or were likely to arise, from their locality, and the remedy which it proposed was, that those three parcels of land should be annexed for all purposes whatever to the county of Berks—that all power and jurisdiction over them should be taken from the Lord Lieutenant and the magistrates of Wiltshire, and vested in those of Berkshire, with full authority to raise all dues, subsidies, and taxes whatever. The bill also contained a saving clause, guarding the right of every man's inheritance. Upon the original division of the country into counties, for the purposes of justice, police and defence, these isolated spots were attached to distant counties by the influence of men of great rank and power. Dugdale, in his work on Warwick, spoke of a spot of ground which interfered with his survey, and which he found to belong to the county of Worcester. In giving an account of it to his readers, he said that it was "one of those parcels of land which are so frequently to be found severed from the county to which they belong." He ascertained that this piece of land belonged to the church of Worcester, which, upon the general division of land throughout the kingdom, had influence enough to preserve it, and ever after it continued to be taxed as part of the county of Worcester. In Devonshire, on the hither side of the river Tamar, was a parcel of earldom land which had always been taxed as belonging to the county of Cornwall. In the county of Berks was a piece of land called Twynford, which belonged to Wiltshire, although it was 20 miles from that county; the reason was, that it constituted part of the possessions of the Abbey of Malmesbury, in Wiltshire. He knew that the house would be likely to object to any thing like innovation, and therefore he would show a precedent for the measure which he proposed. In 1698, the counties of Ross and Cromarty were by an act of session united for all purposes, and had since been considered as one county by almost every act of parliament which had been passed relative to them. In 1740, many changes took place in the geographical distribution of the county of Dorset; and a variety of alterations had at different times been made in counties by forming several small hundreds into one, and by dividing large parishes, in order to collect the poor rate more easily. There was one precedent which he could not omit to mention, because it would have weight with the house as being one of its own measures—he alluded to the act of the 41st of George III., which was passed for the purpose of annexing Malta to the map of Europe. The hon. gent. concluded by moving for leave to bring in the bill.

Mr. Peel had no intention whatever of opposing the measure: on the contrary, he would give the bill every consideration, although he could not at present pledge himself to support it. There would, probably, be some difficulty as to the detail of the measure. The hon. gent., for instance, had not stated what he intended to do as to the elective franchise. Again, what arrangement was to be made with respect to county rates, assessed for works which were already completed, but not paid for? The bill, further, only proposed to give the power of exchange to counties; it was not provided what a county should do which desired to take, and had nothing to offer in return.

Mr. F. Palmer said, that with respect to the elective franchise, it would be impossible to make any new arrangement at the eve of a dissolution of parliament. His view was, that no alteration should take place until one year after the next general election. For the matter of county-rate, the sum at stake would be so trivial that it might be easily disposed of.

Leave was then given to bring in a bill.

Norfolk Assize Town.

THURSDAY, FEB 24. — Colonel Wodehouse submitted to the house a motion respecting the removal of the Spring Assizes for the county of Norfolk from the borough of Thetford to the city of Norwich. The grounds upon which he made this motion, were already before the house in a petition which had been presented from a numerous and highly respectable body of the inhabitants of the county. The main grievance which they complained of was, that they were under the necessity of carrying the prisoners a distance of thirty miles from the gaol to the place at which they were to be tried, and if they happened to be convicted, the same distance back again to the gaol. This evil had existed for a great length of time, and representations of it had frequently been made, but hitherto without procuring any alteration. There was, however, no time, at which the desired alteration could be more justly and properly made than the present. A large and commodious gaol had lately been erected in the city of Norwich, at an expense of 50,000*l*. Upon former occasions it had been objected, that to remove the assize would be to interfere with a branch of the prerogative. He denied, however, that the prerogative was in any way concerned in the measure he proposed. The places at which the assizes were held had been in all instances fixed by acts of parliament. That by which Thetford was appointed for the county of Norfolk, was passed six centuries ago. At that period only one assize was held for the two counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Thetford was well situated for the purpose, being upon the confines of both counties. Applications had been made to the Chancellor, and to the judges, who had declined to remove the assizes, but expressed no reason for their refusal. It was, in consequence, imputed to them that they were actuated by merely selfish motives. He could not bring himself to believe, that persons holding the high offices which they were intrusted with, could prefer their own convenience to that of the public. The hon. member concluded by moving, "that the petition of certain magistrates and others of the county of Norfolk, praying that the spring assizes should be removed from Thetford to Norwich, be referred to a select committee; and that the counter-petition of the mayor and burgesses of Thetford be referred to the same committee."

Sir John Sebright supported the motion.

Mr. N. R. Colborne opposed the motion. The same application had been, he said, repeatedly made, and had always failed. The assizes for the county of Norfolk had been, as was admitted, held at Thetford for more than six centuries. He did not mean to say that the antiquity of the practice was a conclusive reason against all change, but it must at least be confessed, that unless a very strong case could be made out, no alteration should be attempted. Large sums had been expended on the gaol and court-house at Thetford out of the funds of individuals in the town, and not out of the county-rate, by which those structures had been rendered as convenient as any in the kingdom. There could scarcely be a more direct attack upon the prerogative than was meditated by this measure. No less so than to interfere with the appointment of Lord-Lieutenant or the sheriffs of counties. The petition which he had presented prayed that the house would not permit any interference in the ancient practice. That petition was signed by forty-eight magistrates of the county, eight of whom had served the office of high sheriff; and it was impossible to collect names of greater respectability. He concluded by moving that the other orders of the day be now proceeded with.

Mr. F. Buxton said, that the petition in favour of the proposed removal of the assizes was not only highly respectable as to the signatures which were affixed to it, but as it proceeded from the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, from the sheriffs, and from a large body of the magistracy, it might be reasonably supposed to convey the sentiments of those who were best qualified to pronounce on the expediency of the proposed measure. The important question for the house to consider was, however, whether the administration of justice was impeded by the assizes being held at Thetford. The general convenience of the county would be, as it ought to be, more considered than that of the judges; and the interests of justice more than those of the borough of Thetford. The unnecessary exposure of prisoners on their way to and from trial was most cruel and illegal, and of itself sufficient to induce the house to interfere. He happened some time back to be riding along this line of country through which the prisoners passed; and observing a crowd of persons collected near a public-house, stopped to ascertain the cause. He found that a multitude was collected round a waggon, in which the unfortunate criminals were returning from the assizes; and one unhappy individual, who was to be executed on the following day, was exposed to the vulgar gaze of the mob, who were continually asking "which is he?" in his hearing. Now, supposing the unfortunate Mr. Fauntleroy's case, instead of occurring in Middlesex, had taken place in Norfolk, how cruel and unnecessary an exposure it would have been, to drag him thirty miles through the country to trial, and thirty miles back to gaol, exposed to the vulgar stare of an inquisitive and curious rabble. A friend of his said, "it would serve him right." It could not serve him right; because the law of the land had apportioned to certain offences, certain punishments, and therefore it was unjustifiable to augment the distress or harass the feelings of the unfortunate delinquent. But the evil did not end here. When the prisoners arrived at Thetford, they were placed in a prison, which, if he were to describe, would, he was certain, shock and offend the house. Some improvements had probably been made since he saw it; but it was still disgraceful enough, and if a prisoner had to bring up witnesses from the remote parts of the county, they would have to travel fifty miles, the difficulty of which it might be believed not unfrequently prevented their attempting the journey. For these reasons he should support the motion.

Mr. Baring objected to the motion, because if it were adopted in this instance, it must also be applied to a great many other counties.

Mr. Peel objected to the motion, on the ground that the House of Commons had no proper jurisdiction in the case, having already transferred it to the chancellor and the judges. The question had been referred to the Lord Chancellor, who had decided against the removal. He was of opinion that the consideration of questions such as the present, with which local interests were mixed up, could not be left in better hands than those of the judges.

Dr. Lushington complained that the Rt. hon. Secretary had not stated to the house the grounds upon which the decision of the judges was founded. It appeared to him, that there was no just reason for holding the assizes at Theford. Under the present plan the interests of the many were sacrificed to the interests of the few. The assizes were originally held at Theford, because it was the most convenient place; but now, when that reason no longer existed, why should they not be removed?

Mr. Huskisson said, that the House of Commons was not the place for appeals of this description; the law had vested the necessary power in the hands of the Lord Chancellor and the judges. As for the distance of Theford, as an assize town, almost every county in England stood in the same situation. Prisoners were brought much farther to York, and to Lancaster, than they could be from any part of the county of Norfolk to Theford.

Mr. F. Smith said, that if the inconvenience existed every where, the best thing would be a general alteration.

The house then divided, when the numbers were—For the motion, 21—Against it, 72—Majority against it, 51.

Bills to prevent Cruelty to Animals.

THURSDAY, FEB. 24.—Mr. Martin moved for leave to bring in a bill for the abolition of bear-baiting, and other cruel practices. In the interval which had elapsed since the last session of Parliament, he had conversed with almost every police magistrate in the various districts of the metropolis, and indeed with many magistrates in different parts of the country, and it was their unanimous opinion that these cruel practices ought to be put down without further delay. He had been told over and over again by them, that nothing was more conducive to crime than such sports—that they led the lower orders to gambling—that they educated them for thieves—and that they gradually trained them up to bloodshed and murder. The reason why the police could not meddle with these practices was, that they were not in general exhibited for money. He held, however, in his hand an affiche, which was placarded throughout the town quite as publicly as any that announced the benefit of any singer at the Opera. It announced that "Billy, the phenomenon of the canine race, and superior vermin killer," would go through his wonderful performances on Tuesday next, and that the receipts of the pit would on that evening be presented to the distressed widow of Billy's late proprietor (a laugh). It then stated, that "a dog-fight—a turn-loose match with two dogs and two fresh badgers—and a drawing match," would follow this astounding spectacle; and that several dogs would then be tried at a bear previous to their being sent out upon their travels to foreign climes (a laugh). The doors were to be open at seven o'clock, the performance to begin at half-past, and the admittance to be 3s. each. The whole of the sports were said to be instituted by the "express invitation of several noblemen and gentlemen of the first distinction" (a laugh). He expected that this declaration would secure him the vote of the learned member for Winchester. On a former occasion, that learned member had said that he (Mr. Martin) meddled only with the sports of the poor, and turned away his eyes from those of the rich. The learned member had said, "Show me that the nobility take part in those sports, and I will join with all my heart in putting them down." He was sorry to say, that to his knowledge some persons of rank and name did patronize these cruel practices; and he mentioned the fact now to secure the vote of the learned gent. (hear, hear). The persons to whom he alluded deserved to be stigmatized with severer reprobation than the poorer classes, against whom alone his bill was said to be directed. Their education ought to have given them feelings averse from cruelty and bloodshed, and to have taught them that their example would be of vast importance in propagating such feelings among their inferiors in station. He could see no rational objection to the measure he proposed. By the Marylebone Act all bear-baiting and other barbarous sports were prohibited within that parish; and it appeared to him difficult to assign any reason why, if the parish of Marylebone were to be exempt from such inhuman exhibitions, the parishes of St. George or of St. Margaret, or of any other saint, were to be disgraced and disgusted by them, (hear, hear). It was not, however, merely bear-baiting, and sports of a similar nature, that he wished to abolish; there were other practices, equally cruel, with which he thought the legislature ought to interfere. He would give them an instance of what he meant. There was a Frenchman, called Magendie, who was about to exhibit in London, and whom he considered a disgrace to society. He was in the habit of performing experiments so atrocious as almost to shock belief. He would not trust himself to express a further opinion upon this fellow's conduct, but would merely say, that he looked upon those who witnessed it, without interfering to prevent it, almost in the light of criminals. On one occasion, this Mr. Magendie got a lady's greyhound, for which he paid the sum of ten guineas. He first of all nailed its front, and then its hind paws to the table with the bluntest spikes that he could find, giving as a reason for so doing, that the poor beast might tear away from the spikes, if they were at all sharp and cutting. He then doubled up its long ears, and nailed them down to the same table with similar spikes (loud cries of hear, and shame). He then made a gash down the middle of its face, and proceeded to dissect the nerves on one side of it. First of all, he cut out those nerves which belong to the sight, and whilst performing that operation, said to the spectators, "Observe, when I pass my scalpel over these nerves the dog will shut its eyes." It did so. He then proceeded to operate upon those of taste and hearing. After he had finished those operations, he put some bitter food on the tongue of the dog, and hallooed into his ear. The dog repudiated the food, and was insensible to the sound. This surgical butcher, or butchering surgeon—for he deserved both names—then turned round to the spectators, and said, “I have now finished my operations on one side of this dog’s head; as it costs so much money to get an animal of this description, I shall reserve the other side till to-morrow. If the servant take care of him for the night, according to the directions I have given him, I am of opinion that I shall be able to continue my operations upon him to-morrow with quite as much satisfaction to us all as I have done to-day; but if not, though he may have lost the vivacity he has shown to-day, I shall have the opportunity of cutting him up alive, and showing you the peristaltic motion of the heart and viscera.” (Great disgust was manifested by the house at the statement of this experiment.) He was aware of the necessity of making some experiments on living animals; but then they should be performed in such a manner as to cause as little suffering as possible. That was the opinion of the most eminent professors of medical science. He held in his hand the written declarations of Mr. Abernethy, of Sir Everard Home, of the professors of medicine at Cambridge and Oxford, and of several other respectable medical gentlemen, to that effect. They all, he believed, united in condemnation of such excessive and protracted cruelty as had been practised by this Frenchman. He had heard that this fellow was again coming to this country to repeat his experiments. He therefore had mentioned it to the house, in the hope that it would gain publicity, and excite against the perpetrator of such unnecessary cruelty, the odium he merited. He trusted that when it was known, the fellow would not find persons to attend his lectures, and would thus be compelled to wing his way back to his own country, to find in it a theatre for such abominable atrocities. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill to prevent bear-baiting and other cruel practices.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that he should oppose the motion, because he considered legislation on such paltry subjects to be quite unnecessary and uncalled for (hear, hear).

Mr. Martin did not conceive this subject too paltry for legislative notice, as the hon. member represented it. All the magistrates of the metropolis called for a law to put down these practices: was not their call entitled to some respect and attention? It was not creditable to the house—nay, more, it was discreditable to any member, to rise and say, not that he would negative the bill when it was brought in, but that he would not permit it to be canvassed at all in parliament. Would any man get up and boldly say to them, “I am such an amateur of cruelty, that I will not even allow a measure to be discussed which tends to abolish it?” Such language no man would dare utter; and yet what had been said that evening approximated very closely to it. He was afraid that he should be defeated upon this bill; but if he was, the glory would be with him, and the disgrace with those who vanquished him (hear, hear). He was, however, confident that at some future period it would be passed into law. He would not say that it would meet with that success whilst under his direction; but if the gentlemen opposite would take it up, as they had done his bill for giving counsel to prisoners accused of felony, which they had almost brought to a successful issue, he would willingly surrender it into their hands, and would rejoice at seeing them obtain that success, which, at present, he was afraid, would be denied to his efforts.

Mr. F. Burton did not think this subject so insignificant as not to deserve the notice of the house. The hon. member (Mr. Martin) had conferred a sensible benefit upon the community by his continued exertions in the cause of humanity. His bill had already produced a beneficial and extraordinary change in the manners of the lower orders, and was far from having occasioned that unnecessary litigation which some gentlemen had anticipated. He had an account of the prosecutions which had been instituted under it. They were 71 in number, and in 69 cases convictions had been obtained. He had heard from those who attended Smithfield market, that a great revolution had taken place in it, owing to the exertions of the hon. member. Even those who were the first subjects of his attacks, had recently come forward to subscribe to the funds of “The Society for preventing Cruelty to Animals.”

Mr. Butterworth hoped that the hon. member would extend the power of his bill to the savage, abominable, and unchristian practice of prize-fighting, which had led in many recent instances to the loss of life.

For the motion, 41—Against it, 29—Majority, 12.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.—On the motion that the bill to prevent Cruelty to Animals, be read a second time,

Mr. Heathcote opposed the measure. He did not know that there were so many as two bears in the metropolis, until the compassionate narrative given a few nights ago by the hon. mover. He had, in consequence of the hon. gent.’s information, paid a visit to the bear in Duck-lane; and he must say, that so far from finding him in the distressed and emaciated condition in which he was said to be, a better-fed and a better-conditioned bear—a more healthy and hopeful cub, he had never seen (laughter). The bear had, it was true, been engaged in fighting in his early days; but within the last six years he had become incapable of that exercise, because he had grown too fat (much laughter). If the bill were good for any thing, it should prevent cruelty in the upper ranks also. It should prevent hunting, shooting, and fishing. Could they make one law for the rich and another for the poor? There was no justice in the measure, and he would take the liberty to move that the bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. Peel, though ready to do justice to the motives of the member for Galway, must oppose his bill. His hon. friend seemed to take for his motto “nihil humani à me alienum puto.” But if the hon. member wished to prevent all cruelty to animals, let him bring in a bill to prevent field sports of every description, and he could at once understand it; but he confessed that he did not see upon what ground monkeys, and badgers, and bears, were entitled to a distinct and separate legislative enactment for their protection. Let them for a moment compare bear-baiting with stag-hunting, and they would find that the former animal had a considerable advantage, because he was allowed the use of his natural powers, and was only attacked by one or two dogs, whereas, before a stag hunt took place, they deprived the animal of his horns, which were, in fact, his only defence.

tual means of resistance, against the twenty or thirty couple of dogs by which he was pursued; in consequence of which the poor animal must be worried to death, unless the huntsman happened to be in time to save him by calling off the dogs (hear, hear). He would ask his hon. friend whether there was any thing more cruel in dog or cock-fighting, than in pigeon shooting? A gentleman made a wager of 200 sovereigns with his particular friend, that he would kill the greater number of pigeons in a given number of shots; and a number of pigeons were accordingly provided and shot at, at twenty feet or twenty yards distance, without mercy. Was not this as cruel as any treatment to which a monkey or a dog was exposed, and yet how was the cruelty to be remedied? If, then, they could not provide against that which might be called cruelty in every case, why, he asked, were they to interpose legislative enactments for the protection of a certain class of animals? Was not this instituting a favoured class of animals? One part of the bill stated, "And be it further enacted, that if any person in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall, after the — be concerned or engaged in, or shall promote or encourage, or aid or assist in promoting or encouraging any bear-baiting, dog-fighting, monkey and dog-fighting, or badger and dog-fighting, or cock-throwing, or cock-fighting, or shall in any manner wantonly and cruelly beat, abuse, or ill-treat any of the above-mentioned animals, or any domesticated animal, it shall be lawful for any person who shall witness such offence, to apprehend such person so offending, and to convey such offender before any justice of the peace or other magistrate, &c." But this was not the worst; there was another passage empowering magistrates, upon view of any such practices which might be deemed to fall within this act, to commit and punish without charge or examination. "And be it further enacted, that if any justice of the peace, or other magistrate, shall witness such offence as aforesaid, within his jurisdiction, it shall be lawful for him, on his view, to convict and punish the party or parties so offending, in such manner as he might do under this act, upon information and proof made before him of such offence." So that a magistrate who had slept upon a bed the night before, filled with feathers, plucked from the back of a living goose—riding home from a fox-chase, to dine upon crimped cod—might take up, commit or otherwise punish any person whom he might find engaged in fighting "a domesticated animal, or otherwise ill-treating the same." This could never be borne. He implored his hon. friend, in his humane zeal for the well-being of the beasts that perish, not to be wholly unmindful of the class of animals to which he himself belonged (a laugh). Was it to be endured that a gentleman, under the cruel necessity which the defects of science imposed upon him, following up the improvements of his particular faculty, for the purpose of enlarging the limits of knowledge and preserving the health of human beings—was it to be endured that such a man, so engaged in the pursuits of his calling, though it were known that he had, in its fair exercise, committed cruelty like that imputed to Dr. Magendie, (which statement was, however, denied) should be taken up, imprisoned, or fined, at the discretion of a magistrate who might happen to be present? He objected to the bill, because it tended to create a favoured class of animals. If the principle were good at all, it ought to be extended to all cases of cruelty. Let his hon. friend introduce a bill to prevent hunting, shooting, fishing, and other sanguinary sports, and then bear-baiting, and cock-fighting, might fall within it. At present his measure was not one of equal justice.

Sir James Macintosh would support the bill notwithstanding the ill-directed pleasantries and grave censure of the rt. hon. gent. who had in criticising the form of the bill, actually aimed at the principle. He himself was strongly opposed to any instances of petty, trifling, and vexatious legislation: but this was a point in which the moral welfare of the lower orders was deeply concerned; and the effect of reprobating by Parliamentary denunciation, practices abhorrent to the common feelings of humanity, would be felt through the whole community. The argument drawn from field sports would not apply. Bear-baiting was not a national sport.—It had no insuperable habits and prejudices to plead for it. It was not like gaming, which had gone on and flourished, notwithstanding all that had been done to repress it within the last three centuries. The measures used to repress it had, in fact, only given an advantage to the dishonest and desperate character, by encouraging dishonesty and fraud. As the laws had been found inoperative, so were the punishments inflicted in opposition to every principle of justice. Of what avail was it to fine the keeper of a gaming table 5,000*l.* or send him to the tread mill, while the men who gamed at the house were publicly known, and allowed to go at large? He admitted that much evil might be done by the prejudices of certain classes, and the readiness of public writers to pander to those feelings. Anatomy, which was the basis of sound medical knowledge, was suffering from them. It would very soon be out of the power of the English student to finish his education at home. He must seek in the schools abroad for those accommodations to his studies which hitherto had attracted foreigners to our own shores. What would the great practitioners and luminaries in physiological science have done, had they been impeded in their examinations as the practitioners of the present day were likely by the growth of those prejudices to be impeded? The immortal Harvey could not have made his discovery of the circulation of the blood without the aid of practical anatomy. No man, he believed, would accuse him of encouraging cruelty to animals (hear, hear): but still he would say, that of all the acts of authority which man exercised over the inferior order of animals, not one was more excusable, for none was fraught with greater benefit than the performance of those scientific experiments, the object of which was to mitigate suffering, to remove disease, to establish health, and to prolong life (hear, hear). It was true, the process which led to this perfection in science was harsh, but the results were beneficent. He would now say one word with respect to the learned and highly distinguished physiologist, Dr. Magendie, with whom he had the honour to be acquainted. He was no judge of the importance of Dr. Magendie's discoveries, but the concurrent voice of all those who were judges of the matter was loud in his praise. He believed that the hon. member for Galway had noticed the most aggravated parts of these experiments, but he must be permitted to observe, that none of these experiments, the most cautiously and the most humanely performed, would bear discussion. When he was residing at Paris, he was introduced to Dr. Magendie by their mutual friend, Baron Humboldt, and, being in a state of ill-health, he was attended by Dr. Magendie, as his physician. It had been his misfortune to have suffered much from illness, but he always felt, as a considerable alleviation of that misfortune, the genuine sympathy, the true kindness, the unaffected tenderness, which he had constantly experienced from the able and intelligent medical practitioners whose advice he had sought; but he was bound in justice, and he should be base and, ungrateful if he did not state the fact, that he never had been treated, amongst medical men, with greater care and tenderness, than he had received from Dr. Magendie (hear, hear). If he had, in the ardent pursuit of science—if he had, in his anxiety to penetrate into the hidden secrets of nature, gone beyond those bounds which fine feeling would appear to prescribe, it certainly was a great consolation to find that his general character for tenderness and humanity—that character which was of so much consequence to his patients—had not been impaired by his professional pursuits.

Mr. G. Lamb said, that though he was not fond either of bear or bull-baiting, still he must give his vote against any legislative interference with those practices. He was very well pleased with those enactments which prevented persons from mistreating animals that were intrusted to their care, which had the effect of making hackney-coachmen and drovers a little more humane. But the moment they interfered with the sports of the lower orders, then the observations thrown out by the rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) relative to the sports of the higher orders, applied with a force that could not be answered. His learned friend had spoken of the games at which this bill was levelled as not being the sports of this country; but he could show that they had been patronized by the great and powerful, centuries ago. Evelyn, describing a bull-bait that occurred in the time of Charles II., stated, that "One of the dogs was thrown so high, that he fell into the lap of a lady of rank in the second gallery. Two dogs were killed. The sports ended with the ape on horseback; and I retired, wearied with the filthy scene, which I had not witnessed for many years" (hear, hear). He would read an account of an exhibition of the same kind, which took place in 1702, in the reign of Queen Anne. He found the bill amongst the papers of the Vice-Chamberlain of that day, who was one of the prime beaux of the Court. The bill was headed with the queen's arms, and ran thus:—"Anna Regina. At the Bear, in Hockley-in-the-Hole, near Clerkenwell-green. This is to give notice, to all gentlemen, gamesters, and others, that, on the 17th of April, a baldfaced dog of Middlesex, will be matched against a dog of Cow-cross (laughter). A guinea each dog. He that shows the fullest and finest game, and comes most clean to hand, wins all: and a great mad bull will be turned loose in the yard, with fire-works all over him, and two or three cats tied to his tail (shouts of laughter). Also other varieties. A bull baiting and a bear-baiting. Beginning at two o'clock in the afternoon. Vivat Regina" (laughter). He did not quote these instances in approbation of such proceedings, but merely to show that they had been encouraged as national sports. For his own part, while there were persons who liked to be amused in this way, he would rather see them so amused, than not amused at all (hear).

Mr. W. Smith differed entirely from the opinion of his hon. friend. If there were any persons who could be amused by such exhibitions as were described in the paper he had read, he trusted they would never be amused while they were in existence. Much good had been done by the exertions of his hon. friend (Mr. Martin), as might be seen in every market in London, and he hoped he would persevere in his humane efforts. It was said that this bill went to interfere with the amusements of the lower orders; but was that so new a circumstance? Were the public-houses as open to the dances of the poor, as the great taverns and assembly-rooms were to those of the rich? Was there not an interference here with the amusements of the lower orders? They were all in the habit of reading books of travels, and with what severity of remark did they find their countrymen constantly speaking of the bull-fights of Spain—a sport which was so much admired by the higher as the lower orders in that country. They readily saw those faults in others which they refused to correct in themselves. In his opinion, the habit of seeing bull-fights had prepared the Spaniards to look without horror at an auto-da-fé. It was certainly a step towards that goal of cruelty. Hogarth had well described the progress of cruelty in a series of prints. The hero of the piece began his career by spinning a cock-chaffer, and terminated it by the murder of the woman whom he had seduced.

Mr. Martin, in reply, contended, that nothing which had been advanced against his bill, impugned in the slightest degree the principle on which it proceeded. The rt. hon. Sec. (Peel) had argued, that because he did not legislate for the stag or the innocent hare, he ought not to legislate on the subject at all. But was he to do nothing because he could not effect all? He, however, threw the argument back on his rt. hon. friend, and as he so much commiserated the case of the unfortunate stag, he called on him, as an adviser of his Majesty, to counsel His Majesty to dismiss the stag-hounds (laughter). An example of that kind, set by the King, would have a very good effect, and perhaps would put an end to the stag-hunting of a noble lord, who kept up that sport near London. He (Mr. M.) did all he could to remove cruelty of every description; but they must legislate on these matters by degrees. It was said that this bill was against the sports of the people: but it was a consolation, that if they were legislating against the sports of the people, they were legislating with the people on their side; and on behalf of the unvitiated population of England, he claimed the enactment of this law. He would now say one word as to Dr. Magendie. He did think, notwithstanding what had been said, that Dr. Magendie proposed experiments the most horrible and the most wanton that ever were proposed by any individual. He did not deny, that some experiments for the discovery of some latent fact might be performed with propriety. But the experiments of Dr. Magendie were not new, they had been performed a thousand times in Paris; and he came over here to show them as a dramatic exhibi-bition. He had the authority of great physicians, of the greatest English anatomists, and amongst the rest the Regius Professor of Anatomy at Oxford, against the practice. The last mentioned individual was of opinion, that the attention of the public ought to be strongly awakened to the subject (hear, hear). He was content to be called the maligner of Dr. Magendie; but he could read from that individual's own works a greater condemnation of himself—he could point out a more refined degree of cruelty than any he had stated. It was said that it was not a greyhound that had been tortured, but a spaniel—not a large dog, but a small one. This reminded him of a scene he had once witnessed. He went to Newgate, and saw a man who had been convicted of the murder of his wife. He was attended by the Rev. Mr. Ford, the then ordinary. The prisoner was exclaiming, "If I die for this crime, I am a murdered man, and my blood will rest on the prosecutor and the jury." The clergyman said, "Why you were proved to have been guilty of the murder by ten or twelve most respectable witnesses. It was sworn that you beat out the brains of your wife with a mallet. "Yes," said the prisoner, "but I beat out her brains with a pole-axe. I am, therefore a murdered man" (laughter). He would state to the house what had been the conduct of Dr. Magendie on another occasion in England. The Doctor, whilst he was operating on a dog, placed his mouth near the ear of the animal, and said, "Restes tranquille, restes tranquille;" and then turning to the spectators added, "Il seroit plus tranquille s'il entendait Francois" (a laugh). The hon. member concluded by expressing a hope that the house would suffer the bill to go into a committee.

Sir F. Burdett said, that as everybody agreed that a beneficial result had ensued from the former bill which the hon. member had introduced, he thought it should naturally lead to the conclusion that they could not do harm in going a little further with him. It was not, he thought, fair to draw any comparison between field sports and these sports (if they could be so called) which the hon. member desired to put down. The former were conducive to health and activity—every faculty of the body was called into action in their pursuit: but the latter were merely spectacles of unmix'd barbarity—animals being set to tear each other to pieces for the gratification of a multitude who stood passively looking on. It appeared very strange that in the course of the discussion the most important part of the subject had been overlooked—he meant the injurious effect which such scenes had on the morals of society. Putting all other considerations out of view—considering that he was not legislating on a principle of humanity towards brutes, but for men—he could not avoid giving his support to the bill. The persons who joined in the sports which would be affected by the bill were the very nuisance of society. The neighbourhood where the sports were pursued was the worst in the metropolis. The common law of England justified the principle of interfering with regard to any thing which had a tendency to injure the morals of the community, and cruelties were in principle punishable by common law at the present moment. The object of the bill was merely to carry that principle into effect in those atrocious cases which shocked the public mind. He did not think that the powers of the bill would be abused:

on the contrary, he feared that they would fall into disuse, unless the hon. member for Galway could appoint a successor as industrious and persevering as himself, to see its enactments carried into effect. For these reasons, the bill should receive his support (hear, hear).

The house then divided: the numbers were—For the amendment, 50—Against it, 38—Majority, 18.

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16.—Earl Grosvenor presented a petition from Mr. John Gale Jones, praying their Lordships would put a stop to the cruelties practised on bears, badgers, and other beasts in the parlous of their Lordships' House. In presenting the petition, the Noble Earl said he was not quite ready to support its prayer. Not that he was friendly to these cruel sports, but because he doubted how far it was prudent to legislate concerning them more than had been already done. There was, he was ready to admit, a great difference between those sports which were essentially cruel, of which, probably, the cruelty constituted the whole amusement; and those in which the cruelty was only an accompanying circumstance, and the chief amusement was derived from the healthy exercise. The former he was not at all disposed to protect; and as to the latter he should think it a disgrace to country gentlemen if they were to pursue them to the neglect of their other more important duties, or require them as motives to make them reside on their estates: still he was not prepared to say such sports ought to be suppressed, and he did not very well see how one species of sports could be put down and the other preserved.—The petition was then laid on the table.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MARCH 24.—Mr. Martin moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the act for preventing cruel and improper treatment of cattle*. As the act now stood, the maximum of punishment that could be inflicted was a fine of 5*l.*, and in default of payment, imprisonment for a month or two. He thought that every gentleman would acknowledge that animals ought to be protected either in their own right, or as the property of the individuals to whom they belonged; and if that principle were admitted, he did not see how it could be disputed that the punishment for wantonly injuring them ought to be increased. In the present state of the law, if a man intrusted with the care of a horse should knock out its eye from malice to its owner, or, as had recently been done, should tie its tongue to a gate, and then beat it on the head till it tore its tongue out, it was impossible to do more to such a wretch than fine him 5*l.*, or imprison him for a month or so. Now he proposed to make such an offence a misdemeanor, and to leave the punishment of it to the magistrates at quarter sessions. He also intended to add a clause to the bill, to authorize magistrates at the quarter sessions to award to the prosecutors of such offences a reasonable compensation for the trouble and expense incurred in prosecuting them.

Mr. F. Palmer was of opinion, that the house had already proceeded too far in legislating upon this subject. It was but that morning, as he and a friend were in a hackney-coach, when one of the horses suddenly becoming restive, the coachman administered three or four blows to the horse, but not with any savage violence, that a gentleman who saw the occurrence immediately came forward, and threatened to carry the man to a police-office if he did not instantly desist from beating the animal. It was to prevent the further increase of such vexatious interference, that he should oppose the present motion.

Mr. Lockhart thought that the house had already gone far enough; and he should therefore advise the hon. member not to press his motion. His former bill conferred great credit on the hon. member, and had already effected a beneficial change in the manners of the people.

Mr. Martin could not have believed that any hon. member would have stood forward so prominently, as the member for Reading had done to defend the barbarities which were practised upon horses and cattle. He was sure that the hon. member's constituents would not like the hon. member the better for the sentiments he had that night expressed. The hon. member, at the recurrence of another election, might find it difficult to secure his return (order). The present bill was a mere transcript of a bill which had been approved some years ago by all the law lords, by Lord Ellenborough, Lord Erskine, and the present Lord Chancellor.

The house divided. For the bill 23—Against it, 33—Majority, 10.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.—Mr. Martin renewed his motion for leave to bring in a bill to extend the provisions of the act 3 Geo. IV. c. 71, to prevent the cruel and improper treatment of cattle. In the measure he proposed, he had adopted the precise words of a bill which had formerly been drawn up by the present Attorney-General.

After a few words from Mr. Peel, leave was given to bring in the bill.

THURSDAY, JUNE 21.—Mr. Martin having moved the second reading of his bill,

The Attorney-General said: that three years ago, a bill had been introduced by his learned friend Sir J. Mackintosh, which rendered it a felony punishable with transportation, to wound or maim cattle. Now, the hon. member (Mr. Martin) had brought in a bill, reducing the offence to a misdemeanor; but he had also inserted a proviso, that nothing in his bill should be construed to extend to the bill introduced three years ago by his learned friend; thus declaring that a particular offence was a misdemeanor, which, by the former bill, the provisions of which were not to be repealed, was declared to be a felony. So that the offence was, it appeared, to be both a felony and a misdemeanor. Such a contradictory measure as this could not pass into a law. He hoped the hon. member would not say that he (the Attorney-General) was the author of the bill, as the proviso in question had been introduced since it had been submitted to his inspection. He had taken no farther part in the formation of the measure than to suggest a few verbal amendments.

Mr. Martin maintained, that this was a bill of the Attorney-General's, save and except that part to which allusion had been made. The bill which the Attorney-General had formerly consulted with him in drawing (a laugh), for preventing the ill-treating, wounding, or maiming of cattle, was nearly the same as the present. When he applied to the Attorney-General on the subject, the learned gent. said he saw no objection to such a measure, if it contained the words; "wantonly cutting, maiming, or wounding." If the Attorney-General thus stood forward to oppose bills which had in view the interests of humanity, he feared the public would look upon the House of Commons as a very bad place for the education of a judge.

Mr. C. Wilson said, the offence of wounding cattle was at present punishable as a felony; and he was glad of it: but there might be cases of so slight a nature as not to call for so severe a punishment. He thought the object of the hon. member (Mr. Martin) would be answered by wording the clause differently, so as not to suffer the misdemeanor and the felony to clash together. This might be done by saying that certain acts "may be punished as misdemeanors."

The house divided. For the second reading, 18—Against it, 27—Majority against it, 9.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.—Mr. Martin rose for the purpose of withdrawing the motion of which he had given notice, for "a select committee to inquire whether the practice of bear baiting, and other cruel sports, has a mischievous effect on the morals of the people." He observed, that it was too late in the present session to have the committee; and he was the less anxious about it, as there was one species of cruel sport—namely, bull baiting—which he had the authority of the Attorney-General himself for saying was illegal under the law as it now stood. The learned Attorney-General would not deny this, for he had in his possession the written opinion of that learned gent. on the subject; and the learned gent. had his two guineas for that opinion in his pocket (loud laughter). It was, then, a fact, that the bull was as much protected from cruelty by the existing law as the bullock, the sheep, or any other animal. What he was anxious to prove, and it could be best done in a select committee, was the demoralizing tendency of the cruel sports which were now practised.

The motion was then withdrawn.

Game Laws.

LORDS, THURSDAY, FEB. 17.—Lord Suffolk presented a petition from the magistrates of the county of Norfolk, assembled in quarter sessions, praying for the amendment of the game laws. After the petition, which deprecated the injurious effects on morality produced by the operation of the present game laws, had been read, the noble lord observed that the present petition, as well as that of last year, was agreed to by a very numerous bench of magistrates, who, from their experience, were perfectly capable of judging of the effects of the game laws.

COMMONS: (same day).—Mr. S. Wortley moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the existing game laws, which was precisely the same as that which he had submitted to the house in the last session of Parliament.

Mr. Curwen said, that the evils of the present system were obvious, and such as required alteration. The gaols were filled with poachers, game was destroyed to a considerable extent, and was, in many places, openly sold, notwithstanding the penalties which were imposed for the purpose of preventing it. He highly approved of the general principle of the bill.

Mr. Peel was prepared to give the measure his support, but for a different reason from that which had been assigned by the hon. member who spoke last. He thought that law the best which would be the most effectual in repressing poaching. For this reason he supported the measure which made the sale of game legal. He would have preferred that the experiment should be made on this point alone, and his only objection to his hon. friend's plan was, that it was too extensive.

Mr. Tennyson agreed with the rt. hon. Secretary of State. He hoped that there might be a provision introduced into the bill, restraining the use of man traps.

Mr. S. Wortley was of opinion that the setting of spring-guns prevented scenes which would be ten times more fatal than any which could result from them.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

LORDS, THURSDAY, FEB. 24.—Lord Suffolk rose to propose a bill declaring the setting of spring-guns, or other instruments of death, in grounds, for the preservation of game, unlawful. He particularly called their lordships' attention to the dreadful accidents which had frequently been occasioned by spring-guns. It was not poachers alone who suffered. Many innocent persons had become the victims of those instruments of death, and there was an instance in which royal blood had very nearly been shed by a spring-gun. The consequence of authorizing the use of spring-guns was to give to an individual the power of punishing with death an offence, for committing which, the offender, if brought to trial, would be punished less severely. Capital punishment ought not to be thus left to individuals, even if it could be certain that the punishment was always to fall on offenders; but, as he had said, it was not poachers only who were exposed to the effects of spring-guns. He hoped to prove that in the majority of cases spring guns were illegal; that no law founded in moral justice could sanction them; and that for these reasons they ought to be altogether prohibited. In the case of Vere v. Cawdor and King, 11th East, 568., King, Lord Cawdor's game-keeper, shot Vere's dog in pursuit of a hare. Vere sued King, and upon the trial Lord Ellenborough observed, "the question is, whether the plaintiff's dog incurred the penalty of death for running after a hare in another's ground? and if there be any precedent of the sort, which outrages all reason and sense, it is of no authority to govern such cases." Judgment was accordingly given for the plaintiff. If a dog did not incur the penalty of death for running after a hare in another's ground, it would be surprising if a man should incur the penalty of death for no greater offence. In Townsend v. Wathen, 9th East, 277., Wathen set traps baited with attractive food. The plaintiff's dog was caught in one of them. He brought his action and obtained a verdict. On this a rule nisi being granted, Lord Ellenborough observed, "every man must be taken to contemplate the probable consequences of the act he does."—And the rule was discharged. The analogy here could not but strike their lordships; a game-preserver accumulated in his woods an inordinate quantity of game, tempting the trespasser by this sort of attractive food into his traps. The probable consequences were the poor man's mutilation or death, for which, the person who set these engines must, according to Lord Ellenborough, be answerable! In Jay v. Whitfield, tried at Warwick Summer Assizes, by Chief Baron Richards, 1819, a boy committing a trespass was wounded by a spring-gun. He brought his action for damages, and recovered 160l. It was held "that no man could retaliate an injury out of all proportion with that which he had received."—Such force was only allowable as might be necessary to repel aggression. A trespasser might be thrust off premises which he had no right to enter and which he refused to quit; but had the owner taken a hedge stake and slain the trespasser, he would have reminded him of a person being shot, who in some village near London chose to personate a ghost. The man who shot the supposed ghost was tried, and the jury, taking into consideration the terror that had been excited, wished to bring in a verdict of manslaughter; but the Judges who presided at the Old Bailey, told the jury—if not convinced of the guilt of the accused they might acquit; but they were bound to acquit or find the accused guilty of murder. In the case of Dean v. Clayton, 7. Taunton, 489, a gentleman contrived to fix spikes or spears in his trees, in such a way as to allow of hares passing under them, and at the same time to render the destruction of any dog in pursuit of them probable. A valuable pointer was killed by one of these spears, an action was brought against the person who set them, and the Court of Common Pleas was divided in opinion, whether the action was maintainable. The reasoning of the case in favour of the action was, that a man "cannot indirectly do that which he cannot do directly." By a previous case it was decided that a servant could not directly shoot a dog in defence of his master's hare; the gentleman could not have directly speared the dog, therefore he could not indirectly fix a spear so that the dog might probably be speared. In the case of Hott v. Wilks, two men went into a wood, not to steal pheasants, but to gather nuts; and it was proved in evidence, that they conversed together on the spring-guns set in the wood before they entered. Notice was not only given in this case, but it was proved to have been received. Nevertheless, Mr. Justice Garrow, who tried the cause at the assizes in Essex, considering the question the same in principle with that of Dean v. Clayton, directed a verdict for the plaintiff; damages to the amount of 50l. were given, but subsequently the case was heard again, a rule nisi having been obtained. Moral, if not legal wrong, having been inflicted, and the judgment was given with reluctance by those who passed it. Chief Justice Abbott said, "We are not called upon in this case to decide the general question whether a trespasser sustaining an injury from a latent engine of mischief placed in a wood or in grounds where he had no reason to apprehend personal danger, may or may not maintain an action. Nor are we called upon to express any opinion upon the humanity—no, the inhumanity (he says) of the practice—which in this case has been the cause of the injury sustained by the plaintiff. In this case it is found by the jury that the plaintiff actually knew that spring guns were set in this wood. It is impossible to doubt what the moral feeling of the learned judge was in pronouncing judgment in this case. Mr. Justice Bayley said—“Nothing that falls from me shall have a tendency to encourage the practice which has to a certain degree prevailed of setting those engines. I am of opinion on the ground of notice only, that this action is not maintainable.” Mr. Justice Holroyd said,—“The only doubt I have entertained during the course of argument, arises out of the maxim of law that a man cannot indirectly do that which he cannot do directly. I am, however, now satisfied that that principle has no application to the present case, where the plaintiff had express notice that the spring guns were placed on the premises into which he wrongfully entered.”—“If indeed a person who had no notice had gone into the grounds, although he would be a trespasser, the act of firing off the gun by treading accidentally on the wires, would not, in consequence of those wires being latent, be considered his own act; but he would be a mere instrument, producing that which resulted from the prior act of another. If one person makes use of another, who is a mere instrument, to do any act, the thing done is the act, not of him who is merely the instrument, but of the person who uses him as such instrument.” Chief Justice Best:—“The act of the plaintiff could only occasion mere nominal damage to the wood of the defendant; the injury that the plaintiff’s trespass has brought upon himself is extremely severe. In such a case one cannot, without pain, decide against the action;”—“humanity requires that the fullest notice should be given, and the law of England will not sanction what is inconsistent with humanity.” This was the single authority on the side even of legal justice for the practice of setting spring-guns; all turning upon the notice not only having been given but received, and therefore admitting in this particular case of the application of the principle of law insisted upon by the judges: Volenti non fit injuria. Supposing this principle to be a legal justification in cases where notice of spring guns could be proved to have been received, it could avail against the maxims of law already quoted in other cases where no such proof could be offered. No one would deliberately shoot a poacher, even if he could do it legally, which as the law now stood he could not do directly, though giving him due notice, he could place a gun with impunity in such a manner as to ensure almost the same effect! It were better, if poaching must be capitally punished, for any one to be allowed directly to shoot a poacher, but not indirectly. None but the poacher would be shot; before the trigger was pulled, the shooter might relent, and chances for life would thus be afforded, which in the case of the spring gun did not exist; the gun once set, the innocent, the guilty, every age, sex, and condition, fell the indiscriminate victims. A friend of his riding between two plantations, in a strong wind, nearly lost his hat; if his hat had been blown off, it probably would have been driven over the low fence near which he rode, into the plantation. This, then, would have been his option—to have been exposed to a snow storm with a bare head, or to attempt the recovery of his hat in the plantation where spring guns were set, at the risk of his life. The plea of necessity for spring guns as a means of preserving game was urged by some; but was the excessive quantity of game necessary? If not, how could spring guns be necessary for its protection? He concluded by moving that the bill prohibiting the use of spring guns as a means of preserving game be read a second time, which was read accordingly.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.—Lord Suffield moved the order of the day for the committee on the bill to make the setting of spring-guns for the protection of game illegal.

The Duke of Wellington thought the principle on which the bill was brought in, if followed up, would apply to enclosures of all descriptions. If spring-guns were not to be employed for the preservation of game, he could not see why they should be set for the protection of roses and apples. He should object to the bill, unless it were to be extended to all other property as well as game. With regard to accidents by spring-guns, he believed very few occurred. The effect of setting spring-guns had been found to be the preventing of poaching, and not the endangering of human life.

Lord Suffield agreed in principle with the noble duke. He would not make any opposition to such a clause, should the noble duke introduce it. He saw no more reason for protecting cabbages than pheasants; he respected them both equally, but thought they should not be protected by spring-guns.

The Earl of Liverpool concurred in the principle laid down by his noble friend, that in consistency the bill should apply to other property as well as game. He was himself for carrying that principle to its fullest extent. That a man should be allowed to buy a trap to shoot another in a case in which he could not directly shoot him, was extremely preposterous. There was another instance in which the state of the law was absurd at the present moment. If a man went into a garden, and took away a basket of fruit already gathered, he was guilty of felony; but if he took away all the fruit from the trees, he was guilty only of a trespass. Now there were a great number of fruit-gardens in the neighbourhood of London which would be exposed to depredation, if it were not for the terror of spring-guns.

The Earl of Westmorland said, if the principle of the bill were made to apply generally, it should have his fullest support.

Lord Ellenborough said, that if the alteration proposed by the noble duke were carried into effect, nobody in the neighbourhood of London would be able to preserve any fruit. There was a great difference between going into open grounds and climbing over a wall or entering a hot-house.

The Lord Chancellor acknowledged the inconsistency and uncertainty of the law with respect to spring-guns. On every occasion on which any question on this subject had come before the courts, the judges, he believed, had been about equally divided. To those who considered the state of the law on this and some other subjects, that maxim which declared it to be the perfection of human reason appeared absurd. It certainly was not the perfection or human reason which made it only trespass to take a pear from a tree, and which made the taking the same pear, when separated from the tree, felony. It was his wish that property should be protected, but he should be sorry to be thought the advocate for spring-guns. There had been no occasion for those engines in former times, but now when every plantation was turned into a poultry-yard, protection of this kind was thought necessary. A sportsman was now thought nothing of, unless he could kill his thousand birds a-day. But such a thing had never been heard of in the days of his (the learned lord's) youth. There were no pheasants in those days, or at least very few in that part of the country from which he came: some were kept for show, and some were to be found at the seat of the ancestor of the present Lord Ravensworth. Now that so many plantations had been made, and so well stocked with pheasants, how could their lordships expect that people who had a taste for game—and he never knew an Englishman who had not—would not go and look for it where it was to be found? Poaching was the consequence of game being preserved and protected. He never could defend the practice of setting engines to endanger the life of a fellow-creature for the sake of a partridge or a pheasant.

The Earl of Lauderdale said that the country galls were crowded with prisoners, the victims of the game laws. Considering the diffusion of property in this country, the game laws ought to be altered. Parliament had within a short period created eight hundred millions of funded property, and a class of persons enjoying revenues amounting to 32 or 33 millions a-year, and yet these persons were not allowed to kill game.

The Earl of Caernarvon agreed fully with the noble lord who had last spoken, that there was no grievance greater than the game laws. He wished to see the sale of game legalized, as he could not conceive that the wealthy man should escape for purchasing game while the poor man should be punished for selling it. He was satisfied that the laws for prohibiting the sale of game did not tend to preserve it. Whether a law passed now or not, it was a state of things which must soon be put an end to. There was nothing more conducive to the morality and benefit of the country than for gentlemen to reside on their property, but he did not think the temptations to do this would be lessened from making the sale of game legal. He wished the laws to be such as could be executed; it was very injurious to have laws which could not be carried into effect.

The Lord Chancellor said there was a great difficulty in making the sale of game legal. The difficulty arose from the difference which the law had established between trespass and theft; between things fera natura, and in possession, between taking fruit from a tree, and taking it after it was gathered. It was difficult to make game property on this principle, as it was more fera natura than in possession. He remembered a case which occurred in Lancashire, where a man stole a salmon from a river, and was tried. It was held that the salmon was fera natura, and the man was acquitted. Before the Judge left the town, a man stole a salmon after it had been taken, not so good a salmon nor so fresh as the other, but it had been in possession, caught and placed in a box, and this man was found guilty and transported for life.

The house having resolved itself into a committee,

Earl Bathurst suggested, it would be better that the Chairman should report progress, and that the further consideration of the measure should be adjourned to some future day.

The Chairman accordingly obtained leave to report progress.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—Lord Suffield, before moving the order of the day to go into a committee on the bill for prohibiting the use of spring guns for the preservation of game, meant to offer to their lordships a bill to make it larceny to take fruit, and other vegetable productions, with a felonious intention. Should this bill, and the one he had already introduced, receive their lordships' consent, he should then introduce another law, making it unlawful to set spring guns in market gardens, orchards, and other places. He had been under the necessity of adopting this course in consequence of the opposition of the noble duke (the Duke of Wellington). That noble duke had accused him, he thought with more zeal than discretion, of not having carried the principle of the bill far enough. The noble duke did not seem to be aware of the great distinction on which he had founded the measure. Game was only preserved for amusement; but the preservation of fruit was often necessary to the existence of the cultivator. This made a great difference, and induced him to confine his measure to prohibiting the setting spring guns for the preservation of game. The noble duke's zeal, supposing him sincere, had blinded him, and he proposed to extend the prohibition to setting guns in any place. If the noble duke were sincere in his professed wish to see the principle of the bill extended, and he (Lord Suffield) cast no imputation on his sincerity, his arguments were very strange. The noble duke doubted if so great a number of accidents occurred as had been asserted, and yet wished the principle of the bill to be extended. Supposing the noble duke insincere, and that his arguments were used with a view of getting rid of the measure altogether, it must be allowed that no course could have been better devised to answer his purpose. The proposal made by him (Lord S.) was simple and unobjectionable, and indeed no objection had been made on the second reading of the bill. On his bill it was proposed to engraft a clause which would make the measure very objectionable. If the proceedings of the noble duke were a mere ruse de guerre, he thought them hardly fair on a question like this. It might be dangerous to advocate publicly the setting spring guns for the preservation of game; but he was sure the noble duke was the last man, who, if he thought the use of them right, would oppose his bill in an indirect manner. Where there was danger, the noble duke was the man to stand in the breach, and face it. He did not indeed attribute artifice to the noble duke. If he were now to use it, he must have learnt it since his first entrance into that house, and certainly since the convention of Cintra. He hoped, however, whether so intended or not, that the proposition of the noble duke would not defeat his bill. The noble lord concluded by moving the first reading of the bill, for making it larceny to steal fruit and other vegetables.

The Duke of Wellington did not rise to defend himself against any insinuations which the noble lord had thrown out respecting transactions in which he had been engaged—insinuations which were perfectly unparliamentary (hear, hear). He said perfectly unparliamentary, as they had no relation to the subject under the consideration of their lordships, but to his conduct before he was a member of that house. But with regard to the bill in question, he did think it contained a very unfair insinuation of cruelty against country gentlemen, who might wish to preserve their game by spring-guns, rather than by game-keepers, because the latter mode was not so consistent with their fortune as it might be with that of the noble lord opposite. That he intended to oppose the bill when he came down the other day, he would not deny; but when he heard the statement of legal authorities made by the noble lord on moving the second reading, he reconsidered his opinion, and came to the conclusion, that if the principle were right, it ought to be extended further. He wished to deal fairly with the noble lord, and would tell him, that if the bill were made applicable to garden grounds, it would be lost; but that was no affair of his. The fault was theirs who introduced a measure of such a nature, that when it was proposed to extend the principle, it was found to be so unfair that it could not be applied beyond an individual case. Whenever the measure came to be considered in the committee, he should insist upon its being made applicable to all enclosures, on the ground that small country gentlemen should not be deprived of the only means they had of protecting their game.

Lord Suffield thought that the circumstance of country gentlemen not being able to preserve game legally, was no reason for permitting them to preserve it illegally.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the first bill to which the noble lord (Suffield) had called the attention of the house was that which proposed to make stealing in gardens larceny, and to the motion for reading that bill a first time he had no objection. The noble lord had also given notice of his intention to bring in another bill to prohibit the setting of spring guns in gardens. He certainly could not see more reason for shooting a man for stealing fruit, than for stealing pheasants, and he was therefore in favour of the prohibition; but he thought that the better way of accomplishing this object would be the ingrafting a clause in the other bill.

Lord Suffield explained, that the bill, as it was at present framed, would enact, that all persons setting spring-guns, or other destructive engines, for the purpose of taking away human life, or doing some bodily harm, in any place not being a nursery or cultivated garden-ground, should, in case of human life being actually lost, be declared guilty of manslaughter; that in case only a blow or wound should be the consequence of such engines being set, the person setting them should be guilty of a misdemeanor, and that the party injured should have, moreover, a right of action for damages. The other bill, by which he intended to make all robberies in such cultivated grounds as he had just alluded to, larcenies, would obviate the objections which had been on a former occasion urged against his measure. He concluded by moving the first reading of the bill.

The Duke of Wellington said, that if the bill had been introduced originally in its present shape, he should not have objected to it. If it were true that many accidents happened from the employment of spring-guns, it was no less true that property had been, to a considerable extent, protected by them. His object in the opposition which he had offered was, that the whole body of country gentlemen should not be under an imputation which they had not deserved.

Lord Ellenborough had no doubt that the loss of human life would be much greater after the bill should have passed, than it could be under the state of things which existed at present. If their lordships had resolved to legislate against all the accidents by which the lives of men were endangered, there could be no limit to the laborious task. He wished, at least, that some exception should be made in favour of such places as were surrounded by continued fences, and which, therefore, could not be entered under misapprehension, nor indeed with any but a felonious intent. The gardens in the neighbourhood of London principally owed their security to the engines which were set in them; and whatever might be said in favour of the principle of the bill, he had no doubt that its practical consequence would be to lay the whole of those gardens in particular open to the depredations of the thieves with which London abounded.

The Lord Chancellor said, the law, as it now stood, afforded some protection to the owners of gardens and orchards. By an act, as old as the reign of Queen Elizabeth, robbing orchards was made an offence; but owing to the youth of the persons by whom it was most commonly committed, the provisions of that act were rarely carried into effect. An act of the late King had provided against trespasses committed in gardens, by subjecting the offenders in the first instance to the penalty of 40s.; in the second, of 5l.; and in the third, to transportation. Still, however, it seemed desirable that the law upon these points should be made more clear and simple; and to effect this an opportunity would now be afforded, if it should be their lordships' pleasure to go into the committee.

The bill was then read a first time.

Upon the motion of Lord Suffield, the house then resolved itself into a committee on the other bill.

Lord Ellenborough proposed, as an amendment, that all walled and fenced grounds should be exempted from the operation of the bill.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that he should oppose the amendment, upon the broad principle, that spring-guns and other destructive engines were not a fit protection for private property. He would therefore move, as a further amendment, that the provisions of the bill should apply generally, and that it should be declared illegal to set spring-guns in any place whatever.

The house then divided on the last amendment by Lord Liverpool, when the numbers were—

Content, 28—Not Content, 5—Majority in favour of the amendment, 23.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 21.—On the motion for the second reading of the Spring Guns' bill,

Mr. Tansley could not refrain from expressing his strong disapprobation of the use of these mischievous instruments. The object, which was to protect property of a peculiar kind, was not sufficiently important to justify the means taken to attain it. The law writers declared that homicide was only justifiable in two cases—first, in order to prevent the commission of an atrocious crime punishable with death; and, secondly, in self-defence, when the person attacked could not otherwise escape. Now the purpose for which these destructive instruments were used fell under neither of these divisions. They often caused the deaths of innocent persons, and of those who, so far from having any hostile intention, came with friendly purposes to the place where these guns were concealed. A notice did not legalize the use of them. A man's land was not his garrison, that he might plant it round with guns.

Mr. S. Wortley denied that spring-guns were used by the rich alone. They were frequently and had been for many years employed by persons of very small property to protect their grounds from depredation. He contended that it was perfectly legal for a person to set spring-guns. If it were unlawful to do so, he knew not what was lawful. Every judge on the bench had over and over again declared, that it was legal for an individual, with due notice, to place such instruments on his grounds. The bill, therefore, in declaring the setting of spring-guns to be unlawful, proceeded on a false principle, and on that account he would vote against it. He thought it necessary to say so much of a measure which had come from the other house, when he recollected the manner in which some bills which had proceeded from the House of Commons had been commented on in that assembly (hear). It had been said that property might be protected by employing a great number of individuals for that purpose; but the consequence of such a proceeding was perpetual affrays between the invaders of property and its protectors. It had come to his knowledge that a party of poachers, having determined to go on an expedition at night, proceeded to canvass which was the most convenient place for the scene of their operations. A wood belonging to him was mentioned. The answer was, "No, there are spring-guns there!" It was then determined upon to visit the grounds of a gentleman who employed men to guard his property. The consequence was, a fight between the two parties, in which a poacher and a game-keeper were severely wounded.

Sir F. Burdett said, that it was almost impossible to produce an instance of spring-guns having taken effect upon the parties against whom they were directed; but instances were perpetually occurring of a kind of assassination (it deserved no better term) being committed on innocent persons (hear). He apprehended that it was not so clear a point as the hon. member (Mr. S. Wortley) supposed that persons had a right to set spring-guns. Previously to the last decision, the judges were divided upon that point. So tender was the English law of human life, that it would not permit it to be destroyed if a person could by any possible means defend his property without destroying it. It was totally inconsistent, then, with the humane principle of the law, blindly as it were to destroy individuals innocent or guilty, but who, if guilty, would not incur a penalty equal to that which was inflicted upon them by the setter of spring-guns. The greatest evil attendant on spring-guns was, their being applied to the protection of game. He could not coincide with those who thought so discredibly of English gentlemen as to believe that the preservation of game was indispensable to their residence in the country, and their performance of the various duties of their situation. To call such an argument in aid of the use of spring-guns was a proof of the weakness of the cause. The game laws generally were among the greatest evils with which the country was afflicted; and it was incumbent on the house to do what they could to put an end to a system which maintained a kind of civil war, and which prevented that good feeling which would otherwise subsist between the rich and the poor (hear). To give any effectual notice of setting these engines was absolutely impossible; and he did not believe that the practice of poaching had been at all checked by their adoption.

Lord Binning was in favour of the principle of the bill, as it applied to the question of game, but found some clauses in it regarding other subjects, to which he could not assent; for instance, the clause which forbade the setting of a spring-gun for any purpose whatever, even although it were not within a man's walled garden.

Mr. Scarlett thought the setting within a walled garden decidedly less objectionable than setting in a plantation; at the same time that setting would still be in opposition to the principle that a man should not do indirectly that which the law would not permit him to do directly. As regarded the question of game, it was too gross to talk of protecting by such means that which the law of the land did not go so far as to recognize even as property.

The house divided—For the bill, 39—Against it, 27—Majority, 12.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29.—On the third reading of the Spring Guns' bill, Lord Binning proposed to exempt gardens from the operation of the bill; this clause being agreed to.

Mr. Tennyson, though introducer of the bill, was determined to oppose it in its present form, because he wished to preserve the house in general, and himself in particular, from the odium of allowing the introduction of these destructive and diabolical engines, under any pretence whatever.

On the question that the bill do pass, the numbers were, — For the bill, 31 — Against it, 32—Majority against the bill, 1.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 7.—Mr. Stuart Wortley rose to move the second reading of the Game Laws' Amendment bill. In legislating upon this subject, it was proper to consider whether Parliament could not give protection to the amusements of country gentlemen without doing injustice to the country at large. The evils which resulted from the present system were many; but the most important was the great increase of poaching, and the consequent filling up of our jails with persons committed for an offence not considered a crime in a moral point of view. Severe laws, he was convinced, would not diminish the evil; it was necessary to generate a different feeling amongst the body of the people. That, then, should be his first object; and the next the opening of the market for the sale of game, and thereby destroying the monopoly which the poachers at present enjoyed. The existing system of qualification to kill game was most absurd. To be qualified to kill game, a man must have an estate or inheritance in his own or his wife's right of the yearly value of 100*l.* or a leasehold estate of the annual value of 15*l.* Those were the two principal qualifications; but there was another, derived from the accident of birth: gentlemen not possessing the power to kill game themselves, might confer that power to their children. Thus Doctors of Law, Barristers, Captains in the army and navy, whose eldest sons were allowed to shoot, had the great advantage of begetting shooters, while they could not shoot themselves; and what was still more ridiculous, at the father's decease there was an end of the son's qualification. He proposed to remove all qualifications, the only effect of which was to engender ill blood; and to give to every person who held land a property in the game which was on it, and a power to prevent any person from destroying it. There would be no more difficulty in making game property than fish in a river which ran through several estates. He did not propose to make the taking of game a felony; but there were many articles well protected by the laws which it was not a felony to steal. He did not believe that the change in the law which he projected would increase the number of sportsmen. If the bill should pass, it would be necessary for an individual, after taking out a license, to have the means of shooting. Under the existing system many persons went out to kill game who had no right to do so, and took the chance of being found out. The great objection which was urged against the bill last year was, that it would have the effect of destroying fox-hunting—that was to say, that farmers and other small land-holders, having property in the game on their land, would find it to their interest to kill the foxes. But when it was recollected that foxes were generally to be found only in great woods and preserves, where they might be protected by those who thought it worth their while to preserve them, he did not think that that objection was entitled to much weight. He should, indeed, be very sorry to do any thing to the prejudice of fox-hunting, which he considered a most manly and truly English sport. Another objection to the bill was, that it would render game so common in the market, that country gentlemen would soon give up all idea of sporting. He did not believe that: for his own part, he could say, that he did not feel less pleasure in shooting woodcock or wild fowl, or catching a fish, because he could buy such animals in the next town (hear).

Sir J. Brydges said that the present bill, instead of checking poaching would go to encourage it. All that the poacher wanted was a free vent for his plunder, which this measure went to afford him; for, like the smuggler, he could afford to sell his commodity cheaper than those who brought it lawfully to market. He was decidedly opposed to the bill, as regarded its effect upon the preservation of game; and not the less so because it added a new felony to the statute-book, in making night poaching (the third time) a transportable offence. Under these circumstances, he should move "that the bill be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. Lockhart thought, that the measure must promote the destruction of game. He could not truckle to any doctrine, that the destruction of a thing was desirable to diminish the crime of stealing it; for if such a proposition were admitted with respect to game, it must be equally applicable to every other species of property, and would propagate a system of the most dangerous depredation. He opposed the bill, not because he objected to the legalizing of the sale of game, but because the means by which the hon. member proposed to carry his measure into effect were calculated to produce greater evils and inconveniences than those which already existed under the present system of the Game Laws.

Mr. Peel had come down with a determination to vote for the bill before the house. When he looked to the antiquity of the Game Laws, and considered the great changes which had taken place with reference to that species of property, he could not but entertain a strong suspicion that those laws required alteration. He conceived that there was no one circumstance which tended to call for that alteration so strongly as the conduct of the game preservers themselves (hear, hear). The whole system of game, and of the sports connected with it, had changed, it should be recollected, within the last 30 or 40 years. Gentlemen were not contented to follow their birds now, as their fathers had done before them; every little cover almost throughout the country was a nursery for pheasants, and took rank as a preserve. The list of the killed and wounded after a week's sport became perfectly extraordinary; he had himself seen in one larder no fewer than a thousand pheasants, the product of three day's shooting; and yet, for all this immense mass of commodities, there was no legal sale (hear, hear). Now the increase in the quantity of game found in the country had produced a change, and a new feature in the public taste. Almost every body of a certain rank in life now partook of game, and, in fact, it was considered a very unfashionable thing not to have a certain quantity of game at one's table. It was true, that there was no legal vent for this enormous accumulation of game; but game nevertheless found its way among every class of society in the kingdom which had any pretensions to elegance or conviviality (hear, hear). It had been humourously said, but very justly, "You cannot hinder the three per cent. consols from eating pheasants" (hear, and laughter)—even if it were desirable to hinder them from doing so, which did not distinctly appear. Without going at all, therefore, into the question of detail, he thought there was enough in the bill of his hon. friend (Mr. Stuart Wortley) to warrant its being read a second time: without entering into the question of making game property, it was surely expedient for the present, to give every proprietor of land the power of killing, and selling it on his own estate; and it was not reasonable that a man who chose to preserve game should send it to feed on the crops of the neighbouring farmer, who had no right to kill it (hear, hear). A fair compromise would suit all parties best; and that was the end to which it would quickly come. The small proprietor would not find it worth his while to preserve game, and he would sell his right to his richer neighbour for a reasonable consideration (hear). Let the house look at the way in which game was preserved under the existing system: it must be preserved either by spring-guns, or by an armed force (hear, hear). He himself preserved his game in what was considered the mildest manner—he kept five or six keepers, with twenty or thirty attendants, who were subject to be called out in case of any attack on the keepers, and, if necessary, to repel force by force. This was surely a most unsatisfactory mode of preserving any species of property, and it necessarily introduced a great deal of ill blood between the game preserver and the inhabitants of the district in which he resided (hear, hear). Then for the spring-guns, besides the constant liability to accident from the use of such engines, their effect was to take away life unjustifiably (hear, hear). With respect to the suggestion of altering the scheme of qualification, to let the matter rest where it stood, was in times like the present, quite impossible. According to the present law, a gentleman might have an estate of several thousands a year, and yet not be able to qualify his second son to shoot game. He might be a magistrate; and in his official capacity, might be called upon to put the law in force against his son (hear, hear). A system very like that suggested by the present bill was pursued in Scotland; and in Scotland, for many years past, the game had considerably increased. In Scotland every man who possessed a ploughgate of land could qualify whom he pleased to kill game upon that property. At the same time he was bound to admit, he did not think the bill before the house would fulfil the expectations of either party. Those who were afraid of it would find they had been mistaken; and those who supported it would perhaps be disappointed: for the truth was, looking at the quantity of game in this country, he did not think that any measure would entirely repress poaching (hear, hear). The poacher acted upon two motives—the love of sport and the love of money. The love of sport would operate under any system of law; the man who liked to shoot pheasants for amusement, would shoot them. But the second motive—the love of gain—the bill before the house would go to weaken considerably. The poacher now supplied all the markets with game; he had no one to compete with him, and his trade was a lucrative one; but the case would be much altered when the gentleman who had a thousand pheasants to dispose of, and not even friends to give them to, came to undersell him (hear). The poacher now furnished the whole supply; if the bill before the house were carried, he would only furnish part of it. And he would furnish but a small part; for all other articles sold openly were purchased from those who came fairly by them: and what was there about game to place it in a different situation? It was said by some, that gentlemen would not like to sell game. That he did not comprehend. Gentlemen sold their rabbits already, without remorse; and why the person who sold a couple of rabbits should not sell a hare, he could not tell (hear, hear). Another statement was, that the desire to pursue game would cease when it could be openly purchased; but to this there seemed, as had already been suggested, to be a complete and immediate answer. Partridges and pheasants could not now be bought in the markets, woodcocks might; but no one thought of shooting a pheasant or a partridge where there was a chance of a woodcock being found. His opinion was, decidedly, that the present bill would work perfectly well before it had been three years in operation; but at all events it was absolutely necessary that the game-laws should be revised, and settled upon some reasonable principle (hear, hear). The best thing that could be done was to throw the same sanction round game that belonged to other property. In case the bill before the house should be thrown out, he would introduce a measure to legalize the sale of game. To allow a man to sell that which he had already power to give, could do nobody any mischief (cheering).

Mr. John Douglas opposed the bill, as tending to destroy all the game in the country. If people were allowed to purchase game openly, they would eat so much of it, that there would soon be none left. Eating game would become a custom; and people would look for their pheasant on the 1st of October, as regularly as they did already for their goose on Michaelmas-day. The hon. member supported his argument against the bill, by observing, that if foxes and game were destroyed, country gentlemen would look to other sports, and would, very probably, dissipate their time and their money in those graves of property which were kept up in St. James's Street.

Sir J. Yorke said, it must be evident that the present restrictive laws on the sale of game did not prevent its being supplied in the largest quantities in the metropolis. It was proved in the committee up stairs, that two poulterers said they could furnish the whole House of Commons, twice a-week, with two head of game for each member; and one of them added, that on one occasion he threw 1000 head of partridges into the Thames, not being able to obtain a sale for them.

Mr. W. Peel opposed the bill, on the ground that much evil would arise from legalizing the sale of game. The proposed alteration of the game-laws would, in his opinion, interfere with the recreations of the country gentlemen.

Sir J. Sturges supported the bill. The law, as it now stood, was extremely objectionable, as it operated to prevent men from doing what they pleased with their own property. Some gentlemen seemed to have great prejudices against any innovation in the game-laws, because they looked upon the present state of things as perfectly natural. A friend of his, when informed that game was publicly sold in several large tracts of country on the European continent, which he called "abroad," expressed great surprise at the information, observing very gravely, that it was quite "unnatural." Prejudices of this kind were not uncommon in the house. They had heard, a short time ago, some gentlemen opposing the repeal of the usury laws, because they considered that 5 per cent. was the "natural" interest of money; and they had also heard of some hon. members opposing the bill for Catholic Emancipation, because, forsooth, Protestants were "naturally" opposed to the claims of the Catholics. These were the prejudices of habit, and ought to be got rid of. He would support the bill, because it tended to put an end to the present system of poaching.

The house then divided, when there appeared—For the second reading, 82—For the amendment, 26—Majority, 56.

THURSDAY, MARCH 24.—On the motion of Mr. Stuart Wortley, the house went into a committee on the Game Laws bill.

On the clause that game be made the property of the owner of the land,

Mr. Leicester objected to the principle of this clause, as being too ambiguous and as attempting too much; he thought that they would do quite enough if they rendered it saleable.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said that he could not agree to this amendment, as it would entirely destroy the object of his bill.

The clause was carried.

Mr. Leicester wished to know who was to be considered as the "beneficial proprietor" in cases of lease under tenant for life or in tail.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that the property must, like the produce of the land, be held to be not in the mere occupier, but in the owner of the land.

Mr. J. Martin objected to the injustice of taking the property of the game out of the lessee, and vesting it in the lessor. He thought that the occupier had the best title, and moved an amendment accordingly.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that he must persist in assigning the interest of the "beneficial occupier," as it respected the property of the game, to the owner of the land—the only party whom the house could acknowledge in this case. As he was entitled primarily to the produce of the soil, so the property of the game must vest in him.—The committee then divided—

For the clause, 33—For the amendment, 4—Majority, 29.

The house then resumed.

MONDAY, MARCH 28.—Mr. S. Wortley having moved the commitment of his bill for amending the Game Laws,

Mr. Tennyson moved that a clause be inserted, repealing the 21st Edw. I. s. 2, by which it was enacted, that "if any forester or parker shall find any trespassers wandering within his liberty, intending to do damage therein, and that will not yield themselves after hue and cry made to stand unto the peace, but do continue their malice, and disobeying the king's peace do flee, or defend themselves with force and arms, although such forester, parker, or their assistants, do kill such offenders, they shall not be troubled upon the same;" and repealing also the 4th and 5th of William and Mary, c. 23, s. 4, by which the same indemnity is extended to gamekeepers resisting offenders in the night-time.

The clause was agreed to, and the house resumed.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.—Mr. S. Wortley moved the third reading of the Game Laws Amendment bill.

Sir J. Shelley thought that this subject had not been very fairly treated, on former occasions, either by his hon. friend who had introduced the bill, or the rt. hon. Secretary (Peel). The argument which was urged in support of this bill seemed to be two-fold: first, that the existing game laws filled our gaols with criminals; and secondly, that the passing of the bill would do away entirely, or very nearly, with the crimes for which persons offending against such existing laws were now so frequently committed. In 1818, 1819, and 1820, there were, it was true, more commitments than in any year before, but this was owing to the depressed state of agriculture. Since that period crimes had not increased, and certainly there was no increase of the offence of poaching. In 1200 commitments in one of the returns, only 581 were commitments under the game laws. There was not a sufficient space in England to breed game for an open market, and the climate was against such a system. He could call this bill nothing but a popular democratic bill, although some of its clauses were ultra-aristocratic, particularly the second clause, that gave the right of free warren and free chase to landlords, and by which a man might be punished for destroying game, or a rabbit upon grounds in his own occupation. He moved that the bill should be read that day six months.

Mr. H. Sumner opposed the bill. By its provisions they would only change the denomination of the crime. They would, if the measure succeeded, have the gaols filled with as many thieves as they were previously with poachers.

Mr. R. Colborne observed, that as the law at present stood, it favoured an interchange of civilities between the landlord and his tenant. If the latter preserved the game, the former was in the constant habit of presenting him with it in return. But, should this bill pass, there would be an end to those civilities. If the measure now introduced would do away with poaching, then he would say, agree to it, but as he conceived it would have no such effect, he would oppose it.

Sir H. Vivian called on the house to look particularly at the effect which this bill was likely to have on country gentlemen, who frequently visited their estates for the purpose of sporting. It would encourage poaching, and put an end to fox-hunting, a sport of which he was fond, and the enjoyment of which drew many gentlemen to the country. Fox-hunting was not so useless an amusement as some persons imagined. In proof of this, he instanced the opinion of the Duke of Wellington (who, he observed, had added much to our military glory), that for service that required exertion and dispatch, he always preferred those officers who had been accustomed to cross a country (hear, hear, and a laugh). He (Sir H. Vivian) fully concurred in this opinion, and had invariably acted upon it.

Mr. Stuart Wortley, in reply, observed, that his great object was to introduce a law which would protect game, without occasioning all the evils which manifestly attended the present system. Whether under this measure there would be a little more, or a little less game, was, he conceived, a matter of minor importance (hear). The law, as it now stood, occasioned most men to look upon a poacher as one who ought not to be condemned, but pitied; and he knew no way of removing that feeling, except by altering the legal denomination of game, and making it property. It had been said that stolen game might be sold to the salesman. That was true; but it was equally true with respect to poultry. With respect to the interference of this measure with fox-hunting (which, after all, appeared to be the great objection against it, in the minds of several hon. members), he never could treat the argument seriously. He was a fox-hunter himself, and he respected fox-hunters, and therefore would do nothing to destroy that sport. But he must say, that it did not depend on the preservation of game, but on the fitness of the country for it, and on the estimation in which a gentleman was held.

The house then divided. The numbers were, For the third reading, 94—Against it, 69—Majority, 25.

LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 9.—Lord Dacre, in moving the second reading of the Game Laws' Amendment bill, said, that the evil consequences of the present law were fully evinced in its effects upon the habits and morals of the agricultural population; indeed, it was impossible that any question could come before the house, which more deeply involved the happiness of that class of people. Game was originally the property of the proprietor of the land; and if in subsequent ages the legislature took it from him, it now behoved their lordships to restore it to its former owner. The noble lord then observed upon the various legislative enactments by which the law on this subject had been altered. These enactments excluded all small proprietors and owners of personal property from the enjoyment of game. This exclusion worked a double injustice towards the small proprietor, for whilst it shut him out from the enjoyment of game, it authorized the large proprietor, who was his neighbour, to accumulate such a number of hares and other animals as to threaten his crops with destruction. If the present bill passed, it would be followed by such mutual arrangements between the large and small proprietors, as would have the effect of completely checking the depredations of poachers, which the present system was calculated to encourage. Where there were forty millions of personal property in the kingdom, how could their lordships say that not one of the owners of this was to be allowed to possess property in a single hare? A large majority of the trials with which the sessions were now occupied for several days, instead of a few hours as formerly, were for crimes resulting from the game laws. It was notorious that the general average of those in prison under the game laws, amounted to from 1100 to 1500 persons in the year. This was a great evil, to have the most enterprising and most active part of the population committed to prison for an act not in itself a moral offence—not coming under the class of mala per se, but mala prohibita; and it would appear the more serious, when they reflected that there was hardly an instance of a notorious poacher, who, after undergoing imprisonment, did not proceed to the commission of crimes. The offence of poaching itself was, in fact, increased by the existing law, and it was to its prevalence that he attributed much of the general increase of crime throughout the country, which was so universally admitted and deplored. The only remedy for the evil would be the enactment making game the property of the owner of the land, and allowing the sale of game subject to certain regulations. Something must be done to remove the evils of the system, and he considered the present measure, with some slight amendments which might be made in it, the best that could be adopted for that purpose.

The Earl of Westmoreland opposed a measure which affected the rights and habits of every one of the King's subjects. The noble lord opposite kept back from the house what this bill really was. He spoke of it as one of popular rights and fairness; but it was really a most tyrannical and despotic measure (a laugh), and borrowed itself only from the horrors of the French Revolution (renewed laughter); ay, noble lords might laugh, but he repeated, that it borrowed itself from the horrors of the French Revolution. This measure would deprive every man in the kingdom of amusement, except a favoured few. What was the use of giving game to a small proprietor, who could not pursue it? He might, indeed, stand on a hedge and shoot, or he might set snares. But supposing that the owner of the land might pursue game, it should be proved that it was the same game, otherwise a man might be taken by the collar, and given into custody. Another objection which he had to it was, that the taking of game against this act, was not only held to be a trespass, but a robbery; so that the whole of the sportsmen of the country might thus be indicted as robbers. He would admit, with the noble lord, that the evils of poaching were great and general, and he would most willingly concur with him in any measure for its suppression; but the present bill was not calculated to diminish the evil. It was intended to make game (which was heretofore considered feræ naturæ) property; but this, he contended, would be a greater evil than that already in existence, and would render any cure much more difficult than before. Another objection to the bill was, that it would put an end to one good effect of the game laws as they now existed—their tendency to preserve the peace of the country (hear, hear). He would repeat it—they had that effect, by preventing arms from being in the hands of the great body of the people; but this bill would allow the possession of arms to almost every class of the community. For these reasons he would move, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months.

The Earl of Malmesbury was unwilling to alter the principle of the game laws, because they afforded a great inducement to the residence of country gentlemen on their estates.

The Earl of Darley supported the bill. As to the observation that the present laws were calculated to act as an inducement to country gentlemen to reside on their estates, they would have the same inducement under the proposed law; for the fact of game being made property could not hinder gentlemen from preserving it less than they did before.

Lord Callhorne believed that the most fruitful source of the evils flowing from the existing laws was to be found in the prohibition of the sale of game. On these grounds he would support the bill. He hoped it would not be considered that they were sitting there as landowners, but that they had other and important duties to perform.

Lord Suffield considered that the present game laws were a prolific source of crime, and therefore this bill had his warmest support. It would remove all doubts as to the old law respecting the right of property to game, which always was, and still remained, vested in the owner of the soil, though heretofore shackled with impolitic and degrading regulations, which had only the effect of filling the gaols with criminals, the result of a traffic in which multitudes had illegally engaged. There still would be every incentive for the fair amusement of gentlemen, without the attendant horrors of the old system of law. This alteration was due to the present state of society, and to the nature of property which had grown up in the country. The possessor of land ought surely to be allowed both to kill game on his land, and to allow others to do so under certain regulations, and he denied that the tenant would be less disposed to preserve the game by proper means than the landlord.

The house divided upon the amendment—Content, 38—Not content, 23—Majority, 15. The bill was accordingly rejected.

CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.

Unitarians' Marriage Bill.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MARCH 25.—On the motion for the second reading of the Unitarians' Marriage bill,

Mr. W. Smith stated, that the parties, on whose behalf he should submit that motion, were the Unitarian Dissenters of this country, who entertained no objection to the prevailing form of marriage in the Established Church, other than that which regarded the introduction of language that expressed certain sentiments to which they could not conscientiously agree.—All that they asked was, to be relieved from the necessity of repeating a certain form of language which invoked the name of the Trinity. It had been the anxious desire of himself, and of those who were connected with him, so to frame this bill as to avoid injuring the feelings of any other class of his Majesty's subjects. The bill was almost in all respects the same which, being introduced by him about three years ago into that house, had received no respectable a sanction.

Mr. Robertson thought that the Church of England was essential to the safety of the throne of England. Pull down the one, and the other could not stand. The safety of such establishments ought not to be endangered merely to satisfy the scruples of a small minority of dissentients. If Parliament gave this sort of relief to one set of men, they must to another: and similar dispensations must be conceded to every class of Dissenters in the kingdom. The hon. gent. then entered into a short historical review of the mischievous effects that had at different times ensued to states, from connexions with Presbyterians, Puritans, and Unitarians. To the Unitarians, however, he must deny the title they had so absurdly assumed of Christians—dissenting Christians. They might be much more properly denominated Mahometans, whom they much more nearly resembled (laughter). He begged the house to remember the conduct of the Puritans in the time of Charles I. Their authority commenced with small beginnings; but in a short time they became a most formidable body. Buckingham thought it necessary to court their power; but they soon became the masters of Buckingham, and the arbiters of the fate of their sovereign. They got the reins of government into their own hands, and what the consequences were every person conversant with the history of the country must know perfectly well. Therefore, Parliament ought to watch narrowly what they granted to the parties who were now before them, lest they should be induced to take too much upon themselves. He admitted that those principles of Puritanism did not now appear in so strong and decided a point of view, as they had done at the period to which he had alluded. But they ought never to lose sight of the fact, that it was puritanism which induced the Scotch to sell their King, and the English afterwards to butcher him (hear). He should oppose the bill from a firm conviction that great mischief would arise, if the concession called for were granted.

Dr. Lushington said, that the relief which the Dissenters sought for in the present instance, was not attempted to be violently wrested from the church of England, but was called for as a concession which should, in justice, be received at her hands. What said the Unitarian Dissenters? They declared, that they could not agree with the marriage ceremony, as solemnized in the Church of England, because it was at variance with their religious sentiments.—Some of the most respected Prelates of the established church, the Bishops of London, Llandaff, and Exeter, had said, "We will not take on ourselves to judge whether your scruples are well or ill-founded—we will not go into the examination of the marriage service—we will not go into the grounds on which your opinion is founded. It would be useless for us to proceed with such an examination, because we know, that in all matters of religious belief, the conscience of the individual must alone be looked to." He would take the liberty of reading the opinions of the Archbishops, and several of the Bishops of Ireland, in 1782, when a bill was brought into the Irish Parliament, for the purpose of allowing Dissenters to be married by ministers of their own persuasion. They opposed that bill, with reference to some of its points; but with respect to its principle they entirely concurred. "We are," they said, "willing to pass a bill rendering all marriage contracts or marriages hereafter to be entered into between Protestant Dissenters, and solemnized by Protestant Dissenting ministers, or persons approved of by the congregation, as good and valid to all intents and purposes, as marriages would be if performed by ministers of the established church;" and then they stated the grounds of objection which they had to some of the clauses in this particular bill.—Now, it should be observed, that this qualified protest was drawn up by individuals who held the highest situations in the established church. They felt that the right of marriage was intimately connected with the principle of toleration itself. This was a right very different from that of sitting in Parliament, very different from various civil rights, to the attainment of which certain forms were necessary by law. The right of marriage was a natural right. Then came the question, whether the plan now proposed was not the best mode of admitting that right, without infringing on the rights of the established church? As the business at present stood, there were but two ways in which the marriage of Dissenters could be performed without wounding their religious scruples. The one was, to alter the liturgy of the Church of England; the other to suffer the Dissenters to be married by their own pastors. The first course would, he was sure, be at variance with the feelings of the clergy of the established church; and certainly in his opinion, their feelings ought to be attended to. If a measure appeared to militate against their feelings, or to be opposed to their rights, it would be inconsistent with good policy, or with justice, to press it forward. But even if the liturgy were altered, new sects of Dissenters might arise, new regulations might be called for, and it would be beyond the power of human wisdom to propose any form of marriage to meet all the diversities of religious opinion.—Some bodies of Dissenters were adverse to the solemnization of the marriage ceremony by any clergyman at all; and therefore it was clear that no alteration in the liturgy would produce an unanimity of feeling. Long after the establishment of Christianity, marriage was not considered a religious rite. It became so under the Pontificate of Pope Innocent III.; but even in places on the Continent where marriage was held to be a sacrament, it was not deemed necessary that marriage should be celebrated in a church at all. Nor was it the case here, until the passing of Lord Hardwicke's act, which was passed for the protection of property. He was of opinion that, by taking the course pointed out by this bill, the Dissenters on the one hand, would not be compelled to violate their religious scruples; and, on the other, the interests of the church would not be invaded. By allowing marriages to be solemnized in the way proposed, all bickering and animosity would be put an end to. But he would ask, could it strengthen the interests of piety—could it render religious feelings more ardent—could it add to the interests of morality—to bring individuals before a church for the purpose of performing an important duty, when they did not believe in certain tenets held by that church? Why should any human being be called on to state, with his mouth, his belief of that which he abhorred in his heart? Why should any human being be obliged, before the altar of God, to hold language against which he felt himself bound to protest almost at the very moment he was uttering it? He thought nothing could be conceived more disgraceful than those scenes which had already taken place at the marriages of Unitarians, when protests were tendered to the officiating clergyman. Nothing, in his mind, could be more injurious to the church than the performance of the marriage ceremony, coupled with a protest against the forms to which the parties were obliged to submit. Could any thing be more repugnant to feeling than to mark one of those scenes, where the clergyman was told to his face, "We are compelled to come here. Unless we are guilty of a breach of our conscientious feelings, we cannot enter into this contract as you would wish us. We therefore protest against this proceeding." But though they had made severe laws on the subject of marriage, yet a strange anomaly was suffered to exist. In this country a couple had only to cross the Tweed, and throw themselves on the mercy of a blacksmith, and, the ceremony being performed, the husband might come back and claim all the rights, privileges, benefits, and advantages which would result from the solemn marriage in this country. This shewed that it was the principle of the law of England and of the Constitution, not to compel parties to submit to ceremonies which were revolting to their own peculiar religious principles and feelings. He did not mean to uphold all the details of this bill; it contained two points that ought to be most guardedly examined. One of these was, that it should not be made subsidiary to the performance of clandestine marriages; and next, that the provisions of the bill should not interfere with the privileges and interests of the established clergy. He would, as the bill intended, suffer Dissenters to be married by license; but he would recommend the adoption of proper measures to prevent the celebration of clandestine marriages. The subject of registration was one of the greatest importance. He had heard it said, that the established clergy of England objected to the mode in which it was proposed that those marriages should be registered. If this were the case he would alter that part of the bill, and give the clergy no real cause of offence. He wished that the subject of the marriage law in general, should receive the most serious consideration, because the period was fast arriving, when, if they did not new model it in some respects, the most lamentable inconvenience would be experienced. He turned his attention, it would at once be perceived, to the marriage law in Ireland, which loudly called for revision; and though the suggestions which he had at different times thrown out on this subject, might be repulsive to the feelings of many whose opinions he wished most sincerely to consult and to conciliate, still he felt that ultimately the subject must be considered, and he believed those suggestions must be acted on. Such was the state of the marriage law in that country, that it appeared to him necessary, that some civil form should be adopted, by which marriage might be contracted; and after that form had been gone through, such religious rites or ceremonies might be introduced as were consistent with the faith of the parties contracted, and as would render the contract more binding. His reason for adopting this process was, because it was beyond the ingenuity of man to find out the religious belief, or the shades of religious belief, by which different individuals were influenced.

Mr. Peel said, that as the present bill was a measure the object of which was to give relief to tender consciences, he thought every opportunity should be afforded for removing any difficulties connected with it. He therefore would agree to its going into a committee, where the hon. gent. who brought it forward would have full scope for meeting those objections which might be urged against it. He admitted with the learned gent. that the right of marriage stood on very different grounds from the right of holding civil offices, or of obtaining civil privileges. He was sorry that the scruples, to meet which this bill was brought in, existed at present. For 40 or 50 years the Dissenters had not objected to that mode of solemnizing marriage against which they now protested, and he was concerned that they were not still prepared to accede to the system which had so long continued. Last session, they were told that a scruple existed in the minds of the Unitarians on this subject; but who could tell what was the extent of that scruple, except the individual who felt it? Could any one tell how far scruples might extend—how far doubts might proceed—with reference to other sects? How, then, were they to legislate so as to give satisfaction to all? The learned gent. wished the house to go at present as far as this bill went; but he had observed, that if this bill were carried, it would be followed by various others, to embrace every species of scruple which might be felt by the Dissenters. Now it would be more satisfactory to him (Mr. Peel) if he knew clearly the extent to which it was intended this measure should be urged? In point of fact, the learned gent. ought not to vote for this bill at all; because, on his own showing, it would not give relief to the Unitarians. The learned gent. had said, that many of them objected to going before a clergyman at all. Then he (Mr. Peel) must contend, that at least to these Unitarians the bill afforded no relief whatever. And why? Because the bill viewed marriage as a religious ceremony, and pointed out the manner of its religious celebration. If every man in society were allowed to select the individual by whom he should be married, the marriage vow, he was quite sure, would not be observed with that sanctity with which it was observed at present. The Quakers and Jews were exempted from the operation of the marriage act: they were allowed to marry according to their own rites. The present bill, however, did not place the Unitarians on a level with the Jews and Quakers. No: according to this measure, the Unitarian marriages are to be registered in the Church of England. Now the Jews and Quakers had nothing to do with the Church of England: their marriages were solemnized according to their own forms, and registered in their own peculiar way. It was proposed to suffer these Unitarian marriages to be performed under license. But here a considerable difficulty arose. If he could give relief to sincere Unitarians, without incurring considerable danger, he would readily do so. If he could easily recognize such Unitarians, his difficulty would be at an end: but pretended religious scruples might be professed, for the purpose of evading the law of the land; and the chance of such occurrences ought to be carefully guarded against. The Jew and the Quaker could be easily discerned by their garb and their manners. The moment they were seen they were known. They could not practice deceit with any hope of success. But if a stolen match were intended between a Protestant and an Unitarian, for the purpose of securing a property, it would be difficult, from the garb or manner of either, to discover that any clandestine proceeding was contemplated. It was also provided by this bill, that banns should be proclaimed in the Unitarian chapel and the Protestant church. But a Protestant parent was not likely to attend a Unitarian chapel, neither was it probable that a Unitarian parent would attend a Protestant church. How, then, could any system of collusion be discovered? If they passed this bill, they certainly would not have the same check on improper marriages as they had at present. With respect to the question of registration, it was proper to observe the mode in which the Jews and Quakers proceeded. They proved their marriage in the ordinary way; and if that marriage appeared to be valid, according to their respective institutions, no farther proceeding was necessary. But with respect to the marriage of Unitarians, a registration was required by this bill. Now, certainly, the clergy of the church of England might feel sincere and conscientious scruples as to this registration. By this bill Unitarians might be married in their own chapels, but it was a positive injunction on the clergy of the church of England to register these marriages in the church of England books. According to the doctrine of the church of England, marriage was not merely a civil, but a religious ceremony; it was denominated "holy matrimony;" and, by the present bill, the clergyman was called upon to enter in that book, which was appropriated to the insertion of entries relative to what the church of England viewed as a religious ceremony, the marriages of parties who denied the divinity of our Saviour! But that entry was not to be originally made there. The original entry was placed in the Unitarian chapel. So that, if the party married wanted a copy of the entry from the church books, for any legal purpose—what did he receive? He received the copy of a copy. He did not get the best evidence that could be procured. Why not say, at once, that by law the church of England should have nothing to do with this registration (hear, hear)? Why not declare that the record of marriage should be furnished in a regular manner by the Unitarian body, to some proper office? He certainly would not oppose the second reading of the bill, but he must observe, that while he could not coincide in all the opinions expressed by an hon. gent. (Mr. Robertson), he respected that gent. for the manly boldness with which he had delivered his sentiments. He did not entertain those fears as to the safety of the church of England which the hon. gent. seemed to feel, in the event of this measure being agreed to. He, however, saw clearly enough the difficulties which were connected with the bill; and after the intimation which had been given that a number of measures were contemplated if this bill were carried, he hoped that some distinct principle would be laid down, to let the house understand the extent to which it was expected they would go.

The bill was then ordered to be committed on Tuesday next (and subsequently passed)

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 3.—The Marquis of Lansdown moved the second reading of the Unitarians' Marriage bill. The bill related to a grievance not very difficult of remedy, but not the less felt by those whom it affected. The object of the measure was to remove the difficulties which stood in the way of the performance of the marriage ceremony with regard to certain individuals. Every unnecessary restriction and regulation which affected particular classes of persons in regard to such an object as marriage, ought surely to be done away without delay; and on this subject it was their lordships' duty to give every relief which was consistent with the safety of the state. Only those regulations which appeared to be called for by necessity ought to be maintained. The different regulations adopted in this and other countries resolved themselves into two kinds—namely, civil and religious. With regard to the former, in as far as related to matters of police, the bill maintained every civil right. The persons for whose benefit it was introduced were ready to submit to any civil regulation on the subject of marriage which their lordships might think fit to impose. The religious part of the question was totally distinct from the civil; and all that the bill proposed to do, was to provide against the depreciation of the sacred ceremony of marriage by regulations to which Unitarians could not conscientiously submit. In framing the bill the greatest attention had been paid to the feelings of all parties. Thus, in consequence of some of the ministers of the Established Church having objected to registering the marriages of persons who were united by a ceremony inconsistent with the principles of the church; the Unitarians, to obviate this difficulty, took upon themselves the expense of registering their own marriages. In fact, the bill professed to do, and did nothing more than afford relief from regulations inconsistent with the conscientious scruples of individuals. None of their lordships would say that the opinions of the persons whom the bill proposed to relieve were not tolerated by law; and being so, the law ought to protect them, and facilitate to them the means of duly forming the most sacred of all the relations of society. It would perhaps, be asked, why were the persons for whose benefit the bill was framed so scrupulous? Some, he was aware, might make a compromise with conscience, and be able to satisfy themselves of the propriety of every opinion that was consistent with their temporal interests; but their lordships surely would not encourage a species of reasoning which led to a disregard of the truth of the most solemn declarations. Their lordships ought not to discountenance or despise scruples which were opposed to a practice inconsistent with morality and religion. On these grounds, he proposed the second reading of this bill.

The Archbishop of Canterbury intended to support the bill, because its tendency was equally to relieve Unitarians and ministers of the Established Church. The scruples of the Unitarians he believed to be sincere; but he was chiefly anxious to remove the difficulties in which ministers of the Church were involved by Unitarian marriages. He wished to do away with that unhallowed equivocation which now, under sanction of the law, took place at the altar.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells felt himself bound to state as briefly as possible the reasons which impelled him to oppose the principle of this measure. He did not see on what grounds marriage, according to the rites of the Church of England, was to be considered a grievance to the Unitarians. First, what were they called upon to subscribe? Merely the parties' names. He admitted, that they were obliged to make a declaration "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" but these very words were used in their own printed form of prayer. The words used by the Unitarians in their ceremony of baptism were—"I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." They therefore could not justly object to their own form of prayer. He also admitted that the clergyman who performed the ceremony of marriage pronounced the benediction, in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. Now, if they did not think that they were the better for this, surely they could not feel themselves the worse for it. He defended the ministers of the Church of England from the charge of equivocation in the performance of this ceremony from the Unitarians. There was no ground whatever for such a charge, for the word equivocation implied saying one thing and meaning another, for the purpose of deception. Now there was no deception here, because the minister knew beforehand the opinions of the Unitarians, and the Unitarians knew those of the minister, so that neither party was deceiving or deceived. He therefore repelled with indignation the charge brought against the ministers of the Church; they were neither guilty of equivocation nor pious fraud. He denied that the Unitarians had any just grounds for saying that their consciences were violated. Occasions were continually occurring when points of doctrine laid down by ministers of the Church were disapproved of by some individuals, who said they would not again go to church to hear them; but that was no reason why the Church of England should not lay down the pure doctrines of Christianity. If the minister of the Gospel did not propound the true principles of faith in Christ Jesus, how else was the gainsayer to be converted? He contended that if this privilege were ceded to the Unitarians, it must also be granted to every other sect, however erroneous their opinions might be. The doctrine of the Unitarians gave them no right to be looked upon as a favoured sect; yet this concession would be calculated to give a spread to the opinions of that sect; although by denying the divinity of Christ, they laid the axe to the root of the tree of Christianity itself. For these reasons he moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day three months.

The Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry considered the opinions of the Unitarians as utterly destitute of foundation; and grossly erroneous as they were, he must believe them to affect their conduct; but still he looked upon their present complaint as founded on fair grounds, and he conceived the bill entitled to their lordships' support, as being calculated to deliver the Church of England from the scandalous profanation of a compromise at the altar. He was a general friend to toleration; although he did not wish to give any encouragement to sectaries; but he did not conceive that the present bill would operate as any encouragement to them.

The Lord Chancellor would be very glad if any noble lord would inform him what he meant by the word "Unitarian;" for if a Unitarian were a person who denied the divinity of Christ, their lordships, before they could pass this bill, must first pass an act rendering it lawful for him to hold and propagate such opinions. The fact was that by 9th Will. III. certain penalties were enacted against Unitarians, who are denounced as blasphemers in the preamble of the act. That act was subsequently repealed; but up to this moment the profession of Unitarian opinions was an offence at common law. He considered the doctrines of the Unitarians as calculated to work an essential mischief in this country, and he called upon the house not to sanction that which the Judges of Westminster Hall must deny in judgment.

The Earl of Liverpool observed that Jews and Quakers might lawfully marry according to the rites of their own communions; for they were excepted in Lord Hardwicke's act. Now could any man assert that the doctrines of the Unitarians were more at variance with the principles of Christianity than those of the Jews were? The Unitarians denied the divinity of Christ; but the Jews denied the truth of Christianity altogether—they blasphemed and crucified him whom we adored. The same argument would apply to Mahometans and various other persuasions, if the members of them were sufficiently numerous in this country. But how did the law stand at present? In some cases marriage according to the rites of the Church of England was not necessary even amongst members of the Church of England itself; for they might go to France and be married by a Roman Catholic, or to Scotland and be married by a Presbyterian, and in both cases the marriage was binding. He believed that if, in a country where a priest could not be had, a marriage were performed by a civil person, that marriage was valid by law; and the reason was, that every possible facility might be given to marriage, in order to prevent immorality. A rt. rev. prelate had asked, if the concession were to be made to the Unitarians, why not extend it to every other sect? The answer was, because it was impracticable. When a bill had been brought in for that purpose by a noble lord, he (Lord Liverpool) voted for it; but he afterwards stated, that he could not give it his support in the committee, having been convinced, by the speech of a noble friend of his, that it would be impossible to frame a general act to meet the object in view. They had an example for the present measure in the case of the Quakers. He thought, that where a sincere and conscientious objection was entertained, it ought to be respected. A Jew could not, a Quaker could not, a Unitarian could not, submit to have the ceremony performed by the Church of England, or, if he could, it was only by casting a slur on that church; for their lordships constantly saw in the papers statements of protests which must have filled them with disgust. The Church had a right, and it was her duty, to compel marriage according to her own rites, amongst her own members; but as she did not assume to be an infallible church, he did not see why she should look with any jealousy on the doctrines of those who were of a different communion. He therefore saw no objection to the present bill, and would give it his support.

The Bishop of Chester said, that there could be no question as to the importance of this subject to the Unitarians. If they were sincere in their belief respecting the divinity of the Trinity—and the awful grounds of their dissent would not permit him to doubt of their sincerity—and if they really considered that by submitting to the ceremony of marriage in the Church of England they were brought to worship the Trinity, he certainly thought them entitled to relief. He agreed that the present measure would afford not only relief to the Unitarians, but also to the clergy of the Church of England; and he would therefore put the former on the same footing with the Quakers, and all the other Dissenters, before the passing of the marriage act. He was not for imposing the doctrine or the discipline of the Church of England upon those who could not conscientiously entertain them: but the Unitarians were not prepared at present to give the necessary securities against clandestinity, and, consequently, he was impelled to oppose this bill. As, however, there was no very great grievance imposed upon the consciences of the Unitarians, he thought that, after having submitted so long, they might submit for one year longer to the privation of what he considered a right.

Lord Calthorpe contended, that it was unfair to place the Unitarians on the same footing as any other Dissenters, because, to other Dissenters who did not, like the Unitarians, deny the doctrine of the Trinity, the marriage ceremony was no hardship, but it was to Unitarians a very great one. He would not attempt to impugn the legal argument of the learned lord on the woolsack, but the present law, admitting it to be correctly stated by the learned lord, afforded, in his mind, a strong reason for passing the bill. The church could not better promote her true interests than by conforming herself to the increasing knowledge and genius of the age. Nothing could be more injurious to her than to place her in opposition to liberal ideas. The church was able to rely on her own strength, and might, without fear, appeal to the augmented learning and assiduity of her clergy, to the increased number of her churches, and to the two great universities, which year after year sent forth distinguished champions to uphold her rank and maintain her security. He supported the measure, because he believed that it would add to the dignity and character of the Church of England.

The house divided—For the second reading—Content, 32—Proxies, 20—52.—Not content, 31—Proxies, 25—56.—Majority against the bill, 4.

Unitarian Dissenters.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 21.—Mr. W. Smith rose to present a petition signed by a small number of individuals, who were, however, well known and of great respectability, complaining of the situation in which they were placed by the existing laws affecting the profession of certain religious opinions. It had been stated (by the Lord Chancellor) in another house, in respect to the laws affecting Unitarians, that before any act could be passed for relieving them from the operation of particular statutes, it would be well that some bill should be passed to protect them from the penalties to which they were still subject at common law. From the same high quarter, there proceeded an appeal which it was impossible not to perceive to be addressed to him (Mr. S.) personally, and which went to remind him, that at the time a bill which he had been instrumental in carrying through parliament was passed—such bill having for its object to protect Unitarians in certain cases from legal consequences that might attach to the impugning of the doctrine of the Trinity,—he (Mr. S.) had made a declaration to the eminent person in question, whereby he agreed, as to all cases not provided for by such statutes, to leave the Unitarians liable to all the visitations that they might be still exposed to from the common law. Now, most unquestionably, he never made such a declaration. On a former occasion, when he was preparing a measure for the further relief of the Unitarians from the obligation of taking certain oaths, he had had an interview with the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the purpose of explaining to his grace the principle of the bill he was then about to bring into the house. The Archbishop of Canterbury, at that time, told him, that if his object were only to remove such penal liabilities as operated to prevent, perhaps, the fair and candid discussion of the doctrinal points to which the Unitarians excepted, he (the Archbishop) was willing to consent to the repeal of those statutes that might be thought to stand in the way of such a discussion; but, of course, not extending this understanding to any denial of Christianity in general, or to blasphemy; both of which were in fact excepted out of the operation of the bill. The object of the bill, the act of 3d Geo. IV., was simply to put Unitarian Dissenters on the same footing, as to the consequences of professing certain peculiar tenets, as all other Protestant Dissenters had been placed by the Act of Toleration. Now it had been clearly stated by Lord Mansfield, that non-conformity, simply and as such, was no offence at common law. Why then it was very desirable that these parties should feel assured that the common law would not visit them as if their nonconformity were an offence. The 53d Geo. III., c. 160, which recited 19th Geo. III., exempted Protestant Dissenters from all penalties to which they were previously liable at law for non-subscription to certain doctrinal articles and oaths. So that nothing could be clearer than this fact—that it was only the denial of Christianity in general, or blasphemy, which was an offence at common law, and not mere nonconformity to particular points of doctrine. By introducing the 8d Geo. IV., he had flattered himself at one time that he had done some service by amending and explaining the law in the respects he had mentioned. The penalties denounced against the profession of these tenets by the common law were of the most severe kind—fine and imprisonment, at the pleasure of the judge, who was authorized, therefore, if he should see fit, to take from a man half of his fortune and his liberty for dissenting from the received doctrines of the established church. With the knowledge of facts like these, how was it possible, let him be allowed to ask, that he (Mr. S.) should have made any such agreement as that imputed to him (hear, hear)? A statement of so serious a nature ought not to have been lightly made in the quarter to which he was alluding.

Mr. Robertson expressed himself decidedly adverse to the prayer of the petitioners, and cautioned the house to be aware how they encouraged too much the prevailing spirit of innovation.

The petition was then brought up and read.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 5.—The Marquis of Lansdown presented a similar petition to this house. He expressed his astonishment that it should still be wished to exclude the petitioners from the benefits of the constitution, without there being on record any case in which their competence to discharge the duties of good subjects could be questioned; and the more so, as the objection to them was founded on inferences drawn from scattered judgments and the words of old acts of parliament, without any proof that the opinions of those persons were of a nature to sanction such exclusion—without its being even pretended that they did not believe in those principles which formed the foundation of all morality—namely, the belief in a future state of rewards and punishments. Yet the Lord Chancellor had expressed a doubt as to the efficiency of a statute passed for the relief of these persons. The Unitarians, therefore, now prayed that they might be informed what their situation really was, that they might know on what conditions they owed allegiance as subjects of the realm. The petitioners ought not to be left under the obscure cloud which now hung over them, and which he hoped next session would be completely removed.

The Lord Chancellor said, that if the law turned out as it was supposed to be, he would then rather pass a law for the benefit of those persons than otherwise. When the question of what the law was came to be regularly discussed, he would state the grounds of his opinion respecting it.

Lord Holland observed, that the learned lord seemed to have forgotten that he had already twice spoken upon this subject in the course of the present session. He would not venture to say that the learned lord stated what the law was, but he did state it was such as ought to induce the house to pause before they passed an act for the relief of the Unitarians on the subject of marriage. The petitioners had taken the only manly course which they could adopt; and if the learned lord had followed the same example when he had doubts, he would have stated what really was the law, and not left it to be understood that he still believed them liable to be punished under the common law. This was a subject which called for inquiry, as it involved the interests of that great portion of the community which consisted of dissenters; for the doubts thrown out did not affect the Unitarians alone, nor even other persons who might impugn the doctrines of the Trinity, but every description of persons who did not belong to the Established Church. It appeared from the opinion of Chief Justice Foster, of Lord Mansfield, and of Chief Justice Willen—an opinion to which Justice Blackstone also seemed to assent—that the whole dissenting body in this country existed by sufferance—that they were all liable to be indicted—that their institutions, for the purposes of charity or education, all stood on a sandy foundation, and might be swept away by the law. However, on the late discussion of the Catholic question, those who approved most of this interpretation of the law, were in the habit of using many kind expressions towards dissenters. But the spirit of kindness with which our Protestant brethren, the Dissenters, were to be treated was plainly shown a few days after, when a part of that body came forward to ask of parliament a small boon, which many of the dignitaries of the Church, to their honour, declared was not merely a boon to the petitioners, but to the clergy of the establishment also. As soon as the bill came to be discussed, up jumped the learned lord and said, "Who are you? I have found out a law by which you are punishable—a law which I own is a disgrace to the books, but which proclaims you to be guilty of a detestable crime." This supposed application of the law to Unitarians was founded on the maxim—that Christianity is part and parcel of the law of England; for it was said, that to deny the Trinity is to deny Christianity. On the first of these points he should say little, for it formed no part of the present question; but as his attention had been drawn to it during those debates, he could not help being surprised to find upon what slender grounds it was founded. But, what was the meaning of this maxim? If Lords Raymond and Holt said that Christianity was part and parcel of the law of the land, and if Lord Mansfield said, in language more precise, that revealed religion was not to be reviled, and that to revile it was punishable, it followed that if these phrases were legal terms, they must have a legal meaning attached to them. Was it the Holy Scriptures which constituted the Christianity which was said to be part and parcel of the law? If so, then no persons who built their faith on those Scriptures could be said to deny Christianity. But perhaps the Christianity meant was that which existed at the time to which the origin of this law maxim referred. If so, their lordships were placed in a curious dilemma, for they ought now to believe in that transubstantiation which every person was called upon to abjure before he could sit in that house. He wished the house and the public to see the consequences of extending the application of this maxim. He reminded their lordships of the important decision in the remarkable case of Mr. Evans, who, being fined for not accepting an office, refused to pay the fine on the ground that he, in taking office, would be required to conform to the Church of England, which, as a Dissenter, he would not do. He was answered that his very non-conformity was a crime, and therefore could afford no ground for his not paying the fine. But it was decided that Mr. Evans was not obliged to pay the fine. The ground of this decision was, that the toleration act gave a right of protection to all Dissenters. Since the passing of the late act relative to Unitarians, those persons stood in the same situation as all other Protestant Dissenters, and if the toleration act did not protect them, it afforded no security to any members of any sect whatever.

The Lord Chancellor said, on the occasion alluded to he had given no opinion of his own on the subject of the law as it applied to the Unitarians. He had merely stated what had actually passed in the courts of law in Westminster Hall.

Petition from Mr. Carlile.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 29.—Mr. Hume presented a petition from Richard Carlile, a prisoner in Dorchester gaol, calling the attention of the house to the circumstances of his case: from the statements of the petition, it appeared, that besides complaining of the length of his imprisonment, and his incompetency to pay the heavy fine imposed upon him by the Court of King's Bench, he complained of the conduct of Government in seizing his books under a writ of execution, and in retaining them still unsold in its possession. If the books had been those prohibited by law, it would have been easy to understand the principle on which the Government continued in possession of them; but many of the books seized were openly sold in all the shops of the country, and ought therefore to have been exposed to immediate sale by the officer who had executed the writ. Among them were 250 copies of Volney's Ruins of Empires, 250 copies of Cobbett's Register. The petition stated, that if these works had been sold at the time of their seizure, they would have produced a sum which would have enabled the petitioner to pay his fine. If this were so, he (Mr. H.) could not conceive a case of greater hardship. As a sincere friend to religion, he had always thought that the interference of the Government and of the Vice Society, with the proceedings of the petitioner, had been productive of great mischief; and he was sorry that the right hon. gent. (Mr. Peel) had not long since taken measures to put an end to the punishment which the petitioner was at present enduring. The petitioner ought either to have his property restored to him, or to be liberated immediately from the prison in which he had been so long immured.

The Attorney-General said, that the property which had been taken on the premises of the petitioner, was not at present, nor had it ever been in the hands of Government. It was in the possession of the sheriffs; and if they were retaining it improperly, the petitioner had his remedy against them. Indeed the petitioner had already brought an action against the sheriffs, in which he had obtained either mere nominal damages, or else a verdict on which it was impossible for him to found any ulterior measures. It ought to be recollected, that if the sheriffs sold the publications taken in Mr. Carlile's shop, they sold them upon their own responsibility for their contents. He was sure, that if the petitioner would point out, either to the sheriffs, or to Mr. Collingridge, the secondary, any book which they could sell, without running the risk of an indictment for blasphemy, those books would instantly be exposed to sale. In the meantime, it was unfair to assume that the sheriffs had acted incorrectly. Their conduct had been acted by the Court of King's Bench, and had been pronounced to be perfectly correct.

Mr. Peel would merely say, that nothing was more difficult than to lay down a rule how long an individual should be imprisoned for non-payment of a fine. To say that a prisoner, who was incompetent to pay a pecuniary fine, should be released at once, would be to offer a premium for the commission of misdemeanors. His release must, therefore, depend upon other circumstances—such as the mildness of his behaviour, his conformance to the discipline of his prison, and his general character. Now nothing could be more violent and improper than the conduct of Mr. Carlile, and that was the chief reason why he had not felt himself justified in interfering on his behalf. He had given orders for the release of Mary Ann Carlile, who, like her brother, had been detained in prison for non-payment of her fine. Her conduct had been the reverse of that of her brother, and he had therefore recommended that she should be discharged. In order that the house might have some grounds on which to form an opinion of the conduct of Mr. Carlile, he would state that Mr. Carlile had given him notice, that after a certain day, which he named, he should consider himself illegally detained, and should feel himself justified in murdering any governor that might be appointed to guard him. Besides this, he had corrupted many individuals, both in the prison and in the neighbourhood, and had gloried in being able to continue, as before, his daring violations of the law. If he had abstained from such representations, and had submitted patiently to the discipline of the prison, he (Mr. Peel) might, perhaps, have consented to discharge the petitioner; but when his conduct was of the most violent and intemperate description, he was bound to take it into consideration before he consented to limit the period of his imprisonment.

The petition was laid upon the table.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—Mr. Brougham presented a petition from Richard Carlile, and six other individuals, whose names he mentioned. The petitioners stated, that they had been prosecuted, and were immured in different prisons of the country, for not being Christians according to the forms of the established church, and for stating their reasons why they were not so; and they prayed that the house would rescind the various sentences which had been passed against them, and admit them to the same toleration that was enjoyed by other Dissenters. No one who knew him (Mr. Brougham) would suppose that he was inclined to patronise any species of indecent ribaldry, such as had been sometimes introduced in these discussions. He considered such ribaldry to be a crime in itself, and to be the very worst mode which could be adopted to propagate any kind of opinions. For, suppose the party who held such opinions to be right, and the rest of the country to be in the wrong, the expression of them in ribald or indecent language was calculated to affront the feelings and rouse the indignation of those whom he ought to conciliate rather than offend, if he wished to make them proselytes. He therefore said, that if these petitioners were right, the most unwise step they could take for the extension of their doctrines, would be to attack the received doctrines of the country in low and scurrilous language. At the same time he thought that the law ought not to press too heavily upon them because they appeared to be, in a certain degree, enthusiasts and fanatics; and toleration, as well as expediency, required that they should not be subjected to that degree of punishment which would entitle them to be considered, either by themselves or by others, as martyrs to the principles they professed. If they had taken a bad way to attack the religion of their country, it was incumbent upon us not to take a bad way to defend it; and the worst of all possible ways would be to inflict severer punishment than their offences required. Having thus endeavoured to guard himself against misconstruction, he would say, that he could conceive no harm as likely to accrue to religion from fair and free discussion; and that until the mode of discussion became so offensive as to excite against it the feelings of almost every man in the country, prosecutions for blasphemy were among the very worst methods of defending religion. That was his deliberate and sincere opinion, and he could hardly conceive any instance in which toleration could be carried too far, either to the religion professed or to the persons professing it.

Mr. Peel agreed that the prosecutions should not be instituted on the score of religious opinions, so long as those opinions were expressed in fair and temperate language; but he contended, that as soon as they vented themselves in scurrilous attacks on established institutions, they deserved the attention of the civil authorities. He maintained that the libels published by Carlile and his fellow-petitioners were of the description mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. Brougham)—they were revolting to the feelings of every moral man in the country, and were therefore properly selected for prosecution. He did not see how Mr. Carlile could be well held up as an object of mercy to the Crown. So far from expressing any contrition for the offence he had committed, he gloried in it, and not only boasted that he would continue to repeat it, but actually carried his boast into execution. To his sister, Mary Ann Carlile, the mercy of the crown had been extended; and she had shown herself not undeserving of it, by refusing to deal any further in the blasphemous publications of her brother.

Sir F. Burdett protested against the principle laid down by the rt. hon. Secretary, that a man who was suffering punishment for religious opinions, should not be entitled to any mitigation of it, unless he turned hypocrite, and retracted the opinions he believed to be true.

Mr. Monck ridiculed the idea of defending religion by prosecuting blasphemy. There was no law in America against blasphemy, and yet he believed that no country in the world was more free from what was generally called blasphemous publications.

Sir F. Burdett contended, that upon the principles laid down by his learned friend below him, and agreed to by the right hon. Secretary, all prosecutions for religious opinions were inexpedient. It was agreed on all hands that religious opinions ought to be tolerated so long as they were expressed in temperate language; but it was now argued that as soon as those opinions were so expressed as to disgust every honest mind, then they ought to be visited by punishment. It appeared to him that under such circumstances they ought not to be noticed, because, if they were so poisonous as was represented, they carried along with them their own antidote (hear, hear). It was his opinion, that if Mr. Carlile had been left to himself, and had not been prosecuted by the Government, he would at this moment have been totally unheard of; whereas by prosecuting him, the Government had given him a notoriety which he could not otherwise have acquired, and had got themselves into a scrape from which they found some difficulty in getting out. He thought that the infliction of great severity on any man for his opinions, no matter how offensive they might be, was the most certain way not to wear him from but to confirm him in those opinions.

The petition was then laid upon the table.

Mr. Brougham, in moving that it be printed, said, that so far was the punishment inflicted on these petitioners from having put down publications of this obnoxious character, that they were now sold openly in all parts of the town (hear). It had been stated, that if the discussion of religious truths were calmly conducted, it ought to be permitted. A wonderful admission truly! Why, where would be the use of discussion if the argument was to be all on one side (hear)?

Mr. Hume wished the rt. hon. Secretary (Peel) would answer one question—was not this country the only country in Europe where individuals were at present imprisoned for religious opinions? He recollected the time when this country was filled with gladness and rejoicings because the inquisition was abolished in every country in Europe; but if our prisons continued to be filled as they were at present, with individuals suffering for religious opinions, England would succeed to the vacant post of inquisitor-general for Europe, than which he could conceive nothing more derogatory to its interests and honour (hear).

Mr. Peel declared it was quite ridiculous to talk of the prisons of the country being filled with sufferers for religious opinions, when it was notorious that there were not more than eleven persons confined for blasphemous publications; and of that number only five had been prosecuted since his accession to his present office (hear).

The Attorney-General defended the course which had been pursued by the law-officers of the Crown with regard to these petitioners. He contended that the prosecutions which had been instituted against them had been effectual in suppressing blasphemous publications, and argued that it was unfair to blame ministers for keeping them in prison, when they were consigned to it by a sentence in the Court of King's Bench, arising out of those prosecutions. They were most of them imprisoned for selling Palmer's Principles of Nature, and he would say that a more horrible, blasphemous, and scurrilous libel, than that work, had never issued from the press of any country. The juries who had tried these petitioners were not more shocked by the work itself, than by the manner in which the parties had ventured to defend it.

Mr. Brougham did not blame the law-officers of the Crown for prosecuting these individuals, but rather for leaving them unprosecuted, till their offences had risen to such a height as to be thought fit ground for altering the old statute law of the country. He did not blame them for prosecuting Mr. Carlile; but he did blame them for bringing down six new acts upon the country, without trying the efficacy of those which previously were in existence. Long before those acts were passed, Benbow had kindly offered the throats of several individuals to the knife. Why had he escaped prosecution? If any man deserved prosecution, it was that individual; but the Government abstained from indicting him, and others who were equally culpable with him, in order that they might repeat their offences, and so afford a pretext for innovating upon the constitution. It had been said that prosecutions were not instituted because juries would not convict. He had always said, that, though juries might not be inclined to convict for libels against the Government, they would be ready enough to convict for libels inciting to assassination. With regard to Palmer's Principles of Nature—a work which he had never read—he would undertake to say that it was not half so bad as any publication of either Hume or Gibbon. Voltaire's works were full of ribaldry and indecency, and yet he had never heard that they had been prosecuted for corrupting the morals of the ladies and gentlemen at the west end of the town (a laugh). If works of this description were to be prosecuted, he thought that the prosecutions should be directed to the works read by the rich, instead of being confined, as they now were, to works read exclusively by the poor.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.—Mr. Brougham presented a Petition from Mr. Richard Carlile—a person who would be considered as worthy of commiseration by every man in whom prejudice had not entirely obliterated the feelings of humanity. The unfortunate individual for whom he now presented the petition, had been assailed for the vehemence of his sentiments, but, for his part, he viewed that vehemence, considering all its features, as a proof of the sincerity of the sentiments by which the petitioner had been actuated. He would acknowledge that the petitioner's vehemence had exceeded his prudence; the fact was, that the petitioner had not acquired the orthodox prudence of making all sentiment and opinion bear upon certain worldly points. The petitioner had been suffering an imprisonment of three years, with a fine of 1,500*l.* The three years would expire upon the 16th of November next; he hoped that when that day arrived, his Majesty's Ministers would be induced to liberate this unhappy victim from his long and dreadful incarceration. He (Mr. Brougham) would take upon himself to say, that our laws, with the opprobrium that had been cast upon them for merciless rigour, had never witnessed a case of such harsh and protracted confinement for any libel, however atrocious. If the Government would continue to insist upon this unhappy man's remaining in gaol until he paid his enormous fine, he had not the slightest hesitation in saying, that the unfortunate prisoner would remain in his dungeon to the end of his life, were that life to extend to thrice the usual period of human existence. A fine so utterly disproportioned to the means and circumstances of the offender no man existing had ever heard of. The very nature of a fine implied a ratio to the culprit's means of paying it, otherwise the word fine would be only a guilty means of accomplishing the most abominable objects of tyranny. In the present case it was quite preposterous to consider for an instant the amount of fine in any possible relation to the prisoner's means of paying it. He did not at all concern himself with the opinions of the petitioner. Whatever those opinions were, the unhappy man had a right to the observances of humanity and justice, and before being, under the pretence of a fine, sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, he had at least the right of being heard before the house. Mr. Carlile's petition stated, that he had been entrapped into an offence which, from the obscure and equivocal nature of the laws, it was impossible for him to know was an offence. The Act of 1813 protected that numerous class of persons that impugned the doctrines of the Trinity. Now Mr. Carlile, with thousands of others, imagined that the very essence of Christianity was the Trinity, and if the law allowed a man to impugn the one, he was by consequence permitted to deny the other. This construction had been put upon the Act of the fifty-third of the late King by thousands of the most zealous Christians, and by many persons of the profession of the law. Mr. Carlile had acted upon this generally received notion; yet his mistake of a law so equivocal, or at least so generally misunderstood, had exposed him to an imprisonment which was unexampled in this, and perhaps in any country of civilized Europe. Mr. Carlile had urged these arguments to the Court of Law from which he had received his extraordinary sentence. The petitioner went on to state that the King's Bench had told him the offence of blasphemy was punishable at common law; he found the authority of Sir M. Hale to be in support of that opinion, whereas, on looking back to my Lord Coke, a more ancient, as well as a higher authority, he found it laid down that blasphemy, heresy, and schism, were punishable by the ecclesiastical law, because such offences could not be taken cognizance of by the common law. He (Mr. B.) wished to guard himself against the impression, that in what had fallen from him he had in the slightest degree expressed his approval of the opinions of Mr. Carlile, or the manner in which those opinions had been promulgated. He thought it was the duty of every member to present any petition respectfully worded, without being deterred by a fear of being mixed up with the case or conduct of the petitioner. It was no offence against the law to entertain any set of opinions, either upon religious or political subjects; neither was it any to discuss them, provided they were discussed with decency and propriety. If a man were an atheist or an infidel, it was his misfortune, not his fault; but if he indecently and improperly published those opinions, then he was amenable to the laws of his country. He should look upon an atheist or an infidel, if there were any such, with pity, not with blame; and he should consider him to be a rash man who would undertake to punish the free discussion of such subjects, provided that discussion were conducted with decency, as he considered that discussion, instead of being injurious, would be beneficial to religion.—The petition was read, and ordered to be printed.

Civil Offices held by the Clergy.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.—Mr. Hume, after a few observations on the general inconvenience of allowing clergymen to hold civil offices in corporations, and to mix themselves up in secular affairs, moved, "that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he might be graciously pleased to direct a return of the number of persons in holy orders of the church of England, holding offices in borough or city corporations, setting forth the names of the offices they hold, with the name of the city or borough in which they hold them; also whether the holder be a beneficed clergyman, and whether he holds more benefices than one, and how many; and also stating whether he be resident on his benefice or not."

Dr. Phillimore opposed the motion, as at best unnecessary.

Mr. J. Smith said, that if it should appear from these returns that the clergy were neglecting the duties belonging to their character, to engage in others that were alien to it, the house might then consider how far it ought to interfere to prevent such neglect in future.

Mr. Peel said, that he should oppose the motion, in consequence of the observation which had just fallen from the hon. member. If the object were to disqualify clergymen from holding civil offices, it would be more fair to the house to bring in a bill expressly for that purpose, than to entrap it into such a measure by mere implication.

Mr. Fyfe Palmer said, that for the very purpose of bringing in such a bill as the rt. hon. gent. suggested, it would be necessary that these returns should be furnished.

Mr. C. Wyse eulogized the general conduct of the clergy. He recommended the hon. member to withdraw his present motion, and to bring the question it involved fairly before the house; not with reference to any particular instance, but on the general principle of the eligibility of the clergy to civil offices.

Sir John Newport concurred in the recommendation of the preceding speaker.

After a few words from Mr. Hume, the gallery was cleared for a division, when there appeared—For the motion, 4—Against it, 22—Majority, 18.

Dr. Free's Case.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 24.—Lord Dacre presented a petition from the churchwardens and others of the parish of Sutton, in the county of Bedford. It appeared that in 1814-15 Dr. Free had been appointed to the living of Sutton, in Bedfordshire. Soon after his appointment, circumstances took place of so disgusting a nature as to provoke the indignation of the parishioners. Not only did the petitioners complain of scenes which they had witnessed, but they stated that the clergyman had openly about him a number of illegitimate children. Application had been made on the subject to a right rev. prelate, whom he now saw in his place in the house. That right rev. prelate directed proceedings to be instituted against Dr. Free in the court of Arches. The learned judges of that court had admitted the truth of the charges; but by the act of Geo. III. the time for proceeding against a clergyman for incontinence was restricted within very narrow limits. A doubt was entertained whether the period might not be enlarged, and that question was brought before the proper court. The petitioners prayed that the time for instituting proceedings might be enlarged. He hoped that the rt. rev. prelate would, in the course of the present session, take some decisive step on this subject.

The Bishop of Lincoln felt as strongly as any man could the gross immorality which was complained of by the petitioners, and none more anxiously wished to put an end to it by effectual means. Since he had been appointed to the see which he had now the honour to fill, he had felt it to be his duty to cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct of the individual mentioned in the petition. Finding that all the efforts of the archdeacon to reclaim him were unsuccessful, he had no course left but to bring the case into the court of Arches. It was his bounden duty to proceed in this matter; but still he must say that it was very hard that a bishop in prosecuting such a case should be put to an expense of 400l. or 500l. He must also observe, that he concurred in opinion with those who thought that the statute should be altered.

A similar petition was presented on the same day to the House of Commons by Mr. J. Smith; And on Thursday, June 30,

Mr. Peel said, that in consequence of the petition, he had desired the King's proctor to report to him the progress of the proceedings in question; and that officer had instructed him, that in consequence of an application which had been made in the cause to the court of King's Bench, the proceedings at Doctors' Commons were necessarily retarded for the present; but, as it was likely that the issue to be tried in the King's Bench would come on at the ensuing session of that court, it was most probable the cause would be remitted to and discussed in the ecclesiastical court, in the beginning of the next term. He was further informed by the King's proctor, that in the meantime no step which he could take would have the effect of expediting the hearing.

London Tithes.

COMMONS, MONDAY, FEB. 14.—The Sheriffs of London appeared at the bar, and presented a petition from the corporation of London for amending the act of Henry VIII. respecting tithes within the city of London.

Mr. Alderman Wood complained of the grievance imposed upon some parishes in the city by the exorbitant demand of 2s. 9d. in the pound for tithe. He hoped the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Peel) would facilitate the proposed arrangements, as he did last year, in the case of one of the parishes in Holborn.

Mr. Peel said, that in many of the city parishes he understood the most perfect understanding prevailed between the rector and the parishioners, and in none had the clergy made the full demand complained of, but on the contrary contented themselves with 1s., 1s. 6d., and in a few instances 1s. 9d. in the pound. Wherever the demand of 2s. 9d. had been made, it was done by lay impropriators. So that between the clergy and their flocks there prevailed that good understanding which did not require the interposition of the legislature. Besides, he thought that any compulsory reduction of tithe would only have the effect of raising he rent pro tanto upon the tenant, without saving the inhabitants from payment of the additional sum.

Mr. Alderman Wood remarked that the observation of the rt. hon. gent. respecting the advance of rent, did not apply to the generality of tenants in London, for they mostly held long leases, and would of course immediately profit from being released from this exorbitant demand, which, considering the amount they paid, far exceeding other parts of the country, was an excessive grievance.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.—Mr. Alderman Wood moved the second reading of the London Tithe bill. He said it appeared to the promoters of this measure, that it would be highly desirable to have an examination into the merits of the subject before a committee of the house. The parish was willing to leave the question to be decided by any individual; or, if the Lord Chancellor would send it for trial by a jury, they would be content with that; but they resisted the enormous claim made by the rector for payment of tithes under a deed, the enrolment of which could not be proved, according to the provisions of the statute of Henry VIII.

Mr. Courtenay thought this was an extraordinary attempt to interfere with the rights of individuals. By an act of the 37th Henry VIII. it was enacted, that a decree therein mentioned should be enrolled. By that decree a rate of 2s. 9d. in the pound was made payable to the persons entitled to tithes, by the inhabitants of certain parishes in the city of London, included in that act. From that period to the present these tithes had been dealt with by the persons entitled to them as they would have dealt with rent-charges, or any other property to which their title was unquestionable. With respect to the enrolment, the evidence of presumption with respect to an event which took place 300 years ago would be admitted in this as it must in every other case. In the year 1647, an issue was tried, in which the question of the enrolment had arisen, and the jury upon that occasion found that the decree had been duly enrolled. Would the house, after this finding, entertain a bill, the preamble of which set forth the assumption that there had been no such enrolment (hear, hear)? He hoped that such an infringement on private property would not receive the sanction of the legislature, and that the parties would not be put to the expense of going into a committee.

Mr. Wynn opposed the bill, because the principle upon which it was founded might be applied to shake the possession of all the private property throughout the kingdom. If the decision in the Court of Chancery or elsewhere had been wrong, let an appeal be brought to the House of Lords, but he would not consent that the doors of this house should be opened to an attempt like that which was made by the persons promoting this bill. He had often thought that even for public purposes the house had been too ready to interfere with private property; but in all these instances it should be remembered that a full compensation had been made to the persons interested.

Mr. Calcraft said he had been informed, that upon the trial to which the hon. member (Mr. Courtenay) alluded, the enrolment had not been brought into question. He agreed that it was of the deepest importance to preserve the rights of property, and to maintain old and settled decisions. In the case of the fire of London, the parliament had dealt with the property of the church for the benefit of churchmen; he thought, therefore, that they might now do so for the relief of the parish. Last year he had carried a bill providing a compensation for the rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and having the concurrence of the Duchess of Buccleuch, and the Bishop of London, he had experienced no difficulty. He wished for the trial of an issue, for the purpose of ascertaining the question of the enrolment, upon which the whole subject turned, and which would put an end to all litigation.

Mr. Courtenay explained, and referred to the report of the case tried in 1647, by which it appeared that the question of enrolment had been raised, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Peel could not but suspect that this bill had been drawn by the hon. Alderman (Wood) himself. At the period of the act the clergy made the same complaint as they did now, that "the citizens for their present riches were very stout, and would not pay." The act had been passed in consequence; and now the citizens of the present day, not less stout nor more willing to pay than those of Henry VIII.'s time (a laugh), came down, backed by the hon. alderman, and asked the house to violate the rights of private property. During the present session an amicable arrangement had been made between the rector of the parish of Bishopsgate (now the Bishop of Chester) and his parishioners. He was willing that every thing which was practicable should be done to effect such arrangements wherever similar disputes existed, but he opposed a bill which, like the present, attacked private rights.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, that the measure before the house had not been resorted to until all means of obtaining the trial of an issue had been attempted and failed.

The bill was rejected without a division.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.—Mr. Calcraft moved the order of the day for the second reading of the St. Olave (Hart Street) Tithe bill. This was a bill to settle the disputes, which had so frequently occurred in the parish, with respect to the amount of the tithe. When the present incumbent came to the living, the tithes did not exceed 250l. They had since been gradually improved until they amounted to the enormous sum of 2200l. By the present bill it was proposed to settle a fixed sum of 1800l. a-year on the incumbent now in possession, and with such provision he was satisfied. The patrons and parishioners were satisfied; but a difference had arisen as to what should be the sum to be paid to the future incumbent. The parishioners agreed to give him the sum of 1200l. a-year, but the Bishop of London wished to have it fixed at 1350l. Now, when it was considered that the parish consisted of only 175 dwelling-houses, and that the chief duty was performed by a curate, at a salary of 100*l.* a-year, he thought 1200*l.* a-year a very liberal allowance. However, if the bill were allowed to go into a committee, some satisfactory arrangements might be made on that subject. The hon. member then went on to contend at some length that the sum of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound was much too great to be demanded for tithe, and particularly objected to it on the ground that the decree under which it was claimed had never been enrolled, and therefore was not valid in law.

Dr. Phillimore objected to the bill, on the ground that under the name of a private bill it was a direct spoliation of private property. The decree under which this tithe was claimed had been enrolled and acted upon in many instances, and was binding, as it was meant to be, on all those parishes to which it stated itself to apply.

Mr. Denman supported the bill, and contended that the decree of Henry VIII. had never been enrolled—that in the commissions and arbitrations under Edward VI. and James and Charles II. for regulating the tithe in several parishes in London, the decree was not even mentioned, which it undoubtedly would have been if it were considered to be in force at the time.

Mr. Peel thought that as the matter involved a grave consideration of law, it ought to be left to the Court of King's Bench, instead of being considered in Parliament, where it might introduce a most dangerous precedent of interference in private property. The arrangement proposed by the parish might be liberal; but as it was permanently to affect the property of the church, the consent of the Bishop of London ought at least to be obtained for the compromise. At all events, he thought the subject had better be considered in the Court of King's Bench than in the House of Commons, unless they meant to set a bad precedent, which would apply as well to the Duke of Bedford's toll in Covent-garden as to the party in this case. The parties might arrange a bill next session better adapted for the purpose.

Mr. Calcraft begged the house to recollect, that the whole business for which the parish was willing to pay 1200*l.* a-year was performed by one curate for 100*l.* (loud cries of hear); that it was the cause of parish disputes, which had kept the parishioners from attendance at the church, and that this bill would heal them all.

The house divided, when the numbers were, for the second reading of the bill, 53.—Against it, 36.—Majority for the second reading, 19.

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

Universities' Police Bill.

MONDAY, JUNE 30.—On the report of the Universities' Police bill, a conversation ensued on the clause for enabling constables to arrest, and the magistrates of the University to imprison, for one month, any prostitute or lewd woman, found walking in the streets of Oxford or Cambridge, who could not give a good account of herself.

Mr. J. Williams, Sir F. Burdett, Mr. Abercrombie, Mr. Hume, and Mr. Monck, opposed the clause, as giving too great a power to constables. Mr. Peel, Dr. Phillimore, and the Secretary-General supported it, as conducive to the interest of education and morality in the Universities.

On the motion, "That these amendments be now read a second time,"

Mr. J. Williams moved, that the words "this day six months" be inserted, instead of the word "now."

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. J. Williams then moved as an amendment, that the words "not giving a good account of themselves," be omitted, for the purpose of inserting "behaving themselves in a riotous and disorderly manner."

For the original clause, 37.—Against it, 9.—Majority 28.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow (and was then passed).

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 27.—The Earl of Shaftesbury moved the third reading of the Universities' Police bill, which, being carried, he moved that the bill should pass.

The Earl of Lauderdale opposed the bill, and more particularly the clause which enacted, that any prostitute found wandering about should be deemed a disorderly person, and should be liable to be punished as a vagrant. But who, under this provision at once vague, unjust and cruel, was to determine who should be deemed a common prostitute? Under that pretext, any woman who happened to be walking in the public walks might be apprehended. His own wife might go strolling about from curiosity, and if taken up, not like, or from fright might be unable to say, who she was. He should move that the clause be omitted.

The Lord Chancellor defended the clause, which he considered necessary. In his time, although it might be otherwise now, the young men were not allowed to wander about.

London University.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 26.—Mr. Brougham moved to bring in a bill to enable certain persons to establish a college or university in the city of London. The object of this university was to bring the advantage of liberal education within the reach of those who could not afford to send their children to Oxford or Cambridge. He assured the house that it was not the intention of the promoters of this bill to throw the slightest imputation on the conduct, the acquirements, the capacity, the talents, or the principles of those who presided in those two learned establishments. That was so far from being the case, that many of the promoters of this bill were distinguished ornaments of the two Universities.

Mr. Peel understanding that no discussion at present was to take place, merely rose to guard against the probability of his being supposed to favour the bill, because he had not opposed it in his present stage.

Mr. Brougham said, he should be surprised if any opposition were made to a bill of which the sole object was to put education within the reach of the middling classes of society, without paying 250*l.* or 300*l.* a year for each of their children at the Universities. He wished to enable the middle classes to procure that education at a cheaper rate, which their servants, their shoemakers, their farriers, and their blacksmiths were now getting almost for nothing at the different institutions which had recently been erected for their instruction.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.—Mr. Brougham moved for leave to withdraw his bill, with the intention of bringing it forward as a private bill. The alteration had become necessary, owing to certain regulations of the house. As great misapprehensions had gone forth respecting the measure, he should explain both what it was not and what it really was. In the first place, the object of the bill was to incorporate a company, with power to sue and be sued, to hold lands and issue shares, and make such executive arrangements as the case required. It would exonerate no individual from the common responsibility for the whole of the company's debts. The promoters of it had no intention of applying for exclusive privileges; of creating fellowships; conferring degrees or honours; of which the two Universities were now in possession. The plain object was, to enable thousands of persons in London, who could not, from many causes, give their children a college education, to educate their families in the only way which accorded with their habits and situation of life. The expense of a University education put it quite out of most men's reach. It could not be had at Oxford or Cambridge, on the lowest estimate, for less than 200*l.* a-year; without including collateral expenses, which often involved worse than mere pecuniary consequences in their train. He spoke from the very highest authority when he declared that the expense and dissipation at the two Universities was so great, that if not checked, it bid fair to injure those learned bodies. To such a pitch had this system been carried, that great pains were being taken to check it. He understood, too, that other great improvements were in progress at both. In fact, that classical studies were more attended to at Cambridge, and the severer sciences at Oxford—a change beneficial to both.—The object of this bill was to enable the people of this metropolis to bring home a good and cheap system of education to their own doors. According to the plan proposed, their children might have the benefit of lectures on the sciences, literature, and the arts, for about 10*l.* a-year, instead of 180*l.* or 200*l.* In these branches it was not intended that the professors should have sinecures, for their general salaries were not to exceed from 50*l.* to 100*l.* a-year, except in the particular case of the Oriental professorship, and perhaps one other: they were mainly to depend upon the success of the school. They were not to have houses, or take boarders. One great result of this new college would be, the formation, on cheap terms, of a good medical school. All experience had shown that this could only be had in the vicinity of large hospitals. Such schools might be had perhaps in Liverpool, Bristol, or Manchester, but in London only could means be found of rendering one generally useful. The importance of medical schools was no less felt in civil society than in the navy and army. In this establishment there was to be no religious test, nor any theological professorship; it being considered that the two great Universities, and the seminaries for the religious education of dissenters, were better adapted for such a purpose. Theology was the only branch of education not included in the plan. It was proposed that the government of the college should be vested in a governor, or chairman, or some such officer, and 19 other directors, with other proper officers, to whom the discipline of the college was to be intrusted. He hoped this explanation would remove the many mistakes which were felt respecting the bill which he meant to bring in hereafter.

Mr. M. A. Taylor defended the system of education at Oxford, with which he had been for more than 40 years acquainted, and insisted that they had made the utmost strides to improve it, according to the growing lights of the times. He was in the habit of going to Oxford, and he knew that the discipline of the young men was unexampled, and could not be exceeded. Indeed, every thing was done, which discipline, science, and literature could accomplish. Habits of reading and study, formerly unknown, were established in the colleges. Noblemen and gentlemen of rank now commonly took real degrees of M. A.; whereas, formerly, persons of their rank never thought of taking any but honorary degrees. A great many foolish notions had got abroad about the idleness and dissipation of the Universities; but the specimens of science and learning which those venerable institutions had sent forth, within the last 40 years, were their best apologies. He felt sure that all the liberal views of his learned friend must fall, without a species of discipline which could not be attained in London.

The order was then discharged.

Tax on Newspapers, &c.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—Mr. Brougham presented a petition from a bookseller of the name of Gifford, of Paternoster-Row, praying that the house would give greater means of circulation to cheap publications on science, philosophy, and literature, by diminishing the duty on printing paper—by reducing the tax on advertisements—by lowering the exorbitant duty on newspapers, and by allowing periodical publications to be conveyed by the post to all parts of the empire, on payment of a moderate sum for postage, not exceeding in any case, the amount of 25 per cent. on the value of the article transmitted.—Ordered to be printed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day for receiving the report upon the Newspapers' bill,

Mr. Hume wished to submit one alteration which he conceived would prove highly beneficial to the country. The bill reduced the duty upon Supplements to newspapers containing nothing but advertisements, from 3*d.* to 2*d.* and he wished to reduce the whole duty to the same sum. He wished the house to consider the great injustice the present high duty did to all who advertised, and to the commercial interest generally, by diminishing the number of papers circulated. The stamp duty at present upon each paper was 4*d.* which was reduced by discount to 3*d.* rather more than the half price of the entire paper. In 1814 an additional duty of one penny had been laid on, but by the returns upon the table, it would be seen that so far from this increase of duty occasioning any increase of revenue, the revenue, considering all the circumstances of the country, had since that period, diminished. From 1806 to 1814, the increase in newspaper revenue had amounted to £36,000l.; but in the year 1815, when the duty was raised, the amount of increase was only 4,000l. in the whole nine succeeding years, instead of being 10,000l. if the increase of revenue had been in ratio to the augmentation of the tax. This was a remarkable instance of an increase of tax occasioning, not an increase of revenue, but a decrease of consumption. It was necessary for the dissemination of information, that there should exist a number of newspapers, and the plan which he recommended would have the effect of greatly facilitating the distribution of that information. By reducing the duty on Supplements, they would benefit two or three papers only, without at all relieving the others. He called upon the rt. hon. gent. to look at the effect which the reduction he (Mr. Hume) proposed would have upon advertisements of commercial sales. He would instance the cases of Liverpool and Philadelphia. The commerce of the former place was six times greater than that of the latter, and yet the number of newspapers in Philadelphia was six times greater than that in Liverpool. In America, some small charge, perhaps 6d. was paid for each advertisement, and the paper itself cost three half-pence, and yet the number of advertisements published in Philadelphia alone was 70 times greater than the number published in Liverpool. If the duty were reduced to 1s., so that an advertisement might be inserted at 2s. or 3s. instead of 6s. or 7s. as at present, the increase in the number both of papers and advertisements would more than make up the deficiency. He approved of that part of the bill which did away with any limit to the size of the sheet. But why make a half-measure of it? Why not at once adopt his plan, when it was clear that it would in no way diminish the revenue? If the right hon. gent. would only adopt his plan for one year, he would guarantee him against any loss (a laugh). If he would only try it for a single year, and it was not then found effective, then he (Mr. Hume) would assent to any alteration which the right hon. gent. should think fit to propose. He concluded by moving, as an amendment, that the word "Supplement" be omitted in the first resolution, for the purpose of reducing the stamp on all newspapers to 2d.

On the question being put,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if he were about to sell an estate, he should not for a moment object to the hon. member's guarantee, but where half a million of public revenue was at stake, he must excuse him if he looked for some greater security. Besides, the newspapers were satisfied with the proposed regulation. The hon. member, however, objected, that lessening the duty on Supplements would benefit only a few, and was an injustice to the other papers. To this he answered, that he lessened a particular duty upon those who were obliged to pay it, and this surely could be no hardship upon persons not subject to that duty. When he considered the variety of taxes they had dealt with during the session, and the number of reductions which had been made; and when he considered, that he had had a nibble at the newspaper duty also, he could not at present consent to any further reductions. As to the dread of any dearth of newspapers, that did not strike him as very probable. Scarcely a week elapsed in which he did not receive specimens of new papers which came out with a brilliant prospectus, promising the highest advantages in the way of information, and soliciting his patronage. He had not yet given it; but this would seem to show that the appetite for that species of amusement—or intelligence, if the hon. gent. would have it so—was not likely to be stinted by the smallness of the provision; there were abundant means for gratifying it at all times. He must, therefore, under these circumstances, decline acceding to the amendment.

The amendment was then put and negatived, and the original resolutions agreed to.

PUBLIC HEALTH.

Quarantine Laws.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.—On the motion that the Quarantine Laws bill be read a second time,

Mr. J. Smith said that he considered the provisions of this bill to be highly useful, and was only sorry that the Board of Trade had not thought it right to recommend still further alterations in the quarantine laws. He was of opinion, that more might have been done with safety. Dr. Maclean, who had had greater opportunities for examining the nature of the plague than any man living, had declared it not to be contagious; and had likewise stated that the question was not so much a question of science as a question of fact, on which any man, who was in the habit of weighing testimony, was qualified to decide. It had been believed in England for many years, that the contagion of the plague was capable of being conveyed in clothing and in goods from one country to another, and that cotton, either in a raw or manufactured state, was the medium by which it was most easily conveyed. Now, he was able to state as a matter of fact, that there never had been an instance of the contagion of fever being conveyed by clothing or goods of any kind. He might urge as a proof of this position, that Holland, which of all our commercial rivals traded most to those parts of the world in which the plague was prevalent, had never thought it requisite to enact any laws of this kind; and what was called quarantine in Holland amounted to nothing, as it never extended to more than three or four days' duration. He had a document in his hand, which showed that a vessel, which had arrived at Amsterdam or some other port of Holland with an unsound bill of health, was permitted to discharge her cargo within three or four days after her arrival. As far, therefore, as the example of Holland went, it was evident that no danger had arisen from the importation of goods from countries visited by the plague. He would mention another fact, which could not be disputed. There was no instance of any inspector of the lazarettos having any fever since their existence in this country. Mr. Turnbull, our Consul at Marseilles, had informed him, that though the coast of France in his neighbourhood was peculiarly liable to contagion, supposing contagion to exist, and though vessels were almost daily arriving at Marseilles from the plague countries, there was no instance of any expurgator having taken the plague since the year 1729. In that year an individual, who was opening a bale of cotton, suddenly dropped down dead. It was said that the contagion was so strong that it killed him immediately: but the circumstance admitted of a more natural explanation; it was probable that the man had died in a fit of apoplexy. With regard to other lazarettos, it was not in his power to make the same inquiries, but he had little doubt that if they were made, they would be attended by similar results. It was stated by Dr. Maclean and other gentlemen acquainted with the affairs of Turkey, that at Constantinople, when thousands of victims were dying of the plague, their clothes were regularly sold, and worn with impunity by the purchasers in the public market. At Aleppo, the plague was often prevalent. From that city caravans passed with goods into almost every part of Asia. There was no instance on record of the plague ever having been communicated by means of those caravans. There was also considerable intercourse between Turkey and Persia; and though the former country was often a sufferer from the plague, that horrible visitant had never made its appearance in Persia. Looking, then, at these facts, he would ask the house to consider whether no better cause than contagion could be found for the diffusion of the plague. Many doubted whether the disease which ravaged London in 1665 were the plague or not. Yet, even if were the plague, it might be accounted for by the mode of living which at that time prevailed in England. They knew that in the reign of Elizabeth her presence-chamber was strewn with rushes, and that the usual diet of the ladies of her household was salt fish, hung beef, &c. From such circumstances it might be easy to conjecture what the habits and diet of the common people would be in little more than half a century afterwards: and under such habits and such a diet, coupled with the want of cleanliness and want of room which then existed in London, it could not be surprising that a fever, with all the appearance of plague, should have sprung up and diffused itself widely. Now, let them apply these circumstances to the inhabitants of Smyrna, and the other towns on the coast of Asia Minor. In those places the same want of cleanliness, the same disregard of wholesome habits, the same carelessness about diet, now prevailed as had formerly prevailed in London, and were in themselves sufficient to account for the prevalence of the plague among them. It was curious to observe that the manner in which the plague arose and disappeared was perfectly consistent with these causes. It generally broke out in the poorest and most confined parts of the town, in sultry weather, and began to disappear as the heat decreased. Indeed, if it were not dependent upon such cause, it was evident that the plague, supposing it to be contagious, must long since have depopulated the globe. In 1811, a committee was appointed to examine into the state of the quarantine laws, and that committee determined, with only one dissentient voice, that the plague was contagious. In looking over the evidence appended to the reports, he found that the physicians examined before it, were all, with two or three exceptions, in favour of that doctrine; and he believed that it was upon the opinions expressed by the physicians that the committee formed the report which they afterwards submitted to the house. Since that time another investigation had been instituted into the subject, and the last investigation differed from the first in this important particular—that on the first none but contagionists had been examined, whilst on the second the anti-contagionists, if he might use such an expression, were also allowed to be heard. There was this remarkable circumstance in the evidence of the contagionists,—they agreed with wonderful unanimity as to the existence of contagion, but differed most miraculously in their account of its nature and causes. The inference which he drew from that circumstance was—that the question on which they gave such round and decided opinions was not properly understood; and his reason for making that statement was, a hope that the moment would be hastened by it when their former inquiries might be reviewed and brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The existing system of quarantine law, unless justified by necessity, could be justified by no other reason. It was prejudicial to the best interests of the country; it obstructed commerce; it impeded science; it was injurious to those who travelled either for business or for pleasure: it was connected with many superstitious feelings; and in regard to the increasing commerce we were now carrying on with Egypt, it would be utterly destroyed, if some alterations were not made in our quarantine regulations. Since 1819, many medical men had changed their opinions on the doctrine of contagion. Dr. Maclean had made many converts, notwithstanding the professional jealousy by which he was originally assailed. Dr. Armstrong, who was more conversant with cases of fever than any other physician in the metropolis, stated, that not a year elapsed in which he did not visit some hundred cases of typhus fever, that the symptoms of it were the same as those of the plague in Egypt, and yet in no instance had he ever suffered by the contagion. It was the knowledge of these facts that led him, (Mr. S.) to express his regret that Government had not gone further in their improvement of the quarantine system than it had done. At the same time he must mention a fact, which he considered as highly creditable to Government. A vessel had arrived at Liverpool with a foul bill of health. According to the quarantine regulations, it ought to have remained fifty or sixty days without unloading its cargo. Now this foul bill of health had not arisen from any of the sailors having been sick on the voyage, but from a single old woman having died of fever, which some people called the plague, at the place from which this ship sailed. That circumstance made all the ships foul which sailed from the place, and the consequence was, that several of them, which had cargoes on board, did not sail at all. The vessel in question had, however, come to England, and on its owners making a suitable representation to the proper quarter, had been allowed to unload, and had since sailed on another voyage. He thought that the Government had acted very wisely in dispensing with the regulations upon that occasion, and he trusted that they would not hesitate to exercise a similar discretion whenever similar facts should seem to require it.

Mr. Wallace admitted that those individuals who were formerly most convinced of the existence of contagion, were now much inclined to doubt the correctness of their opinions. Still there were considerable difficulties to be overcome before a conclusion could be arrived at, like that at which the hon. member wished to arrive. It was evident, that no committee, whilst medical men stated that contagion was not only possible but probable, could bring themselves to recommend to the house to remove every safeguard which existed against it. It was incumbent upon the house, when the weight of such authority was against the removal of the quarantine laws, to act with peculiar caution, especially as a false step in this case might be attended with irreparable injury.

Mr. H. Gurney said, that contagion was often capricious and unsettled in its operation, but there was no climate under Heaven which was not susceptible of its ravages. It was inconceivable to him how any persons could be mad enough to wish to incur the risk of introducing the plague into England for the sake of the cottons of Egypt. Surely the health and welfare of the people of England were more dear to the house than the paltry lucre of a few merchants at Liverpool.

Mr. Hobhouse had no doubt but that the house would come to an exactly opposite conclusion from that of his hon. friend who spoke last. The circumstances connected with the plague of London flatly contradicted him. All the phenomena of that plague agreed with the character of epidemic, and not contagious disease. Different parts of the town were infected with it, while others were entirely exempt. It was generally fatal to new comers, while others were not affected at all. There were portions of London and its vicinity where the disease made no appearance. The villages of Hampstead and Highgate were wholly free from the malady, though the intercourse with the metropolis was not for a moment suspended. Another similarity was most remarkable, and which, in his judgment, extinguished the very idea of contagion, that the plague of London, in the same way as in Egypt, ceased altogether when the disease was at its greatest height. In Egypt it was ascertained that the disorder decreased as the waters of the Nile increased. On what principle of an infectious disease was it possible to reconcile such an effect? It was true, that for some years most eminent professional men did believe that the plague was communicated by contagion. But when the question had been brought before the world recently, some very able men had most laudably stated that their ideas had changed. Amongst those was Dr. Rush, of the United States, who had most meritoriously published a recantation of his former opinions, as the best reparation he could make for the support he had given previously to the delusive views of contagion. But it was a mistake to state that in ancient times the plague was so considered. It was only after the council of Trent that such a belief prevailed. The most accurate investigators had, in his opinion, satisfactorily proved that it was attended with all the phenomena which characterized epidemic diseases. In the great plague of Malta in 1813, it was found that on one spot of that island all the residents died, while in another village, not very distant, none of the inhabitants were attacked. But it was said that Dr. Maclean had himself been infected with the plague at Constantinople—but those who made that objection did not state these facts, that though the doctor was afflicted, yet of nineteen medical and other attendants, who waited on the sick, and actually resided in the Pest House, not one was attacked (hear, hear), while Dr. Maclean, who was not in such close contact, was diseased. It was well known that the French physician, Dr. Assalini, had inoculated himself with the plague virus, but the infection did not take place. Napoleon Bonaparte had repeatedly touched the pustules of the deceased soldiers, and with perfect security. But, notwithstanding his own conviction on the point, he (Mr. H.) still considered that his Majesty's government were quite right in not incurring a responsibility—they were not to be expected to meet the alarm which the terrors of certain ladies and gentlemen might produce, lest the plague might be brought from Alexandria to Liverpool in a bale of cotton. These quarantine regulations were attended with a very great public expense, besides a great commercial injury. The regulations against the communication of the plague at Malta, had cost a million of money. In Spain, a very great change of opinion had taken place relative to the character of the yellow fever. It was true that certain physicians in the Cortes had contended for the necessity of guarding against its spread as contagious. But the whole of the professional men at Barcelona, where Dr. Maclean was at the time, held a contrary opinion. With respect to the opinions of professional men, there were many reasons why much confidence should not be placed in their conclusions. They were generally under such shackles from their very calling, that they were rarely found the friends of improvement. But he would say of that individual whose name had been so deservedly eulogized that evening—he meant Dr. Maclean (hear, hear), that he was one of those extraordinary persons, destined as well from vigour of intellect as unremitting exertion and industry, to create a great change in the world, and to whom, in future ages, the finger of the historian will point as one of the benefactors to his species (hear, hear).

Mr. Trant said, that when he was in Cairo, he was given to understand that the plague generally broke out in June—the Christians believed, rather superstitiously, that it was always on St. John's day. But the fact which was believed on better grounds was, that it generally broke out in the quarters of the Jews, who bought all the old clothes, and among whom were the parties first infected. The house would compare that fact with the arguments of those who considered it impossible that bales of cloth goods could communicate it. As to the fanciful line which prevented the march of the disease into Upper Egypt, it was his peculiar fortune to see that violated also. The line itself was purely imaginary, and the fact had no foundation but that of Mahometan superstition. The people of that religion asserted and believed that the plague could not pass beyond the latitude of Mecca, because that was the city of their prophet. Now, when he was making his way through Upper Egypt, the plague was raging as far south as Mocha, though that was a circumstance which had not been known before within the memory of man. The plague prevailed at Alexandria while he was there. A surgeon with whom he was acquainted disbelieved the theory of contagion, and went among the patients in the hospital. He did not then take the infection, but wishing to push his experiments to the utmost, he got into a bed which had been occupied by one who had the in-section. He then became infected, and died.

Sir R. Wilson said, that when he was in Egypt the army formed two divisions. The one which was stationed at Alexandria took the plague; the other, which was generally in motion, was not touched with it. The general conjecture was, that the stationary force was infected because it was permanently exposed to the atmosphere in which the epidemic prevailed, and the moving division did not continue in it long enough to take the infection. The moving division of the British army passed through villages infected with the plague without being touched with it. Still it was not the business of government to attempt to force public opinion upon a subject of this nature. They ought rather to endeavour to soothe apprehensions, however ill-grounded.

Mr. Hume said, that he was in Alexandria while the plague was there, and that the irregularity with which it was known to break out in Egypt, while the whole coast of Asia Minor was quite free from it, proved that the principles upon which the quarantine laws had been enacted were not correct.

The bill was then read a second time.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.—On the motion for the house resolving itself into a committee on the quarantine laws bill,

Mr. J. Smith observed, that in the present system of quarantine there were obvious anomalies to which he felt it a duty to object. So ineffectual was it to accomplish its ostensible objects, that it was notorious that cargoes were frequently brought from the Levant to Holland, where a different and milder system of quarantine laws prevailed, in order to effect the introduction of such goods with the most perfect facility into England; and yet in Holland the plague had not made its appearance for a long period of time, notwithstanding the great amount of imports into that country; nor in France or England for upwards of one hundred years. He did not now mean to enter into the history of this question; but he might be allowed to notice, that in 1819, several medical and other experienced gentlemen were examined upon it. They only agreed in affirming that this disease was contagious (hear, hear), but in no other point did they concur. In 1824, other individuals were examined; but the only witnesses examined before that latter committee were they who were decidedly contagionists, and on that principle all were agreed. One should have thought that their evidence would have concurred on that topic, therefore. No such thing. Their evidence was so unfavourable to contagion generally, that one of them pronounced Great Britain to be perfectly free from it eight months out of the year. Another medical man, of great eminence, expressed a doubt whether the plague ever passed Cape Finisterre. Persons of the highest distinction in the medical profession had now determined that the yellow fever—that scourge of other countries—could be no longer a matter of dread to Great Britain. Upon equally high authority, it was now held that typhus fever was not contagious. Upon the whole, he considered that it was impossible, with propriety, to trust the revision of these laws to a committee. The first proceeding should be, the appointment of a commission, consisting of medical practitioners partly, and partly of men of general science and experience, charged to collect and examine into facts connected with the propagation of the plague. With respect to the recent fever at Barcelona, the most eminent physicians in France scoffed at the idea of its being contagious; and even when the Cordon Sanitaire was established with the ostensible design of preventing its diffusion, they knew better than to believe that such was its real object.

Mr. Huskisson was extremely desirous that the public mind should be set at rest on this subject. It would, unquestionably, be a great advantage if the whole of the quarantine laws could be done away with; but the facts on each side of the question were so strong, that it was necessary to treat it with extreme caution. It would be highly injurious to our commerce, if a notion should get abroad that we were disposed to pay no attention to the regulations which other countries thought fit to observe on this subject. The mere notion that we had intended to do so, had already had the effect of inducing the authorities at all the ports of the Mediterranean to put British ships, wherever they might come from, under quarantine. He had satisfied the ministers of the King of Sardinia and of the King of France, that his intention was only to remove some of the obstacles which existed in the way of our free intercourse with their ports, and the regulations which they had before insisted upon, under the impression to which he alluded, had been in consequence removed from the ports of Genoa and Marseilles.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that the difference of opinion which existed among men best qualified to speak upon this subject, and the whole course of past experience, enforced the necessity of all prudent precautions. The black assize at Oxford, within the knowledge of every man, and many other instances more recent, but not perhaps less remarkable, proved the possibility of infection being communicated by accidents in themselves extremely trifling. However desirable it might be to relax any restrictions upon our commerce, it was not less imperative to provide against the possible introduction of contagious diseases into this country.

Mr. Wilmot Horton was of opinion that the fact of the existence of contagion in the Mediterranean had been satisfactorily proved. The danger of that contagion being communicated by means of cotton, was considerably lessened by two facts: the first, that cotton was always packed in the sun, and the effect of the open air was such as to prevent infection; and next, that the first effect of the plague was to deprive the persons seized with it of their strength; thus no man suffering under it could be employed in such labour as the packing of cotton.

Mr. Hume wished to know whether the regulations adopted at Malta were continued?

Mr. W. Horton said, that a Board of Health had been established at Malta, and was still continued there.

The report was then ordered to be brought up on Monday.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.—The order of the day for bringing up the report on the Quarantine Laws bill having been read,

Sir I. Coffin said he could state from his own personal observation, that the plague was contagious. When he was at Malta, the disease was brought to Valetta by a shoemaker, in some leather. The man died, and so did the family with whom he resided. The disease was soon pronounced to be the plague, and spread rapidly; and had it not been for the precautions adopted by Sir Thomas Maitland and the other English officers on the spot, he did not doubt that all the inhabitants would have perished. A cordon sanitaire was drawn round Valetta, and every person who attempted to pass it was shot. The disease was at length subdued, after five thousand of the inhabitants had been carried off. It was next conveyed to the island of Gozo, in the clothes of some of the persons who died at Valetta, and 600 persons were destroyed in that island. From Gozo the disease was carried to Corfu, by means of a skein of cotton, which was conveyed thither by a young lady, who perished with all her family. At Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers, it was the custom of the Franks, as Christians were there called, the moment the plague made its appearance, to shut themselves up in their houses, to receive their food on the roofs, and to eat only stale bread, for new bread had the faculty of conveying the disease. In consequence of taking these precautions, there was scarcely an instance known of a Frank falling a victim to the plague. A ship sailed every year from Alexandria to Algiers, laden with the clothes of those who had died of the plague, and thus the disease was continually renewed. We were in the habit of importing a great quantity of cotton from the Delta, and if the plague should prevail in that district, he had no doubt that it would be brought into this country (hear). All articles coming from the Delta ought to be scrupulously examined (hear). A writer, he saw, had lately maintained that the plague was not contagious. This could only be some hyperborean philosopher with a hide like a rhinoceros (a laugh). It had likewise been stated that the plague had never been introduced into England. That was not correct; the plague had prevailed in England four different times, and 180,000 people had been carried off by it (hear).

Lord Belgrave said, that to prove that the plague was contagious, no more was necessary than to refer to the case of Dr. M'Lean, who went to Constantinople to endeavour to ascertain the fact. He expressed a desire to be placed where the disease was raging most. His wish was complied with; and the consequence was, that he caught the plague, though it did not end in his death. If any proof were wanting to shew the fallacy of his opinion, it might be found in the conduct of the Franks in the countries of the East. The instant the plague appeared, they closed their doors, subjected all their food to a process of fumigation, and shot their cats (a laugh), for it was known that those animals could convey the disease. Having taken these precautionary measures, it never happened that they were affected by the disease. The Mahometans, on the other hand, who considered the plague to be a sacred disease—who were told by their religion, that if they perished by it, they would be received at once into the bosom of Mahomet, or what perhaps they would rather prefer, would be permitted to enjoy everlasting fruition in the arms of the houris (a laugh)—took no precaution against catching the disease, and were therefore carried off by thousands. He knew a respectable merchant connected with the Levant Company, who expected by the operation of the bill to put into his pocket about 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.*; but, much to his credit, he had publicly stated that he should do so with regret, because he considered it the price of blood (hear). The difficulties which we should experience in our export trade, in consequence of passing the bill, would more than counterbalance any advantage which might result from it to the import trade (hear). In Naples and Leghorn, England was already considered an infected country, and our ships were not allowed to land their cargoes until they had waited a considerable time. This, no doubt, would be productive of great inconvenience to merchants. He trusted that hon. members would oppose this measure; and, like the ancient prophet in the wilderness, "stand between the dead and the living, and stay the plague" (hear).

Mr. C. Grant said, that the bill, properly looked at, was open to none of the objections which had been taken to it. The committee of foreign trade had sat last year on the subject of the quarantine laws. Having received a variety of complaints as to the difficulty and impediment which those laws placed in the way of commerce, the committee had applied themselves to consider, not whether the plague was or was not contagious, but whether, assuming it to be contagious, any part of the existing restrictions could be dispensed with without danger; for the committee had actually set out by assuming that the plague was contagious, and had refused even to examine any evidence to the contrary effect. It was the opinion of Sir Gilbert Blane, and of several other physicians, decided advocates for the theory of contagion, that, admitting the plague to be contagious, all the provisions of the present bill might be carried into effect with perfect safety. The effect of the bill had been entirely misunderstood by those who opposed it.

The report was then received. To be read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.—The order of the day for the third reading of the Quarantine Laws bill, having been read,

Mr. C. Grant rose to correct a very strange misapprehension which had gone forth, as if it had been the design of the framers of this bill, and of the bill itself, to do away entirely with the precautionary system of the quarantine laws. Those who so thought and argued, could have read neither the bill nor the report upon which it was founded. It never had been the design of Government to relax the sanatory principle of the quarantine laws, but, on the contrary, to strengthen it by taking away the inoperative capital penalties, and substituting others which were likely to secure the efficiency of the laws. It had been recommended in the committee, whose investigations had been so frequently made the subject of discussion in that house, that goods from the plague countries should perform quarantine of 31 days after being landed at the lazaretto. The conclusion at which the whole of the evidence taken before the committee seemed to point, was the same as the recommendation of the most experienced practitioners—namely, the propriety of reducing the number of days under the existing law devoted to quarantine. It would seem, therefore, upon the whole, and even according to the opinions of those who were most apprehensive of contagion, that this important principle was established—namely, that in respect to ships arriving in the ports of this kingdom from countries infected with the plague, the number of quarantine days might properly be reduced. In regard to clean bills of health, it was not necessary to detain the house on that subject.—He thought that it would be sufficient that vessels arriving with clean bills should be visited by proper officers, who would report to the Privy Council, and upon favourable answers, which would be received by return of post, such vessels might be admitted. In all arrangements of the kind the object of Government would be, that the modifications to be adopted, should not exceed the modifications recommended by the medical practitioners. The King in Council was already even, under the existing system, vested with large discretionary powers in regard to the quarantine laws. The Privy Council might declare the trade with other countries, besides those already included, to be subject to the regulations of quarantine; and it might by its order remove that liability from the trades at present subject to it. There was one other object which it was necessary to mention as one that had been maturely considered by the Government; and that was, the appointment of some experienced and able medical inspector, whose duty it would be to overlook all the reports made to the Privy Council, and to advise them thereon. It would be desirable, also, that he should inspect all the quarantine stations.

Sir Isaac Coffin read an extract from the letter of a physician, who had been eight years with our army in Egypt, in which the writer stated that a friend of his, a non-contagionist, had thought proper during his sojourn at Malta, to shut himself up in the little island of Gozo, when the plague had declared itself there. In a few days his temerity cost him his life (hear). He (Sir I. Coffin) was only surprised that the same fate did not overtake Dr. Maclean, who ventured to reside in the pest-house at Constantinople, among the plague patients confined there. In a very little time all the assistants he had caused to be hired at two dollars per diem perished of the infection, and every one of the patients too, leaving the doctor the only survivor of the whole company.

Mr. Conning was very anxious that the house should understand that the doctrine of non-contagion had really not received any countenance from the most experienced and practical men. The mischief which had been produced by the unreserved and confident declarations that had been made by the disciples of this doctrine, was much greater than perhaps those gentlemen were aware of. Already at Marseilles and at Genoa, a longer quarantine was imposed upon British shipping, than on the shipping of any other European nation. At Naples, in addition to the usual term of quarantine prevailing there, they had imposed a term of 21 days upon British vessels that had quitted Great Britain, ever since the gentlemen who were such determined non-contagionists had promulgated in all places their opinions (hear). Under these circumstances, he certainly did wish that hon. gentlemen would be pleased to keep such opinions a little more to themselves; or if they would continue their experiments, he heartily trusted that they would be tried, as such experiments anciently were, in corpora vili, rather than in a manner to prejudice the welfare of the community (hear). He was happy to say, however, that the public appeared to have no disposition to concur in the theories to which he had alluded.

Mr. Hume quite agreed that the mischief to which the rt. hon. gent. had just adverted, had been considerable, and he thought it was but right, that Ministers should do every thing in their power to contradict the opinion that had gone abroad, that our present quarantine laws were about to be repealed. But he had to complain that this declaration was not made, as it should have been, when the present bill was first introduced by Government. He could not help observing on the lecture which had been read by the rt. hon. gent., however, to the hon. member for Westminster, and others who thought with that hon. gent. on the subject of contagion; in respect to whom the rt. hon. gent. had expressed so strong a wish that they would keep their opinions to themselves. Now he (Mr. Hume) was himself by no means satisfied that the principle of contagion existed to the degree in which it had been long supposed to exist; and at any rate he believed that the discussion of the question could not be productive of any harm. With regard to the appointment of that medical officer—the superintendant mentioned by the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Grant)—he thought that the opinion of no single individual should be acted upon, in such vital matters.

Mr. Huskisson felt assured that if the hon. gent. would only think of the responsibility which attached to the Board of Trade, when left to decide upon the case of every vessel arriving with either a foul or a suspected bill of health, he would see that it was desirable they should have the assistance of some such officer, possessing the advantage of having visited countries where the plague raged, during its visitations; and whose observation and judgment, therefore, in that matter might guide the board in all questions of quarantine. At present there was no person attached to the Board of Trade, who had ever witnessed the ravages of plague at all. As to the objection taken by the hon. gent. that ministers should have made the declarations which the rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Grant) had made to-night upon an earlier occasion, the fact was, the rt. hon. gent. had in the very first instance stated the principle of the present measure. He (Mr. Huskisson) had seen the most idle reports in print about the intentions of Government in respect of bills of health; and he was obliged to concur with his rt. hon. friend, that the most serious mischief was occasioned by such means; and that they who professed the doctrine of non-contagion, although they were at perfect liberty to publish their theories in the usual course of publication, had yet no right to propound them in places and under circumstances where they might be erroneously supposed to have a certain degree of sanction from the legislature (hear). He had seen it stated in the newspapers lately, that a dangerous case had declared itself in the lazaretto at Sheerness; whereas, in fact, every one of the persons in or about that establishment had been strictly examined, and was found to be in perfect health. This report also had, as he had reason to believe, done us a great deal of mischief abroad.

After a few technical amendments, the bill was read a third time and passed.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 21.—The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day on the Quarantine Laws Bill.

The Earl of Derby said, that undoubtedly
